THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

BOOK VII.

THE CONSULATE AND THE EMPIRE.

CHAPTER I.

EARLY CAREER OF BONAPARTE; NEW MINISTRY OF FRANCE; MILITARY APPOINTMENTS; FINANCIAL AND OTHER MEASURES OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT; THE NEW CONSTITUTION; ORGANISATION OF THE CONSULAR GOVERNMENT; DEFEAT AND SUBMISSION OF THE ROYALISTS IN BRITANY AND NORMANDY; INSTALLATION OF THE CONSULS IN THE TUILERIES; LOUIS XVIII. AND THE FIRST CONSUL.

THE revolution of the 18th and 19th of Brumaire, was the prelude to the establishment of an entirely new order of things in France; and Napoleon Bonaparte, who, only three months before, completed his thirtieth year, soon became the first man in the country, with a power far surpassing that of the Bourbons previous to 1789. Though this extraordinary man first appeared before the public as a young officer with no property except his pay, and without any pretensions to rank, he was of no mean origin.* His family, a noble Italian one, was connected, by intermarriages, with the Medici, the Orsini, and the Lomellini. When the intestine strife that desolated Italy had wasted the property of the Bonapartes, and obliged some of the members to seek their fortunes in a foreign land, a younger branch settled in Corsica, and became the ancestor of the Bonaparte family in that island. Napoleon's father, Carlo, studied law at Pisa; and when he returned to Corsica, he became an advocate in the royal court of assize. He married Letizia Ramolino at Ajaccio, in 1767. Both were born in that town; and the lady, who was of Neapolitan extraction, is said to have been "well descended, remarkable for beauty, strong-minded, and accomplished." Carlo was an advocate of considerable reputation; but, in the last struggles of the Genoese to retain possession of Corsica, he joined the army, and served under Paoli, in his defence of the island, A.D. 1768 and 1769, after the Genoese had sold their claim to France. The French were successful. The submission of the Corsicans took place in June, 1769. Napoleon was born on the 15th of August. By birth, therefore, he was a subject of the Bourbons. His mother "was seized with the pains of labour while attending mass, at the solemnization of some holiday. She speedily gained her home, and, upon reaching her chamber, was delivered of a male child upon an old piece of tapestry, upon which were embroidered the heroes of Homer, and figures of the fabled warriors of antiquity."† The superstitious would say, that this was indicative of that child's future career. The month after his birth, count Marbœuf, the French commissioner at Corsica, convoked the states of the island, comprised of the three orders—clergy, nobles, and commons. The Bonapartes proved their title to be enrolled amongst the second, and were so enrolled accordingly.

Peace re-established, Carlo Bonaparte returned to his profession as an advocate; and soon after he went to Paris, at the head of a deputation of his order, to obtain an audience of Louis XVI., relative to differences which had arisen between

* Bonaparte's family was, there is little doubt, originally Florentine. Existing genealogical documents trace the ancestors of the French emperor back as far as A.D. 1120, when we find them taking a very decided part with the Ghibelins, for which they were exiled from Florence. In 1332, John Bonaparte was podesta (chief magistrate) of that city. In 1404, a descendant and namesake of the podesta was plenipotentiary from Florence, at the court of Gabriel Visconti, duke of Milan; and he married a niece of pope Nicholas VII. His son was ambassador from that pontiff to several foreign courts. Gabriel Bonaparte established himself at Ajaccio, in 1567; and "for several generations, his descendants were successively head of the elders of that city." The name was originally spelled Buonaparte; but Napoleon omitted the u after his first Italian campaign.

the count de Marbœuf (the French commissioner) and count de Narbonne Pelez, who had commanded in Corsica. Carlo Bonaparte's fearless and able advocacy of the cause of the former, made him his friend; and a few years after, when events with which we are imperfectly acquainted had straitened Carlo's circumstances, and caused him to accept the post of assessor to the judicial court of Ajaccio, the count obtained for Napoleon, in 1777, admission to the military school of Brienne, as a king's pensioner. At that time he had an Italian caste of features, of a remarkably dark hue; bright, piercing eyes, and a large head, quite disproportioned to the size of his body. He had been, from a child, rather fond of retirement than sport. This disposition adhered to him; and he applied himself, with great earnestness, to the study of the French language, history, geography, and mathematics; in all of which, especially the latter, he made a great proficiency. In his hours of leisure he occupied himself in cultivating a plot of ground; each scholar at Brienne having, at that period, some land assigned him, to keep as a garden, for his own use.

There is no doubt that there was something remarkable in Napoleon Bonaparte, and that he displayed a genius for command at a very early period. He was the second son of Carlo, Joseph being the eldest; but his uncle Lucien, who was archdeacon of Ajaccio, when on his death-bed, designated him, in the presence of his brothers, as "the chief of the family." At Brienne, in the winter of 1783-'4, long remembered for its severity, when the school-grounds were covered to a great depth with snow, young Napoleon proposed to his schoolfellows to dig trenches, and throw up fortifications with the snow, and laid down a regular plan of attack and defence; being, on his own offer, acknowledged and obeyed as the leader of the attacking party.

His proficiency in mathematics led to his being selected, in 1784, for the military school at Paris, although he had not attained the age at which scholars are usually admitted to that establishment. The next year he passed his examination successfully, and obtained his first commission as second lieutenant to the artillery regiment of La Fère, then forming part of the garrison at Grenoble. He was soon after promoted to the rank of first lieutenant in the artillery regiment of Grenoble, stationed at Valence. There he made the acquaintance of M. de Montalivet, who, years after, became his minister of the interior; and there he appears first to have felt the tender passion. He visited at the house of madame Colombier, who had a beautiful daughter. A mutual passion sprung up between the young couple; but the mother of the lady would not sanction the marriage of her daughter with a poor lieutenant of artillery. They parted; and when they met again, mademoiselle Colombier had become the wife of a private gentleman, M. de Bressieux; and her first lover was emperor of France! Napoleon did not forget "auld lang syne:" he gave distinguished employment to the husband; and made the wife lady of honour to one of his sisters. While at Valence, Napoleon showed that he had talents for other pursuits besides military ones; and that politics and social economy had formed the subject of his study in his leisure hours. The abbé Raynal proposed a question for discussion—"What are the principles and institutions by which mankind can obtain the greatest possible happiness?" Napoleon wrote a paper in answer to this question, and gained the prize,* which the academy of France had offered for the best essay on the subject.

When the French revolution broke out, Napoleon was at Valence with his regiment. He took the popular side; and yet he did not approve of the popular excesses. He was at Paris in 1792, and witnessed the attack on the Tuileries in that year. On that occasion, he exclaimed, "How could they allow those despicable wretches to enter the palace! Why, a few discharges of grapeshot amongst them would have made them all take to their heels; they would be running yet, at this moment." He was also a witness of the scenes of August 10th, after which he went with his family to Corsica. Paoli, who had been appointed to the chief command of the island by the king and the national assembly, gave him the command of a battalion of guards. When, disgusted with the excesses of the convention, Paoli renounced his obedience to that body, called upon his countrymen to throw off the yoke of France, and gave his adhesion to the English, Napoleon adhered to his former faith, and joined the French troops under La Combe St. Michel and Saliceti.† The English were successful; and, in May, 1793, Napoleon left the island, taking his mother and sisters with him, his father being dead. Soon after his arrival at Paris, he was, on the recommendation of Saliceti, appointed to command the artillery at Toulon; and to his strategic skill it was owing, that that important port was recovered from the allies.

After the events of the 9th and 10th of November (18th and 19th Brumaire), although there were three consuls, appointed provisionally, assisted by the "legislative commission," consisting of fifty members, twenty-five being chosen from each of the two councils—the council of ancients, and the council of five hundred—Bonaparte really became the ruler of France. Sièyes and Roger-Ducos were already settled in the palace of the Luxembourg. Bonaparte was living with Josephine, in a small house in the Rue de la Victoire. He left that residence, and took up his abode in the apartments of the Petit-Luxembourg. “There,” as we are informed by M. Thiers, “in proximity to his two colleagues, surrounded by the fragments of the late government, and the elements of the new one, he fell to work, with that unerring and rapid intelligence, and with that extraordinary activity, which had always marked his operations in the field.” The three consuls met on the 11th of November, to consider the steps most necessary to be taken to consolidate the new system. “Who is to preside?” asked Sièyes; his own age pointing him out as the proper president. “The general will take the chair, as a matter of course,” said Ducos. From that moment Bonaparte’s authority was confirmed. “We have a master,” said Sièyes, the same evening, to some friends, “who knows how to do everything, who can do everything, and who will do everything.”

* Las Casas. When emperor, Napoleon happened to mention this circumstance to Talleyrand, who searched in the archives of the academy, and found the MS. He presented it to the emperor, who read a few pages, and then threw it into the fire. No copy of it remains.

† In a modern publication, it is said, that in the early part of his career, Bonaparte endeavoured to obtain a commission in the English service. But this step is so at variance with his conduct and opinions, that we must be excused for not crediting the statement.

The first consideration of the consuls was to form a ministry. After some discussion, it was determined to continue Cambacérès as minister of justice, Fouché as minister of police; and M. de Reinhart minister of foreign affairs, till Talleyrand could be safely appointed to that post, which it was deemed he could not be at the time; “the revolutionary party,” as the friends of the late directory were termed, entertaining great animosity against him. His appointment, however, was not long withheld; for he succeeded to the office in a fortnight. General Berthier was appointed minister of war; M. Forfait minister of marine; the portfolio of the ministry of the interior was entrusted to M. de la Place; and that of the financial department to M. Guadin. M. Maret was appointed secretary to the consuls, with the title of secretary of state. Some alterations were made in the military commands. General Lefebvre, who had heartily supported Bonaparte on the 10th of November, was retained at the head of the 17th military division, and in command of Paris. The armies of the Rhine and Helvetia were ordered to be united, and the command given to general Moreau. Massena was sent to Italy, and general Lannes, one of Bonaparte’s most devoted adherents, to Toulouse.

No sooner were these appointments made, than the state of the finances came under consideration. The forced loan set on foot by the directory, was suppressed, greatly to the satisfaction of the people; in place of it, as a war-supply, an addition of twenty-five per cent. was made to the principal of the land-tax, the tax on movable property, and the personal tax. Some other financial measures were adopted; and Bonaparte, at the instance of M. Guadin, entered into direct communication with the bankers of Paris, who made an immediate advance of 12,000,000 francs to the new government, to be repaid out of the first receipts of the war-supply. This step greatly strengthened the hands of the consuls.

Those officials seemed disposed to exercise their authority with great clemency. They proposed to the legislative commission, the repeal of the “law of hostages,” as it was called, which made the relatives of the Vendéans and Chouans responsible for acts committed by those adherents of the Bourbons in the revolted provinces. Under this law many persons had been imprisoned. No opposition was made to its repeal; and Bonaparte went himself, and liberated the prisoners in the Temple. The priests and other persons, who had been imprisoned for not taking the oaths to the former constitution, and many emigrants, who had been shipwrecked and thrown into prison, with other political prisoners, were liberated by Bonaparte; as were some representatives and journalists, who had been condemned to deportation. Not fewer than 9,000 persons, whom the directory had incarcerated, were thus set free, to the great joy of themselves and their friends. Showing the most generous leniency to the foes of the directory, Bonaparte was at first inclined to be severe with their friends. To this he was prompted, it is believed, more by the representations of Sièyes and Roger-Ducos, who were joined by several of the ministers, than by his own inclination; and those representations were strengthened by some attempts at resistance to the provisional government. Thirty-eight members of “the revolutionary party” were doomed to transportation, and eighteen to imprisonment at La Rochelle. Talleyrand and others, however, interposed against this measure of severity; and Cambacérès shortly after reporting that order was re-established in all the departments, and the laws everywhere executed and obeyed, the decrees of transportation and imprisonment were recalled, and the parties were placed for a short time under surveillance; but even that was soon discontinued. A negotiation was then opened with the chiefs of the royalist party, and a suspension of arms was concluded with messieurs de Bourmont, D’Autichamp, and De Chatillon, for the Vendée and a part of Britany. On the subject of religion, the consuls evinced a very different feeling from that which had influenced the ruling powers of the republic before their time. They ordered the churches to be reopened for public worship, and gradually undid all that the Hébertists had been doing. Still further to win the support of the Roman catholics, forming the bulk of the nation, they ordered solemn funereal honours to be performed for pope Pius VI., who had died at Valence six months previously, and been privately interred. They also ordered a monument to be erected to his memory. Besides attending, with his colleagues, to these matters of domestic administration, Bonaparte applied himself to foreign affairs. Of all the powers of Europe, Prussia and Spain only were at peace with France; but the czar of Russia seemed very much disposed to give up the friendship of England for that of her enemy; at the same time that he felt disgusted with Austria, as he attributed to the untimely withdrawal of her troops, the defeat of Suwarrow at Zurich. Bonaparte took steps to strengthen his alliance with Prussia, from which he expected one with Russia might arise. He dispatched his aide-de-camp, Duroc, to Berlin, on a complimentary mission; and there being only a chargé d'affaires, M. Otto, at the Prussian capital, he assigned that official another post, and replaced him by general Beurnonville, as ambassador. He sent a fresh ambassador, M. Alquier, to Spain; at the same time replacing M. Grouvelle, at Copenhagen, who was a supporter of the directory, by M. Bourgoing, a friend of his own. He further conciliated Denmark, by liberating a number of Danish vessels, detained by order of the directory in French ports, because, in the opinion of M. Barras and his colleagues, they had yielded to the English the rights of maritime neutrality.

Whilst general Bonaparte was taking an active part—in fact, the active part—in the government of the country, his colleague, Sièyes, was busily engaged in drawing up a constitution. He completed the document, which ultimately formed the basis of the new government. But it had one provision, which met with general disapprobation. With a senate, tribunate, and council for legislative purposes, the abbé proposed, that the executive power should be nominally vested in an officer, whom he termed the “grand elector,” with an appointment for life. He was to reside in the palace of Versailles, have a guard of 3,000 men, and a salary of 6,000,000 francs per annum. Various honours were proposed to be conferred on this official: but he was to have no power; that was to be lodged in two consuls, one for peace and one for war; the former to have under him the ministers of justice, of the interior, and of finances; the latter those of war and marine. It is said, that Sièyes destined the sinecure of grand elector for himself; and Bonaparte, and perhaps Cambacérès, for the consulships of war and peace. But Bonaparte disapproved of his constitution.* He summoned the legislative commissions to the Luxembourg; and, with their assistance, remodelled the laboured production of his colleague; so that, retaining the public bodies proposed by M. Sièyes, it still carried out his own views, which were much more despotic than those of the abbé. The latter would have made the senate, tribunate, and council really representative bodies, with complete legislative power. This did not suit Bonaparte, who aimed at the highest place, and wanted to centre all power, legislative and executive, as much as possible, in himself. The constitution he ultimately caused to be adopted, was in form complex, in operation simple. It consisted of executive and legislative authorities; the former vested in three consuls, the latter in a council of state, a senate, a tribunate, and a legislative body. The number of the council of state was not fixed; the members were to be nominated by the first consul. The senate was to consist, at first, of sixty members, appointed by the consuls for life; and those members were, every year, to appoint two more, till the number reached eighty. The tribunate was to consist of a hundred members, not less than twenty-five years of age, and one-fifth to be changed annually. The legislative body was to have 300 members, of thirty years of age, or upwards, and one-fifth was also to be renewed every year. The two latter bodies were to be elected by the senate, out of the lists of the communal, departmental, and national “notabilities:” i. e., citizens who were possessed of certain qualifications, pecuniary or otherwise. The right of citizenship was extended to “every man born and resident in France, who was twenty-one years of age, and had his name entered on the civic register of his commune arrondissement, and who had remained one year in the territory of the republic,” which was declared to be “one and indivisible” in the first clause of the constitution. The members of the council of state were to receive salaries of 25,000 francs, and the presidents of its different sections, 35,000 francs; those of the senate were to have 25,000 francs per annum; those of the tribunate, 15,000 francs; and those of the legislative body, 10,000 francs. Bonaparte was declared first consul; his power to continue for ten years, and he was eligible for re-election. Sièyes and Roger-Ducos declined the office of consul; and they were appointed senators. M. Cambacérès and M. Lebrun became the second and third consuls. The salaries of these officers were fixed at 500,000 francs (£20,000) for the first; and 150,000 francs (£6,000) for the second and third. The two latter were to retain their office only five years, but might be re-chosen. The mode in which the affairs of government were to be conducted was, that the executive power was vested in the consuls, who were also

to determine what laws should be proposed. Those laws were to be communicated, through the council of state, to the tribunate, where they were to be discussed, and, if adopted, transmitted to the legislative body, three of the tribunes attending, to explain their provisions and recommend their adoption. No discussion was to be allowed amongst the legislators, who were to vote upon the law in secret. If they confirmed it, it was then to be promulgated to the people. The senate was to exercise a controlling power over both the tribunate and the legislative body, and prevent them from violating the constitution. Besides these provisions, which, however objectionable, were of a constitutional character, the 93rd article prohibited the return to France of those Frenchmen who had abandoned their country since July 14th, 1789, and declared, that the property of the emigrants should be irrevocably forfeited, for the advantage of the republic. The last article (the 94th) provided, that the constitution should be immediately presented to the people for their acceptance.

The legislative commissioners did not accept this constitution very willingly; indeed, had they, at last, been convened in a body, it is probable they would have refused it. But Bonaparte, who knew that the commissioners intended to attack it in various parts, summoned them to give their signatures to it individually; and, thus left to act for and by himself, each was induced, by fear or persuasion, to affix his name to the document. To test the opinions of the people, registers were opened at the secretariat of each administration, and at other places, and the juges de paix and notaries were also authorised to receive the signatures to the placet or non-placet. The consuls collected the votes, and proclaimed the number. The result was, that, out of 3,012,569 votes registered, there were 3,011,007 for accepting the constitution, and only 1,562 for rejecting it. On the 24th of December, 1799, the constitution was solemnly proclaimed. The palace of the Tuileries was then assigned to the consuls; the Luxembourg to the senate; the Palais-Royal to the tribunate; and the palace of the five hundred to the legislative body. At the same time all the festivals of the republic were abolished, except that of the 14th of July, the anniversary of the destruction of the Bastille; and of the 10th of August, the day of the foundation of the republic. The constitution was issued to the people by the following decree:—

“CITIZENS!—The constitution, now promulgated, puts an end to the uncertainty caused by the provisional government in the external relations, and in the internal and military situation of the republic. It places in the institutions which it establishes the first magistrates, whose devotedness has appeared necessary to its activity. The constitution is founded on the true principles of representative government, on the sacred rights of property, of equality, and of liberty. The powers which it institutes will be strong and stable, as they must be, in order to guarantee the rights of the citizens and the interests of the state. Citizens! The revolution is confined to the principles which commenced it. IT IS FINISHED!”

The constitution—distinguished as that of the year VIII.—was ordered to be put in force in the first days of January, 1800; and, as a tribute of gratitude to M. Sièyes, to whom France owed the framework of her new government, the first consul caused it to be proposed to the legislative commission, that the estate of Crosne, in the department of Seine-et-Oise, should be bestowed upon him. “This gift was decreed and announced to M. Sièyes with the noblest expressions of public gratitude. M. Sièyes was highly gratified; for, notwithstanding an incontestable probity, he had a relish for the indulgences of fortune, and he could not but be touched, also, by the dignified and delicate manner in which this national recompense was bestowed on him.”* From this time “this celebrated metaphysician disappeared as a political person, and became, to use his own expression, absorbed in the pursuits of epicurean indulgences, which he covered with a veil of mystery.”†

No time was lost in organising the new government, so that it might come into operation at the time appointed. The council of state was nominated on the 24th of December. It was divided into five sections:—1st. Finance. 2nd. Civil and criminal legislation. 3rd. War. 4th. Marine. 5th. Interior. And it became, in a short time, not a merely administrative, but a governing body. Amongst the members were—in the 1st section, MM. Defernon (president), Duchâtel, Devaisnes, and Dufresne. 2nd. MM. Boulay de la Meurthe (president), Berlier, and Real. 3rd. MM. Brune (president), Lacuée, and Marmont. 4th. MM. Ganteaume (president), De Champigny, and Fleurien. 5th. MM. Rœderer (president), Cretet, Chaptol, Regnault St. Jean-d’Angely, and Fourcroy. The same day the consuls nominated twenty-nine senators—Sièyes and Roger-Ducos, the two ex-consuls, making thirty-one. The list had been previously prepared, and included the names of MM. Berthollet, Laplace (late minister of the interior), Monge, Tracy, Volney, Cabanis, Kellermann, Garat, and Lacipède. The next day these bodies met for the first time, and the twenty-nine additional members of the senate were appointed; making up the number of sixty. The additional list contained the following distinguished names:—MM. Lagrange, Darcet, François de Neufchâteau, Daubenton, Bougainville, Perregaux (the banker), and De Choiseul Praslin. The following days were occupied in selecting the members of the tribunate and the legislative body. There were numerous applications—the Luxembourg being besieged with the aspirants for the not ill-paid offices. The Moniteur, of the 27th of December, thus alluded to them:—"Since the constitution has created a number of well-paid posts, how many people are in a stir! How many faces, little known, are anxious to show themselves! How many forgotten names are again wriggling under the dust of the revolution! How many haughty republicans of the year VIII. are humbling themselves, that they may reach the ear of the man of power, who can provide for them! What numbers of Brutuses are soliciting appointments! How many men of slender abilities are extolled to the skies! What trifling services are exaggerated! How many bloody spots are hidden from sight! This wonderful change of scene has taken place in a moment. Let us hope that the hero of liberty—he who hitherto has only distinguished himself in the revolution by conferring benefits—will view these manœuvres with the disgust which they excite in every noble mind, and that he will not tolerate the attempt of a crowd of disreputable individuals to shroud themselves under the rays of his glory." Personally, the hero of liberty here alluded to (Bonaparte) had nothing to do with the appointments to the tribunate and the legislative body; but the council of state and the senate, who made them, were little more than his nominees; and, doubtless, they took care not to nominate any persons who were adverse to his views.

He had already, as M. Thiers remarks, "effected much since his return from Egypt. He had overthrown the directory, and acquired an authority, apparently inferior, but, in reality, superior, to that of a constitutional monarch. But he had only just possessed himself of that authority; and it yet remained for him to legitimatise its assumption by measures of utility and great actions. He had still an immense deal to accomplish; and his first attempts at re-organisation were only one effort. It was thus far successful, no doubt; but it still left the country exposed to great disorder and deep suffering. There were still poverty in the treasury, privation in the armies; the flame of civil war in the Vendée; hesitation on the part of the neutral powers; and a determination truly obstinate, on the part of the belligerents, to continue the war. Still, that assumption of power, succeeding his early toils, and preceding the immense task which he felt the confidence of ere long accomplishing, charmed his ambitious soul." That task was the subjugation of all Europe to his dominant will, and making France supreme among nations; and he would have accomplished it, but for what M. Thiers terms the "obstinacy" of England, which power alone continued, from first to last, a steady and disinterested opposition to his schemes of aggrandisement; and at length enabled France and the continent to throw off the yoke, though the misconduct, prejudices, and evil counsel of those for whom she fought, neutralised or destroyed most of the advantages which might have been attained.

One of the earliest steps taken by the first consul after the council of state and the senate were organised, was, it is said by the advice of Talleyrand, to address letters to the king of Great Britain and the emperor of Germany, making overtures of peace. It is only fair to the memory of Bonaparte that those documents should be given verbatim. The following is that addressed to the monarch of these realms:—

"Paris, 6th of Nivôse, year VIII. (Dec. 26th, 1799).

"Bonaparte, first consul of the republic, to his majesty, the king of Great Britain and Ireland.

"Sire,—Called by the wishes of the French nation to occupy the first station in the republic, I think it proper, in entering upon my office, to make a direct communication to your majesty. Is the war, which for eight years has ravaged the four quarters of the globe, destined to be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding? How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, stronger and more powerful than is necessary for their safety and independence, sacrifice, to vain ideas of greatness, the blessings of commerce, internal prosperity, and domestic happiness? How can they help feeling that peace is the first of wants, as well as the first of glories! These sentiments cannot be new to the heart of your majesty, who rules over a free nation, with the sole aim to render it happy. In this overture your majesty will see only my sincere desire to contribute efficaciously, for the second time, to the general pacification, by a prompt procedure, entirely confidential, and divested of those forms which, necessary perhaps for disguising the dependence of weak states, betray only, in those that are powerful, a mutual desire to deceive. France and England may, by the abuse of their strength, for a long time to come, retard its utter exhaustion, for the misfortune of all other nations: but, I dare assert, that the fate of all civilised nations is concerned in the termination of a war, the flames of which are raging throughout the world."

The letter to the emperor of Germany ran as follows:—

"Sire,—On returning to Europe, after an absence of eighteen months, I find the war re-kindled between your majesty and the French republic. The French nation has called me to fill the post of chief magistrate. A stranger to vain glory, the first of my wishes is to stop the effusion of that blood which is about to be shed. Everything forebodes, that, in the next campaign, numerous and ably-directed armies will, in the event of the resumption of hostilities, triple the number of victims hitherto sacrificed. The known character of your majesty leaves me no doubt as to the wishes of your heart. If that wish alone is consulted, I see the possibility of reconciling the interests of the two nations. In the communications which I have previously had with your majesty, you have personally testified some regard for me. I request you to consider the step which I am taking as proceeding from a desire to make a return for it, and to convince you, more and more, of the very high respect which I entertain for your majesty.

(Signed) "BONAPARTE,

"First Consul of the French Republic."

Whilst awaiting replies to these notes, Bonaparte ordered all the diplomatic agents accredited to friendly or to neutral powers, to repair to their posts. He instituted arms of honour; and decreed that, in future, "for every brilliant action, a musket of honour should be presented to the infantry; a carabine of honour to the cavalry; grenades of honour to the artillery; and swords of honour to officers of all ranks." He took active steps to follow up the suspension of arms in the Vendée by a treaty of peace, which, chiefly through the influence of the abbé Bernier, curé of St. Laud, was concluded on the 18th of January, 1800; when M. d'Autichamp, a distinguished Vendean leader, agreed, on behalf of the province, to lay down arms and make complete submission, the government stipulating to grant a full amnesty, to respect public worship, to suspend or remit taxes in the ravaged provinces, and to exclude the chiefs from the list of emigrants. The first consul also appointed his brother Lucien to succeed Laplace (who had been nominated a member of the senate) as minister of the interior; and M. Abrial to succeed the second consul, Cambacérès, as minister of justice. He convoked the senate, the tribunate, and the legislative body, which assembled on the 1st of January, 1800; and chose M. Sièyes, M. Daunon, and M. Perrin, of Vosges, respectively as their presidents. Numerous projets de loi were soon sent from the council of state to these bodies, all of which, except the tribunate, appeared disposed to take the mot d'ordre from the first consul. That body contained a few members who wished to be independent; and as early as the 2nd and 3rd of January, some angry debates took place, which caused the first consul to conceive an aversion for that branch of the legislature which could not be overcome.

The answer of earl Grenville, the British minister of foreign affairs, to the note of the 26th of December, was received early in January. It was dated on the 4th of that month (the 15th of Nivôse), and was much longer than the document to which it replied. "The king," wrote his lordship, "has given frequent proofs of his sincere desire for the re-establishment of secure and permanent tranquillity in Europe. He neither is, nor has been, engaged in any contest for a vain and false glory. He has had no other view than that of maintaining, against all aggression, the rights and happiness of his subjects. For these he has contended against an unprovoked attack; and for the same objects he is still obliged to contend. Nor can he hope that this necessity would be removed, by entering at the present moment into a negotiation with those whom a fresh revolution has so recently placed in the exercise of power in France, since no real advantage can arise from such negotiation, to the great and desirable object of a general peace, until it shall distinctly appear that those causes have ceased to operate which originally produced the war." The noble earl proceeded to demonstrate, that the causes arose out of the desire for "the extermination of all established governments," to promote which, "the resources of France had, from year to year, in the midst of the most unparalleled distress, been lavished and exhausted." He showed how, "to this indiscriminate spirit of destruction, the Netherlands, the United Provinces, the Swiss Cantons, his majesty's ancient allies, had been successively sacrificed;" whilst "Germany had been ravaged, and Italy had been made the scene of unbounded anarchy and rapine." Even "his majesty himself had been compelled to maintain an arduous and burdensome contest for the independence and existence of his kingdom." While such a system continued to prevail, any attempt to re-establish peace would be useless. His majesty would greatly rejoice if it should appear that the dangers to which he and his allies had been so long exposed had ceased, and that "better principles had ultimately prevailed in France." Though "the best and most natural pledge of the reality and permanence" of such a change "would be, the restoration of that line of princes which, for so many centuries, maintained the French nation in prosperity at home, and respect and consideration abroad;" yet, "desirable as such an event must be both to France and the world, it was not to that mode, exclusively, that his majesty limited the possibility of secure and solid pacification. His majesty made no claim to prescribe to France what should be the form of her government, or in whose hands she should vest the authority necessary for conducting the affairs of a great and powerful nation. He looked only to the security of his own dominions and those of his allies, and to the general safety of Europe." Whenever it appeared that such security and safety could in any manner be obtained, "his majesty would eagerly embrace the opportunity to concert with his allies the means of a general pacification." At present there was "no sufficient evidence of the principles upon which the new government" of France "would be directed, no reasonable ground by which to judge of its stability." On the 7th of January, before, we should think, lord Grenville's letter could have been received, a decree of the consuls appeared, ordering the formation of an army of reserve, to be composed of all discharged veterans then unemployed; and a levy of 30,000 conscripts to be made from those liable to serve in the next year.

The reply of Austria was dated eleven days later than that of England; and, as its substance and tendency were the same as those of the English note, a copy of lord Grenville's despatch was probably sent to Vienna. M. Talleyrand, in his answer to that despatch, denied that France had provoked the war, which sprung from an opposite quarter; for "as soon as the French revolution had broken out, almost all Europe entered into a league for its destruction;" and "it was to the projects of dismemberment, subjection, and dissolution, prepared against her, and the execution of which was several times attempted and pursued, that France had a right to impute the evils which she had suffered, and those which had afflicted Europe." If the wishes of his Britannic majesty, however, were for peace, "why, instead of seeking an apology for the war, should not attention be paid to the means of terminating it?" It was proposed to England, that negotiators should meet at Dunkirk, or some other place, to consider those means. To Austria, the first consul offered to negotiate on the terms of the treaty of Campo Formio. To which M. Thugut, the Austrian foreign minister, replied, that the treaty had been violated as soon as concluded; and that its terms were not capable of satisfying, at that time, the claims and pretensions of the belligerent powers; and intimated that Austria would not enter into negotiations to which England was not a party. Further despatches were interchanged; but the French government could not hold out sufficient proofs, either of its sincerity or its stability, to induce either the British or the Austrian ministry, at that time, to open negotiations. The correspondence was, however, important and valuable, as showing the object which those governments had in view. "This was not," as a modern historian observes, "to claim a right to interfere in the internal affairs of France, or to dictate to her inhabitants the form of government or race of sovereigns they were to choose;" the sole object of the war was self-defence: it "was undertaken not to impose a government upon France, but to prevent her from imposing governments on other nations;" and to oppose a barrier to those infidel and democratical principles, by which "the republic first shook the opinions of the multitude in all neighbouring states; and then, having divided the inhabitants, overthrew their independence."*

Whatever might be the opinion at the time, it is now known that Bonaparte was not sincere in his wish to put an end to those hostilities, which he rightly described as having spread their flames throughout the world. In after-years, he told Las Casas and others, that he had no serious intention of concluding peace. "I had then," said he, "need of war; a treaty of peace, which would have derogated from that of Campo Formio, and annulled the creations of Italy, would have withered every imagination. Mr. Pitt's answer, accordingly, was impatiently expected. When it arrived, it filled me with a secret satisfaction. His answer could not have been more favourable. From that moment I foresaw that, with such impassioned antagonists, I could have no difficulty in reaching the highest destinies." Under the circumstances, the allies were justified in not negotiating with a newly established power, which might have been overturned at any moment; but knowing what we do now, it appears that they would rather have promoted their own interests than those of Bonaparte, by accepting his offers to treat, and by endeavouring to bring the war to a conclusion.

The negotiations with England and Austria extended into March. Whilst these were going on, Bonaparte was very active himself in directing and superintending the affairs of government; and he took care that others should not be idle. He placed the matters connected with law and jurisprudence in the hands of the second consul, Cambacérès; and that of the financial department was entrusted to Lebrun: all the rest—war, marine, interior, foreign relations—he took himself. He continued, for a time, the lenient measures with which he had inaugurated the consulate; but he very early showed himself no friend to the liberty of the press. In January, a decree appeared, signed by him as first consul; in which it was stated, that "the consuls, considering that some of the journals printed at Paris were instruments in the hands of the enemies of the republic, had ordered the minister of police to limit the number of journals published during the continuance of the war." The decree named the journals which were to be continued†—that privilege depending upon their not "inserting articles derogatory to the respect due to the institutions of the country, the sovereignty of the people, and the glory of the French arms; or offensive to the governments which were the friends and allies of France, even if such articles were copied from foreign journals." Any violation of this regulation involved the immediate suppression of the offending journal. Theatrical compositions were placed under the censorship of the minister of the interior, as were all books. The Moniteur was declared to be the only official journal—a distinction it has retained under every change of government.

* These negotiations formed the subject of debate in both houses of the British parliament. The conduct of the British ministry was severely censured by the opposition in both houses; but motions condemnatory of that policy and conduct, were negatived, in the Lords by a majority of 74 to 6; and in the Commons by 265 to 74.

† These were the Moniteur Universel, the Journal des Debats, the Journal de Paris, the Bien-Informé, the Publiciste, the Ami des Lois, the Clef du Cabinet, the Citoyen Français, the Gazette de France, the Journal des Hommes Libres, the Journal du Soir, the Journal des Défenseurs de la Patrie, and the Decade Philosophique.

A new plan was formed, under the auspices of the first consul, which reorganised the interior of the republic for administrative purposes. The principal power in the departments had been vested in departmental councils, elected by the primary assemblies of the people. These councils were abolished, and the system of prefectures introduced, at the head of which was a prefect appointed by the executive. He was removable at pleasure, and corresponded directly with the minister of the interior. The taxation of the departments, and its distribution amongst the various communes, was settled by a council-general, convoked in each department once a year; its members (who received no salary) being appointed, and the meetings called, by the government. Another body, a council of prefecture, in each department, heard and decided all disputes on the part of the taxpayers. Over each commune there was a maire, and a municipal council, nominated by the prefect. "Thus a complete gradation of power was established; all depending on the executive, or in other words, on the first consul."—The judicial system was also reorganised. Throughout the country, the judges in the civil and criminal courts were elected by the people, for five years only; Bonaparte substituted judges, appointed by himself, for life. He also gave a juge de paix to each commune; a tribunal de premiere instance (something like our magisterial petty sessions) to every arrondissement; a criminal court to every department; twenty-nine courts of appeal to as many principal towns; and a court of cassation for all France was appointed to sit at Paris.* The trial by jury was retained; but a power was given to the prefect to interfere in, and regulate, the choice of jurors. The police was reorganised, and rendered more effective. The charge of the police in the arrondissements (answering to our hundreds) was given to the maires and their assistants; but in Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, Bordeaux, and other large towns, a commissary-general of police (termed in Paris the prefect of police) was placed, who had commissaries under him; and all received their orders from the minister of police, who had the gendarmerie also at his disposal. These arrangements were embodied in bills, drawn up under the eye of the first consul, and transmitted, through the council of state, to the tribunate and the legislative body, by whom they were adopted by large majorities. With respect to the police, however, the first consul did not stop with the foregoing regulations. He organised a secret police, of which Junot was the first director. The reports from this body were made direct to Bonaparte; and it was a watch upon, and a check over, the minister of police himself.—These arrangements form the basis of the present departmental, judicial, and police systems of France.

Simultaneously with these legislative measures, and the successful efforts to pacify the Vendée (before alluded to), a decided attempt was made to crush the insurrectionary movements which still continued in Britany and Normandy, where the Chouans—"that is," says Thiers, "men whom insurrection had habituated to plunder, and who could not do without it"—had fled, under Georges Cadoudal and other Vendean leaders. At first these men rejected all attempts to induce them to submit; and on the 21st of January (2nd of Pluviôse), general Chabot marched into the centre of Britany, attacked and defeated a band of 4,000 Chouans under M. Bourmont, and so disheartened that leader, that he yielded, and gave up his arms on the 24th. The general of the republic then marched upon Rennes; and on the 25th, two divisions of his army, under generals Harty and Gency, having seized a convoy of flour and cattle belonging to the insurgents, were escorting it towards Vannes, when they were attacked by a party of Georges' men, who attempted to retake the convoy. There was a desperate fight, which ended in the complete defeat and flight of the Chouans, 400 of whom were slain. On the 27th, another party sustained a defeat near Hennebon, losing 300 men. This appears to have annihilated the hopes of the royalists. An English 80-gun ship and some frigates were off the coast; the English government having been induced to send a force there, at the instance of several leading emigrants, who represented the entire country to be in arms. Some of these emigrants were landed in boats from the squadron; and when they found that everything was going against them, they got back with difficulty. Unfortunately, misled by the representations of these men, the ministry at London had sent to Georges 20,000 muskets and twenty pieces of cannon. He had scarcely got them into his possession, when the defeats just mentioned—

* This court already existed in another form. The president of the old court was M. Target, who refused to defend Louis XVI. When engaged in the formation of the new court, Bonaparte told Bourrienne that he could not reappoint Target, but would make Tronchet president, who so nobly performed that perilous duty which Target had declined. This was not the only mark of sympathy he evinced for the royalists.

and the successes of generals Gardanne and Chambarlhac in Lower Normandy, where they had gone in pursuit of count de Frotte, who in valour, determination, and zeal for the royalist cause, was a second Georges—obliged that chief to submit; and the arms landed by the English fell into the hands of the republicans shortly after. Most of the leaders had interviews with the first consul, and all accepted his amnesty, and remained in France, except Cadoudal. His interview with Bonaparte lasted some time; and many inducements were held out to him to join the republican banner. He refused; and as soon as he quitted the Luxembourg, he set out for England. He had M. Hyde de Neuville for the companion of his journey; and, "several times, when giving his fellow-traveller an account of this interview, he exclaimed, showing his vigorous arms, 'What a blunder I committed in not strangling that fellow!'"

In these affairs with the royalists, there appears only one blot upon the republican escutcheon, and that was a foul one. Count de Frotte, seeing that the cause of royalty was for that time lost, wrote a letter to general Gardanne, before the submission of M. Bourmont and the other chiefs had taken place, proposing a general pacification of the Chouans. The negotiation was tediously prolonged, and the term proposed for its continuance by the royalists had expired; but the count apprehended no danger. He had, however, whilst the negotiation was in progress, written a violent letter to an aide-de-camp of the republican general. For this, as soon as the term for treating expired, he was seized, and several officers with him; brought before a military tribunal, and condemned to be shot. They died as heroically as they had lived;—an order, sent by the first consul (at the instance of Bourrienne) for their pardon, arriving too late. Many of the other chiefs took office under Bonaparte, who made the abbé Bernier (who had been instrumental in obtaining the suspension of arms in the Vendée, as well as the final pacification of the revolted provinces) bishop of Orleans.

No enemies being left in the field at home, and the war still raging abroad, the first consul turned his thoughts to taking a personal share in the campaign, although the law forbade his doing so. Before he made any arrangement for its opening, he resolved to close the session of the tribunate; in which body, notwithstanding the opposition of Benjamin Constant and a few others, he had secured a good majority. With a view to excite a sympathy across the Atlantic, and to enlist the inhabitants of the United States in his cause, he also resolved, about the same time, to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of Washington, the news of whose death on the 14th of December, 1799, was received early in February. In pursuance of this resolution, he issued the following order of the day to the army:—"Washington is dead! That great man fought against tyranny, and he consolidated the independence of his country. His name will ever be dear to the French nation, as to all the free men of both worlds, and especially to the French soldiers, who, like him and his American army, are fighting for equality and liberty."—Ten days' mourning was ordered in the army; black crape was suspended from the tricoloured flag; and, on the 9th of February (21st of Pluviôse), the day the session was closed, the military were assembled at the Invalides. There general Lannes presented to Berthier, the minister at war, the colours taken in Egypt; then an oration was pronounced in favour of Washington, by M. Fontanes; and then, black crape being suspended from all the colours, France was declared to be in mourning for the founder of the American republic. What a mockery was this!—to be organised by the man who had already laid violent hands upon the liberty, and was even then concerting measures for the destruction of the republic, of France.

This ceremony was shortly followed by another—the installation of the consuls in the Tuileries, which took place on the 18th of February (the 30th of Pluviôse). After that palace was allotted to the consuls in December, it had to undergo considerable repairs; about 600,000 francs being expended upon it. When completed, the consuls, who up to that time had continued to reside at the Luxembourg, left the latter palace in a state carriage drawn by six white horses, which had been presented to Bonaparte by the emperor of Austria, after the conclusion of the treaty of Campo Formio; and the first consul wore a magnificent sword, also a present from that sovereign. This carriage was preceded by a few private coaches, but more hired ones, containing the ministers, the members of the council of state, and public authorities, all in full costume, as were the consuls themselves. The cortège was escorted by the troops, their bands playing as they passed along. Bonaparte, as soon as he arrived, rushed up the grand staircase of the palace, and looked around him for a few minutes with the air of a man who had just completed some great achievement. He then returned to the court, and reviewed the troops; after which he received the ministers and the officers of the various departments. Three days after, his first diplomatic levée was held, at which ambassadors from Spain, Rome, and the new Batavian, Helvetic, Ligurian, and Cisalpine republics; and the ministers of Prussia, Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, Baden, and Hesse Cassel, were present.

Although the palace of the Tuileries was appropriated to the three consuls, only two took up their residence there—Bonaparte and Le

Brun; the latter being lodged in what was termed the Pavilion of Flora. But Cambacérès would not consent to abide in the "palace of kings." He is reported to have said to his colleague Le Brun—"It would be wrong for us to go and live in the Tuileries; it is not a fitting place for us; and, for my part, I will not go. General Bonaparte will soon want to live there alone; and then we should have to move out. 'Tis much better not to go there at all." Cambacérès was right; and he was also awake to his own interest. On his application for another residence, a handsome house in the Place du Carrousel was assigned to him, which he retained till Bonaparte had to leave France. As to that general himself, he no doubt thought he was established in the palace of the sovereigns of France for life. A day or two after he had removed there, he said to his secretary—"Well, Bourrienne, here we are in the Tuileries, and here we must stay now." Up to that time, the first consul's decrees, and other documents, still bore at the head the emblems adopted during the republic—of a female seated, and clad in ancient drapery; with the legend, "Republique Française, Souveraineté du Peuple;" to which was added, "Bonaparte, premier consul." This legend was soon altered to that of "Au nom du Peuple Français, Gouvernement, Français;"—the "liberty and sovereignty of the people disappearing in form, as they had long since disappeared, if they could be said to have ever existed, in practice."

Napoleon had scarcely taken possession of the Tuileries, when he received the following letter from Louis XVIII., dated the 20th of February, at Mittau, in Russia:—"Sir,—Whatever may be their apparent conduct, men like you never inspire alarm. You have accepted an eminent station, and I thank you for having done so. You know better than any one, how much strength and power are requisite to secure the happiness of a great nation. Save France from her own violence, and you will fulfil the first wish of my heart. Restore her king to her, and future generations will bless your memory. You will always be too necessary to the state for me ever to be able to discharge, by important appointments, the debt of my family and myself." A second epistle followed this after a lapse of some time, in which Louis said—"As to my principles, I am a Frenchman, merciful by principle, and also by the dictates of reason. You, the victor of Lodi, Castiglione, and Arcole, the conqueror of Italy and Egypt, cannot prefer vain fame to real glory. But you are losing precious time. Together we may ensure the glory of France. I say we, because I can do nothing for France without you, and you cannot secure her happiness without me. General, Europe observes you; glory awaits you; and I long to restore peace to my people." These letters came to the knowledge of Josephine and her daughter Hortense, who were anxious that Bonaparte should, at all events, hold out hopes to the Bourbons. On one occasion, when they had been urging this course upon him, he said to Bourrienne—"These devils of women are mad! The Faubourg St. Germain has turned their heads! But I care not; I will have nothing to do with them. The partisans of the Bourbons are deceived, if they suppose that I am the man to play Monck's part." He did not return any answer to the first letter; but he replied to the second, after a long interval. Having thanked Louis for the civil terms used in his letters, he added:—"You must not think to return to France. You could not do it without trampling over 100,000 dead bodies. Sacrifice your interests to the repose and interests of France, and history will do you justice. I can feel for the misfortunes of your family; and I shall learn, with pleasure, that you are surrounded with all that can contribute to the tranquillity of your retirement."* It would appear that the first consul had great doubts as to the future stability of France, in the event of his dying without children; and anticipated a series of civil wars. But his dread of the emigrants and the priests, whom, he said, "none but a fool would trust," prevented him from countenancing any attempt to restore the Bourbons. If restored, he observed to Bourrienne, "they would think that they had reconquered their inheritance, and would dispose of it as they pleased." His own ambition, also, militated against the wishes of the rightful heirs to the throne. After several conversations with De Bourrienne on these letters, he at last said—"My resolve is taken, therefore let us say no more on the subject. I know that those women plague you. Let them mind their knitting, and leave me to do what is right."

Whilst the first consul was actively engaged in directing the measures we have detailed (and most of them originated with himself), M. T. d'Hauterive, a diplomatist of the old school of Choiseul and Vergennes, who was an employé in the office of foreign affairs, under Talleyrand, was performing the same office for him, which the De la Guéronnières, and others, have so frequently performed for his nephew in the present day: he was preparing a pamphlet, which was, in fact, a manifesto of Bonaparte's policy; and which was published soon after he was established at the Tuileries, where, according to some of his biographers, he was soon thrown into embarrassments by the extravagance of Josephine. This pamphlet was entitled The State of France at the end of the Year VIII. That state was described; and the aim of the first consul's policy was declared to be, to recover for France the political influence which she held and exercised in Europe in the 17th century. The increase of the power, and the development of the resources, of Prussia, Russia, and Austria, since the peace of Westphalia, demanded, according to M. d'Hauterive, a corresponding increase in the power of France; and, as a matter of course, the diminution of the influence and the power of England, which had been greatly augmented by the causes that injured France. "Had the war of the Spanish succession," according to the pamphleteer, "turned out more favourable to France, the maritime system of Europe would have been longer subordinate to the interests of continental politics. Holland and Portugal would have remained independent of England; England herself would not have changed her government; the family of the Stuarts would have been restored; and the English nation, less powerful and less wealthy, would not have made all the states of Europe pay so dearly as they have done, for the advantages which it has derived from its maritime power and commercial prosperity." To counteract the influence of that power and prosperity, a new system of international law, especially as it affected maritime questions, was declared to be necessary; "the basis of the maritime interests of France," was said to be "an alliance with Holland, Spain, and Genoa;" and a new maritime confederation was pointed out, which Turkey, the Barbary States, Naples, Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, and the United States, were invited to join. "France," continued M. d'Hauterive, "has laid the foundation of her federative continental system. The most important conditions of this system are already realised; others depend on the chances of the war, and on the will of the belligerent powers. In this state of uncertainty, France will trust to the energy of its system of warfare, and to its watchfulness in strengthening its maritime federal relations."—The pamphleteer made the following remarks on the French armies and the military talents of the first consul:—"The French armies in the last campaigns, though generally less numerous than those of the enemy, have seldom presented themselves for battle in numbers disproportionate to those opposed to them. In the memorable campaign of Italy, the illustrious general [Bonaparte] was, perhaps, never in any one single battle inferior in numbers to the enemy before him. Constantly accelerating the march of his various corps, and triumphing over time and distance before he tried the chances of a battle, he had already, at the time of action, overcome every difficulty, and had made himself sure of beating the enemy, over whom he had, by his celerity and genius, acquired the advantage of numbers—an advantage the greatest of all in the judgment of men who know that a field of battle is not a theatrical stage; and that the incidents of a combat are neither fictions nor prodigies, but real combinations, skilfully conceived and vigorously executed. These remarks may excite the surprise of the careless observer, but they will not escape the eye of the accurate historian."—After asserting, that "the French had, of late years, brought the art of war to perfection," by "establishing the theatre of war amongst the neighbouring nations; little more than one year's occupation of Italy" alone, having "saved France 160,000,000 of livres"—M. d'Hauterive wound up his pamphlet, by declaring what would be the future policy of France, i.e., of the first consul. "France has just conquered the alliance of Switzerland. If she cannot extend her federative continental system by peaceful means, she will substitute military influence; and, if the princes of Europe will not become her allies, she will force into her alliance those states which are unable to defend themselves, and she will press into her service all their resources for defence and for subsistence. The recent treaties with Holland, Spain, Switzerland, and some Italian states, exhibit our position with regard to our friends and allies. The treaties concluded with Prussia, and indirectly with some of the northern states of Germany, show our position with respect to neutrals. Our late treaties with Austria, and with some princes of Southern Germany, and the events which have occasioned the rupture of those treaties, reveal the position of France with regard to her enemies."—This was the policy which Bonaparte pursued, of establishing a great European confederation, of which France was the head and director; placing as rulers over as many states as he could, his relatives and friends, to render them more subservient to his influence.—The pamphlet of M. d'Hauterive was ably replied to by M. Gentz, a German author, who, in two works, The State of Europe at the end of the 18th Century, and Considerations on the Cause and Character of the actual War against France, clearly demonstrated, that that republic had then claimed a greater increase of territory, influence, and power, than was consistent with the maintenance of that balance of power which it had been the object of all the general European treaties of the 16th and 17th centuries to establish; and that, under the plan of a federal confederation, she really meant to absorb and subjugate all minor states.

THE POWERS ALLIED AGAINST FRANCE; THE ALLIED FORCES; THE FRENCH ARMIES; STEPS TAKEN TO AROUSE THE SPIRIT OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE, AND RECRUIT THE TROOPS; DEPARTURE OF BONAPARTE FOR ITALY; PASSAGE OF THE GREAT ST. BERNARD; FORT BARB; THE CAMPAIGN OF APRIL AND MAY; SIEGE AND SURRENDER OF GENOA; DISCOMFITURE AND RETREAT OF THE AUSTRIANS FROM THE VAR; THE FIRST CONSUL AT MILAN; MOVEMENTS OF THE TWO ARMIES; BATTLE OF MONTEBELLO; BATTLE OF MARENGO; SUSPENSION OF ARMS.

HAVING succeeded in suppressing all signs of insurrection against his authority in France, and carried out those arrangements for the administration of his government at home, which we have noticed in the preceding chapter, the first consul turned his attention more exclusively to foreign affairs and to the prosecution of the war. One of his aims, in connection with the latter object, was to detach the czar of Russia entirely from his alliance with England, towards which power Paul was already much less favourably disposed than his predecessor had been. Several acts of courtesy were interchanged between the authorities of the two nations, the example being set by the French, by order of Bonaparte. The consul himself completely won the heart of Paul by sending home, not only without ransom, but clothed in new Russian uniforms, 7,000 Russian soldiers, who had been made prisoners at Zurich and in Holland. This led to a further interchange of civilities, and to Paul's taking a decided part against Great Britain, before the close of the year.

Still, at the period of which we are now writing (the beginning of March, 1800), Russia nominally formed a part of the triple alliance against France, the other powers being Austria and England. Sweden, Denmark, and Turkey also appeared in the list of the enemies of the republic; and, on the 16th of March, Bavaria entered into the alliance, by a treaty with England, concluded on the part of the British government by Mr. Wickham, then envoy to the German states. By this treaty the elector agreed to furnish 12,000 troops, in addition to the contingent which he was bound to supply as a member of the Germanic empire. Two similar treaties were concluded by the same minister with the duke of Wurtemberg on the 12th, and with the elector of Mayence on the 30th, of April, each agreeing to furnish 6,000 troops to join the army employed against France. The expense of the recruiting, equipment, and maintenance of these troops, was to be borne by England; and, whilst their dominions were guaranteed to the princes, they were bound not to enter into any separate treaty. The peasants of the Black Forest also armed in great numbers, and joined the Austrian army, which amounted to at least 150,000 men in Germany—30,000 in the garrisons, and 120,000 in the field. It was commanded by field-marshal baron de Kray, who had distinguished himself in Italy, but was not so popular with the troops as his predecessor the archduke Charles. That gallant and able commander had been removed because he had shown an unwillingness to prosecute the war, as he had convinced himself that it could not be successful. The second in command, under baron de Kray, was the archduke Ferdinand.—In Italy, the Austrians had at least 120,000 men under general baron de Melas, an officer of high reputation. About 96,000 of these men were encamped in Piedmont, and at the foot of the Maritime Alps; the remainder were garrisoned in Venice, Lombardy, and Tuscany. This army was supported by an English fleet, under lord Keith, which cruised in the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Genoa; and an auxiliary corps of 20,000 English troops was encamped at Port Mahony, in the island of Minorca, under general Abercromby, ready to be conveyed wherever their services could be rendered most useful. A detached squadron of ships from the English fleet blockaded Malta. The plan of the campaign, on the part of the allies, was, for the army under marshal Kray to watch Switzerland, whilst general Melas blockaded Genoa, and captured it, if possible, of which there appeared to be no doubt. Then to cross the Apennines and the Var, and march into Provence, upon Toulon; where it was expected a body of royalists, under general Willot, a proscribed emigrant officer, and Pichegru, who had escaped from Guiana, where he had been sent by the directory, would join them. As the allies advanced on the Var, it was expected that the French would be drawn from the Rhine; and then marshal Kray's army was to move forward, in two divisions, for the attack of Switzerland.

The force by which these plans were to be carried out was not only large but effective, for all the 300,000 men, who in Germany and Italy were arrayed against the republic, were seasoned troops, inured to the climate where they were serving, and inspired with an intense dislike, almost amounting to hatred, against the French. The great evil was, that the force in Germany had to be scattered over so extensive a surface; so that when the campaign fairly commenced, and Moreau marched 75,000 men into the valley of the Danube, Kray could only collect 45,000 to meet him there. The entire French army in Germany, under Moreau, amounted to 130,000 men. The army of Italy, under Masséna, could not muster more than 36,000: of that number, upwards of 20,000 were encamped or quartered in Liguria, from the Trebbia to the Col di Tende—the object being to guard the passes of the Apennines, and cover Genoa. These troops were deficient in ammunition and artillery; their uniforms were ragged and torn, their spirits depressed, and there was great difficulty in persuading them to stand by their colours. In France the consuls had about 30,000 soldiers, principally scattered over the royalist provinces. To excite a national spirit, not only amongst these men but throughout the population of France generally, was a primary object of the government. With this intent, on the 8th of March (18th of Ventôse), a proclamation was published to the “French nation,” in the name of the consuls, but signed only by Bonaparte. “Frenchmen!” said this document, “you desire peace; your government desires it more ardently than you. Their first wishes, their constant labours, have been for peace. The English ministry reject it.” * * * “It is no longer for factions, it is no longer to choose their tyrants, that the French are arming; it is to secure what is dearest to them; it is for the honour of France, for the sacred interests of humanity.” To secure success, the consuls said, money, iron, and soldiers were needed; and Frenchmen being called upon to supply those essentials, were assured that their armies “would fight for nothing but the happiness of France and the peace of the world.” The legislative body, whose session was prolonged several weeks beyond that of the tribunate, followed up this proclamation by declaring, that “all Frenchmen who had completed their twentieth year, on the 1st of last Vendémiaire (September 22nd, 1799), were at the disposal of the government;” and they at once complied with the demand of Bonaparte for 100,000 conscripts. The consuls appealed to all discharged conscripts; to all soldiers retired, but not disabled; and to the companies of veterans, to join their old colours; or, if not attached to any corps, to repair to the army of reserve, to consist of 60,000 men, which was forming at Dijon. To still further popularise the government, an arrêt was published, recalling many of the proscribed who were still exiles from their country. This arrêt brought back Carnot, Barthelemy, Boissy d’Anglas, Portalis, Villoul, Joyeuse, and about forty others, several of whom were immediately employed by the first consul. “Those proscribed by the directory,” remarks Alison, “were thus early admitted into favour: at a subsequent period, Bonaparte received with equally open arms the royalists and the victims of the revolution. The only faction against which to the last he was inveterate, was the remnant of the Jacobin party, who retained, throughout all his career, the resoluteness of their character and the perverseness of their opinions.”

The position of the French army in Italy was considered very critical; and the first consul determined to undertake another campaign in that country. He, however, was anxious to conceal his plans, and to give those who were observing his motions, erroneous impressions as to the objects he had in view. To divert attention from himself, therefore, he removed Berthier from his post as minister of war, nominated him commander-in-chief of the army of reserve, and sent him to Dijon. Carnot, the returned proscrit, was placed in the war-office in his stead. He had been brought up as an engineer, and, before the revolution broke out, had received promotion from the prince of Condé. He was well acquainted with the theory and practice of the military art, as far as any man who had not actually served in the field could be; and made an excellent war minister; ably carrying out the plans of the first consul for recruiting the strength of the army, and for supplying the troops with the matériel of war, and other necessities.

The latter part of the month of March, and the month of April, were employed in recruiting the army, and in disposing a part of it to protect the country; the other part being destined to share in the Italian campaign. A small force, half French, half Dutch, was stationed in Holland, under Augereau. Camps, of from 4,000 to 5,000 men in each, were pitched at Liège, Maestricht, Lille, St. Lo, and Rennes. There were near 30,000 men in the five camps, which still left 30,000 of the army of reserve to be disposed of. These were formed into three war divisions—one at Rennes, one at Nantes, and one at Paris; and when they were partly supplied with matériel, they were ordered to march rapidly to the east, by different routes; the general rendezvous being Lausanne. But more than these 30,000 men were required; and a further supply was obtained from the depôts of the regiments stationed in Egypt; which, although they were much wanted there, could not be sent, because, says Thiers, very naïvely, “it was impossible to cross the sea, incessantly watched by the English.” Some conscripts were added to these depôts, and a few fine battalions formed, which, as soon as equipped, were dispatched towards Lyons. A corps of artillery, with sixty pieces of cannon, was organised, and marched as soon as possible towards Lausanne by different routes. The first consul also collected and forwarded supplies of ammunition and provisions for the troops, who were furnished with shoes, clothing, arms, and horses on the march.—Whilst this was doing for the army, the navy was not neglected. Admiral Bruix had returned to Brest from a cruise in the Mediterranean, and the "grand fleet" under his command, consisted of about twenty French and fifteen Spanish ships. It was closely blockaded by the English; but the first consul, having sent part of the arrears of pay, and provisions to this fleet, ordered the admiral not to suffer himself to be shut up in harbour; but, if he "had only thirty sail against twenty, to put to sea on the first opportunity, were he even obliged to fight." When once clear of the English, he was to make for Toulon, and convoy to Egypt certain vessels he would find in port, laden with provisions. Having performed that duty, he was to raise the blockades of Malta and Alexandria. The admiral found it impossible to obey these orders; nor was admiral Gantheaume, who eventually superseded him, more successful.

Having completed all these arrangements, the first consul, before he set out for Italy, was anxious to arrange with Moreau the plan of the campaign in Germany. He had a long correspondence with that general, and even sent for general Denoles, the chief of his staff, to explain to him the views he entertained as to the proper strategy to be adopted. Moreau, however, had a plan of his own; and he refused to be dictated to by the first consul, who was reluctantly obliged to give way, as he feared to displace that general, on account of the attachment of his troops.

On the 5th of May (the 16th of Floréal), the first consul informed his two colleagues that he was going to Dijon, to inspect the army of reserve; but should not be long absent. Leaving Cambacérès to act for him, and preside over the council of state, the next morning he left Paris for Dijon; and on the following day, whilst all Europe believed that he was busily occupied in organising his government, and preparing plans for others to carry out, he was travelling rapidly towards Geneva, accompanied only by his secretary, M. de Bourrienne, and his aide-de-camp, Duroc. He arrived at that town on the 8th, where he had an interview with Necker, and his daughter, the celebrated madame de Staël, who had resided at the villa of Coppet, near Geneva, since the constituent assembly banished the former. He made a very favourable impression on Necker, which was not reciprocated; for the first consul left him with the conviction that his fame, as a statesman and financier, was much greater than he really deserved. At Geneva he was also met by general Marescot, who brought him important information. Several weeks previously—as soon as he had determined to make an Italian campaign, and, by crossing the Alps, to enter Piedmont—he had sent this general to survey the passes of the mountains. Marescot had been assisted by other able engineers; and their reports induced the first consul to select the Great St. Bernard as the route by which the main body of the army should enter Italy. This would bring the force in the rear of the army of Melas, and compel him to fight or fall back. A defeat would be fatal to him, as he must retreat, and abandon his conquests; but should the republicans be beaten, they could retire on the St. Gothard and the Simplon. A defeat to them would only be a loss of honour; to Melas, it would not only bring dishonour, but ruin in its train. All depended, however, upon concealing the real nature of the movements from the Austrians; hence the talk in Paris about the army of reserve; the nominating Berthier to command it; and the journey of the first consul, ostensibly to review the troops. Austria had her spies abroad, and they visited Dijon, where they found a miserable corps of about 8,000 men. The army of reserve, therefore, was made the subject of ridicule; and Melas had no fear of an attack on his rear. Strange, however, that, with her spies in all parts of France, as Austria is reported to have had at that period, their attention should not have been directed to the movement towards the east, of so many different bodies of men, who, when united, constituted that formidable army which wrenched from Melas all the advantages he had previously gained.

As soon as Bonaparte had determined upon his route, he set out for Lausanne. His arrival was preceded by that of the various bodies of men which had marched from Paris, Nantes, Rennes, Lyons, and Dijon; who had been busily engaged in preparing for their further advance. They constituted a force of about 35,000 infantry and artillery, and 5,000 cavalry. Carnot arrived at Lausanne soon after the first consul, and brought intelligence of successes obtained by Moreau in Germany; and the information that he would detach 15,000 or 20,000 men to descend on Italy by St. Gothard, in order to form the left wing of the first consul's army. This was what Bonaparte wanted. On receiving the news, the word "Forward!" was given, and soon all were in motion towards the Alps. In arranging for the march, the great difficulty had been with the artillery. At last, the guns were removed from their carriages, the latter being taken to pieces, and put on the backs of mules. The former were placed on sledges formed of large fir-trees, with very low wheels, and were dragged along by men. The ammunition and provisions were put in small boxes, and conveyed on mules, of which there were an abundance; for the peasants flocked to Lausanne, to offer the services of themselves and their beasts. The men also conveyed six days' provisions on their persons. So zealous were the troops, and with such admirable precision were their movements directed, that the guns were ready in an incredibly short space of time; and, on the 14th of May, the army had reached the foot of the mountains. There Berthier, who had joined from Dijon, addressed to them the following proclamation:—"Soldiers! The troops of the Rhine have signalised themselves by glorious victories; those of the army of Italy struggle with invincible perseverance against a superior enemy. Emulating their virtue, do you ascend, and reconquer beyond the Alps—the plains which were the first theatre of French glory. Conscripts! you behold the ensigns of victory; march, and emulate the veterans who have won so many triumphs: learn from their lives, to bear and overcome the fatigues inseparable from war. Bonaparte is with you: he has come to witness your first triumph. Prove to him that you are the same men whom he formerly led in these regions to immortal renown." The entire army was now united, nominally under the command of Berthier; because, under a law of the constitution, the first consul could not command in person. Bonaparte evaded the law at first; but he soon defied it; and openly took that position of commander-in-chief and generalissimo, which he had all along secretly maintained.

The passage known as that of the Great St. Bernard, is one of the chief mountain-passes in the Pennine Alps, between the Swiss Valais and Piedmont. It may be considered to commence at Martigny in the Valais, and to debouche at Aosta, in the valley of that name on the southern side of the mountains. From the Valais, the passage was, at the time, practicable, even for cannon, as far as a place called St. Pierre, at the foot of the Cols; but from that place to Aosta, the road, or rather track, consisted merely of a horse or bridle-path, following the sinuosities of the ravines which had to be traversed.* The most elevated part of the ridge, at the summit of the Cols, is a narrow valley, inclosing a lake, 8,200 feet above the level of the sea. This valley, about a mile in length, is shut in by mountains covered with snow, and its appearance is inexpressibly gloomy. At its entrance from the Valais, stands the convent, the repute of which for hospitality is known all over Christendom; and which was, according to tradition, built by Bernard de Menthon, A.D. 862, for the succour of travellers. It is dedicated to St. Bernard, and has given its name to the pass and to the mountain. The latter, in ancient times—having a temple to Jupiter, standing at the opposite end of the valley to that where the monastery is built—was called Mount Jovis, corrupted into Mount Joux. A few remains of the temple are still to be seen.—This pass is on the south of Switzerland, and the north of Piedmont. The Alps extend further to the west; and then running southward, form the western boundary of Piedmont, and separate it from Savoy. In this western range are two passes, both more used than that of the Great St. Bernard—those of Little St. Bernard and Mont Cenis. The first consul determined they should all be made available. General Chabran, with the 70th demi-brigade and a number of conscripts, in all, near 6,000 men, was ordered to make for, and cross, the Little St. Bernard; and general Thurreau, who defended Mont Cenis with 4,000 men, had orders to cross the mountain, and, if possible, penetrate to Turin. The main body was to take the Great St. Bernard route; and as it was expected that it would be joined by the division from Germany, and probably by that of general Chabran, the first consul anticipated having from 60,000 to 65,000 men under his command.

In the night between the 14th and 15th of May, the advanced guard, under general Lannes, commenced the passage. On the 16th, the main army was at the foot of the mountain, and the first consul slept that night at the convent of St. Maurice. The following day the march began, and continued till the 20th, one division crossing each day. Some part of the ascent was extremely laborious and difficult; but the men sang warlike songs, and encouraged each other; the band of each regiment played at its head; when any particularly steep part was encountered, a charge was sounded: and thus the martial spirit of the troops was not suffered to give way. The cannon were dragged up the ascent by the men of the different corps; a hundred being attached to each gun, who were relieved every half mile. On reaching the hospital, there was an hour's halt, and the benevolent monks doled out to each soldier a ration of bread, cheese, and wine. Then they passed on, the most toilsome part of the passage being over. The merit of this march—though very laborious and difficult—has, no doubt, been greatly exaggerated. Sir A. Alison, who has traversed on foot the ground over which this army passed; that traversed by Suwarroff over the St. Gothard, the Schächenthal, and the Engiberg; and that surmounted by Macdonald in the passage of the Splügen, the Mont Aprigal, and the Mont Tonal—is of opinion, that "the march of Macdonald was by far the most hazardous" of the three, "so far as mere natural difficulties were concerned;" and that that of "Suwarroff was, upon the whole, the most worthy of admiration, from the vigorous resistance he experienced at every step; the total inexperience of his troops in mountain warfare, and the unparalleled hardships, both physical and moral, in which its later stages were involved. That of Napoleon over the St. Bernard, in a fine season, without any opposition from the enemy, with every aid from the peasantry of the district, and the experience of his own officers, and by a road impracticable only for carriages and cannon, must, with every impartial observer acquainted with the ground, rank as the easiest of these memorable enterprises."

Berthier proceeded with the first division, in order to receive the matériel, and to see that it was properly put in order. Bonaparte remained at Martigny, to forward the other divisions, with the provisions, ammunition, and artillery. When the last man was on his way, he set forward himself. He took a Swiss peasant for his guide; and wearing a grey great-coat and three-cornered hat (his usual dress), with a riding-whip in his hand, he sometimes walked, and sometimes rode a mule, till he reached the southern foot of the mountain. Then he found that an unanticipated difficulty awaited him.

Lannes, with the advanced guard, had been ordered to push on to Ivrea, to take that town, and thus make himself master of the plain of Piedmont. He defeated a body of about 1,500 Croats at Chatillon; but on advancing a few miles further, his march was suddenly arrested at the entrance of the valley of the Aosta. That valley is traversed by the Dora-Baltea, and terminates to the north in a narrow pass, between two mountains, scarcely fifty yards apart from each other. The road runs between the foot of the mountains and the river; but not far from the entrance is a rock, "which seems to have fallen from the neighbouring heights into the middle of the valley." The river runs on one side of the rock, and the road on the other. The town of Bard lies at the foot of this rock; and at the top, when the French entered the valley, was a fort, with twenty-two guns, so disposed, as to command, not only the village and the road, but all the paths upon the adjacent mountains. A fire from this fort was opened upon the French, who dashed into the town, and soon compelled the Austrian troops there to take refuge in the fortress. But it was impossible to advance while the fort remained; and it appeared to be equally impossible to take it. General Lannes ordered an assault; but the attacking party was so cut up by stones, musketry, and hand-grenades, that the attempt was given up. Then, by wonderful exertions, two 4-pounder and two 8-pounder cannon were dragged up a steep mountain (Albaredo), which is on the left bank of the Dora-Baltea. A fire was opened from them upon the fort, to the evident surprise of the garrison; who, however, returned it, and dismounted one of the guns. General Marescot, the chief engineer, being consulted, declared that there was no means of taking the fort. The advance of the columns was, in consequence, suspended; cannon, caissons, infantry, and cavalry, accumulated in the narrow defile which formed the entrance of the valley, so as to be, for a time, unmanageable; and Berthier contemplated a retrograde movement. The first consul, however, on his arrival, would not hear of the troops retracing their steps, or taking any route but that which would bring them to the vicinity of the foe. He immediately employed himself in reconnoitring the position. On ascending the mountain Albaredo, he found that there was a pass, practicable for pedestrians, but utterly impracticable for carriages and cannon, at a height which was beyond the reach of the guns of the fort. As the commandant of the latter indignantly refused to comply with the summons to surrender, it was resolved that the army should take this route; and it was a more daring and dangerous feat than the passage of the St. Bernard. Fifteen hundred labourers preceded the troops to make the path as practicable as possible, to cut down trees to throw across ravines, and, where the slopes were very rapid, to cut steps to assist the descent. Along this path the men marched in single file; the cavalry led the horses by their bridles; and the mules, with the provisions and the ammunition, were taken over in the same way. The Austrian commandant could scarcely believe his eyes when he saw the moving panorama above him. He immediately sent messengers to De Melas, to inform him of the enemy having crossed the Alps, and being then crossing the Albaredo into the plains below, without his having any means of obstructing them: but he pledged his life they should not get a single piece of cannon on the other side of the valley. He was mistaken. The French held the town; and in two nights they took through their guns, without losing one. In the first attempt, they were heard by the garrison, who lighted the road by a discharge of pot-grenades; and then a shower of projectiles put seven artillerymen out of thirteen hors de combat. To conceal their movements, the French covered the streets with straw and dung, and the wheels of the gun-carriages with tow. Tow was also wound about the guns themselves, so as to prevent the least jarring noise: they were then dragged past the fort by the artillerymen, and safely conveyed to the other side of the defile. The garrison from time to time discharged a gun, apparently by way of precaution, and several of the artillerymen were wounded; but none of the artillery were injured in the slightest degree. After all had passed, a division of conscripts, with some cannon, was left to reduce the fort, which held out till the 5th of June, when the commandant capitulated.

Whilst the main army was waiting for the artillery, Lannes pushed on, and, on the 25th of May, captured the town of Ivrea, where a gallant but unavailing resistance was made. The Austrians, when driven from the town, made a stand behind the Chinsella, where they were again defeated on the 26th, when they retired upon Turin. Lannes marched rapidly to the Po, where he was fortunate enough to secure a flotilla of boats, which proved of great advantage to the French. On the 28th of May, the first consul had the satisfaction of seeing the whole of the main army assembled at Ivrea, its advanced guard having pushed on its patrols as far as the gates of Turin. The right and left wings were equally successful in their movements. General Chabran brought his conscripts over the Little St. Bernard; and the general took the command of that part of them appointed to besiege the fort of Barb. General Thurreau crossed Mont Cenis, carried the pass of Susa, taking 1,500 prisoners and several cannon, and then advanced into the Novalese. General Moncey, with the corps from Germany, advanced, without opposition, to support the operations of the first consul, by Mont St. Gothard and the Simplon. General Bethencourt, with a Swiss brigade, ascended the Simplon, forced the terrific defile of Gondo, reached Duoma d'Ossola, and opened a communication with general Moncey. And general Lecchi, with a division of Italians, turned the valley of the Sesia, repulsed an Austrian corps, and formed a link with a detachment left in Switzerland. Thus more than 60,000 men were either converged in the plains of Piedmont, or threatening the Austrians in other quarters.

But it is necessary that we should go back for a short period, and trace the operations of De Melas and his troops, from the commencement of the campaign on the 8th of April. At that period, the French army of Liguria, of 34,000 men, was divided into four corps. One, 8,000 strong, occupied the summit of the Alps, from Argentiére to Mont Cenis. The right wing, under Soult, composed of 16,000 men, occupied Gavi, the Campo-Freddo, the Bochetta, and the summits of the valleys to the north of Genoa. The centre, under Masséna, who had 12,000 men with him, was stationed to the westward, extending through Cadebone, Vado, Savona, and the Col di Tende: Masséna himself, at the commencement of the month, had his headquarters in Genoa, Suchet commanding in the field. The right wing, under Thurreau, as already stated, guarded the passes of Mont Cenis; watching, also, Little St. Bernard and the Col de Geneva. The Austrians were cantoned in the plains, and at the entrance of the valleys occupied by the French; and a strong division advanced on Genoa, which the republicans prepared to cover and defend. On the 5th of April, by orders from Vienna, operations commenced; and Masséna, who had neglected the advice given him by the first consul in March, to concentrate at least four-fifths of his forces on Genoa, or had been unable to act upon it, was, to a certain extent, surprised. De Melas had much the largest army; and he sent his lieutenant, general Ott, with 15,000 men, to debouch upon the right of Genoa; and lieutenant-general Hohenzollern, with 10,000, to threaten that city on the left; whilst he himself, with general Elnitz as his second in command, and a division of 50,000 men, ascended the valley of the Bormida, and attacked the entire line occupied by the French centre; taking Vado, Savona, and Cadebone; intersecting the French line, and throwing Suchet back on Borghetto. Soult was also obliged to retire from Montenotte, and fall back on Genoa. In that quarter, Hohenzollern had driven the French from the neighbourhood of Gavi, far up the important pass of the Bochetta; and Ott had taken Montes Faccio and Ratti, and invested the forts of Quizzi, Richelieu, and St. Tecla, within cannon-shot of the walls of the city. These results were not obtained without much fighting, in which the republicans displayed great bravery; but generally they were much inferior in numbers to the imperialists, and were obliged to succumb.

These operations only occupied from the 5th to the 8th of April; and they rendered the situation of Masséna very critical. He had, in a sortie, recovered Montes Faccio and Ratti, and the positions in that quarter; but he found it necessary, unless he wished to be entirely overwhelmed, to make a decided effort to check the progress of the enemy. He therefore divided his army into three corps—leaving one at Genoa, under Miollis, to defend the city; another, under Gazan, was directed to march on Voltri, and from thence to Sassello; and he himself, with the third, moved along the sea-coast, hoping to co-operate with Suchet, to whom he sent a communication, ordering him to suspend his retreat. Soult was directed to move by Aqua-Bianca and San Pietro del Alba, upon Sassello, and to join Gazan, of whose division he would then take the command. These movements were none of them successful. Melas left Elnitz with a strong force at Vado, to make head against Suchet, and marched on Genoa. In the night of the 8th of April, the French were again driven from the Bochetta; and although, in the night of the 9th, Soult, having taken the command of Gazan's division, attacked an Austrian column under St. Julien at La Vereira, defeated it, and made 1,500 prisoners, taking also seven standards—yet this success was more than counterbalanced by the disaster sustained by the French left at Cogoletto. Masséna's division was there completely overwhelmed by De Melas on the 10th, and driven back to the neighbourhood of Voltri. The next day, Suchet and Elnitz met on Monte Giacomo. There the republicans were successful in separating general Ulm from the main body of the imperialists, and compelling the corps he commanded to lay down their arms. On the 12th, Suchet became the assailant, and the fortune of war changed. The Austrians were posted on Monte Giacomo, a lofty hill, difficult to ascend; and the position was rendered as strong as art could make it. The French advanced with their characteristic bravery; but were repulsed on all points, and the ground was covered with their dead. Suchet had to retreat hastily; and he reached Melogno and Sette Pani, on the sea-coast, with great difficulty, his men being in complete confusion. There was more fighting on the 15th and 16th, between the Austrians under Hohenzollern and De Melas, and the French under Soult and Masséna; the result of which was, that both divisions of the republicans had to retire on Voltri. The attack was followed up on the 17th, when Masséna and Soult, being again defeated, were compelled to fall back on Genoa, which the latter only reached by the most desperate fighting. Suchet, after his repulse on the 12th, had been joined by some troops flying from other quarters; and he resolved to make another attack on Monte Giacomo; but Elnitz had received an additional force of three brigades from the commander-in-chief, and the republicans could make no impression. On the contrary, they were repulsed, and then the imperialists became the assailants. The French were completely beaten, and fell back towards the Var; and a few days after, threatened by a superior force under De Melas himself, Suchet, on the 2nd of May, fell further back, to Borghetto. There he was attacked, on the 6th, by De Melas, with a superior force, defeated with the loss of many men killed and wounded, and compelled to cross the Var, and, as far as he was concerned, to leave the soil of Italy free from the invader.

The French were now confined to Genoa. That city is situated in the very centre of the beautiful inlet of the Mediterranean, which bears the name of the Gulf of Genoa. A short distance from the sea, a spur of the southern Apennines separates into two ridges, one branching off to the east, the other to the west—thus forming a triangle, the base of which is supported by the sea. In this triangle stands Genoa, exhibiting, as vessels approach it, one of the most beautiful sights in the world. Noble palaces, princely mansions, lofty and elegant buildings (some private residences; others used for public purposes), terraces, and gardens, rise one above another; forming a splendid amphitheatre, in which nature and art appear to vie with each other to produce the greatest effect. At the period we are writing of, the city was strongly fortified, both next the sea, and by land. Next the sea, two moles inclining towards each other, till at a distance they appeared to meet, formed the port; and a double row of fortifications on the mountain ridges, which surmount the walls on the land side, surrounded the city. Two forts, Diamond Fort and Spur Fort, were built at the apex of the triangle, and covered the entire city, and the fortifications, by their fire. Two rivulets bordered these fortifications—the Bisagno on the east, and the Polcevera on the west. The batteries on the west commanded the valley of the Polcevera, with the faubourg of St. Pierre d'Arena, which runs through its centre; whilst those on the east were themselves commanded by Monte Ratti and Monte Faccio. Detached outworks were therefore thrown up, called forts Quizzi, Richelieu, and St. Tecla, on the Madonna del Monte. Such was the city and the fortifications that the Austrians, aided by the English fleet, which established a strict blockade by sea, now prepared to besiege.

From the 18th of April, when he was driven back to Genoa, Masséna considered himself definitively shut up there, unless he could have relief from without, of which, at that time, he had no expectations. "He therefore turned," says Thiers, "his immediate attention to the internal police, and the provisioning the place. Fearful lest the Genoese nobles might practise treachery, he took precautions against any surprise on their part. The national guard, composed of Ligurian patriots, supported by a French force, encamped in the principal streets in the city, with lighted matches to the guns; this guard was to assemble whenever the drums should beat to arms. Such of the inhabitants as did not belong to it were ordered to retire, at that signal, to their houses. The armed troops alone were authorised to traverse the streets. At ordinary times the inhabitants were ordered to be in their houses by ten o'clock at night; and assemblages, at any time, were strictly prohibited." Masséna had bought up all the corn in Genoa; and, when the holders refused to sell it, he seized it without payment. He then put the army and the inhabitants on rations, by which the supply of provisions was not exhausted so soon as it would otherwise have been; but before the month of May came in, great want began to be felt, which was increased as the siege progressed. The operations of the besiegers were carried on with great activity. General Ott commanded the Austrians, who surrounded the city on the land side, and kept up a pretty brisk cannonade, whilst discharges of cannon were frequently made from the English fleet. It was not till the 30th of April that any decided assault was ventured upon. On that day the imperialists made their attack on all sides, and it was supported by a bombardment from the sea. In the course of the day the Austrians established themselves in the valley of the Polcevera; on the plateau of the Two Brothers, upon which Fort Diamond was erected; in Fort Quizzi; on all the southern slopes of Monte Faccio, and on the Madonna del Monte. The next day the French recovered all these positions, except Monte Faccio. On the 2nd of May, Masséna made a sally, and attacked the heights of Coronata, which the Austrians had strongly fortified. He was repulsed with great slaughter; and, for the next eight days, little was attempted on either side. The French were struggling with famine—an enemy more fearful than the Austrians; and the latter were preparing for final measures. At length, on the 11th, when the Austrians were celebrating the successes of the commander-in-chief over Suchet, Masséna directed two attacks to be made on their positions on Monte Faccio—one by Soult, in flank; another by Miollis, in front. The latter failed, and the republicans were driven back in great confusion to the gates of Genoa. Masséna, however, rallied the fugitives, and again attacked the victorious imperialists, who were also assailed in flank by Soult. They were compelled to give way; and only made good their retreat by leaving 1,300 prisoners in the hands of the enemy. The following day an attack was made upon Monte Creta, a most important position on the mountains in the rear of the city, where the Austrian general, Hohenzollern, had posted himself, with several thousand men, and thrown up some strong works. Soult commanded the attack, which was commenced in the midst of an awful thunder-storm. At the outset, success appeared to declare for the republicans, who carried the first line of intrenchments. There they were charged by the Austrian reserve, headed by Hohenzollern, and thoroughly broken and routed. Soult, wounded in the thigh, was taken prisoner, and his troops fled back to Genoa in great confusion.

From that day the siege was converted into a blockade. After enduring the greatest sufferings from famine—cheered, on the 27th of May, by the receipt of intelligence of the passage of the Alps by the first consul; and of the successes of Moreau in Germany, which led to another sortie and another defeat on the 28th, followed by a severe bombardment in the night of the 31st—Masséna entered into negotiations; and on the 4th of June capitulated. The terms were honourable. The garrison (9,000 in number) retained their arms, ammunition, and baggage, and were conducted (those who could march) to Voltri and Antibes—the sick and wounded by sea. No stipulation was made in respect to their abstaining from service; but they were at liberty to join the French army immediately on leaving their captors. To the inhabitants, a full and entire amnesty was granted. It would be difficult to conceive either inhabitants or garrison reduced to greater straits than were those of Genoa before the surrender took place. When the victors entered the city, they encountered a population scarcely removed from utter destitution. "On all sides," writes Jomelli, who was an eye-witness of the horrors he describes, "death was reaping its victims; the rival furies of famine and pestilence were multiplying their devastations; army and inhabitants alike seemed approaching dissolution." Before the French departed, copious supplies of all necessities were sent from the English fleet. "Your defence," said lord Keith to Masséna, "has been so heroic, that we can refuse you nothing; yet you alone are worth an army: how can we allow you to depart?"

This was the last triumph of the Austrians; and if Masséna could have delayed the surrender of Genoa four-and-twenty hours longer, the siege must have been raised. The baron de Melas, now aware of the movements of the first consul, and of the formidable army which was collecting to drive him from Italy, had ordered general Ott to discontinue the blockade, and retire from the Po; and the Austrian staff officer who brought the order was with him when general Andrieux arrived from Masséna, to announce his willingness to give up the city, if an "honourable capitulation" were granted to the troops, instead of an "unconditional surrender" being exacted. This was the cause of such favourable terms being conceded. A few hours later, and the Austrians would have retired, leaving the city free. It was the opinion of the Austrian commander-in-chief—who, since Suchet had crossed the Var, had had his headquarters at Nice—that Bonaparte would either march on Turin, or immediately make for Genoa to relieve Masséna. He therefore retired on the Piedmontese capital, fixing his head-quarters at Coni. There he ordered generals Ott and Elnitz to join him, thinking that he should then be strong enough to fight the French if they advanced on Turin, or to pursue them if they went to Genoa. The latter general had been watching Suchet, who, when driven out of Italy, had rallied in a strong and almost impregnable position behind the Var. That river rises in the Alps; runs first in a south, then in an east and south direction; and, after a course of sixty miles, enters the Mediterranean at St. Laurent, six miles to the north-east of Antibes. For the last fifteen miles it forms the boundary between France and the Sardinian province of Nice. A strong bridge is thrown over this river at St. Laurent, which had a formidable tête-du-pont; and it was to the west of this bridge that Suchet had intrenched himself when he retreated from Nice, leaving garrisons in the fortresses of Montalban and Vintimiglia in his rear. The former, perched upon a rock, commanded the only road by which the Austrians could advance; and all their movements were telegraphed by the commandant to Suchet. Could Elnitz have attacked the bridge of St. Laurent immediately after the French had retired to their own country, it is very probable that he would have inflicted upon them another defeat. But he had to wait for his heavy cannon; and when they arrived, Suchet was so strongly posted, that the efforts to dislodge him, made with great bravery on the 22nd and 27th of May, failed. In the last affair, the republican defences were attacked in front by the Austrians, with twenty pieces of cannon; and several English vessels, detached from the main fleet, kept up a constant discharge on their right. But little impression was made on the intrenchments; whilst the cannon of the French, and discharges of musketry from behind them, cut down rank after rank of the assailants. At length they retired; and Elnitz broke up his camp during the night, retreating, with 17,000 men, in the direction of Turin. The French harassed the retiring forces greatly in their march, and they received repeated checks. On the 7th of June, Elnitz, with one division of his army, comprising about 10,000 men, reached Ceva, twenty-six miles from the head-quarters of the commander-in-chief at Coni; where general Gorupp, with a much weaker corps, had arrived. —Suchet, after the surrender of Genoa, was joined by Masséna and part of the garrison of that city; and, by the direction of the latter, he re-entered Piedmont, posting his army upon the summits of the Apennines, in advance of Acqui, a small town on the left bank of the Bormida, eighteen miles south-south-west of Alessandria.

It is now time to return to Bonaparte, who did not direct his course either to Turin or Genoa; but crossed the Sesia and Ticino, in the direction of Milan, leaving the Austrians in his rear. General Lannes commanded his advanced guard. As a feint, he marched on Chiavaso, on the Po, and seizing a number of boats and small vessels, he commenced the construction of a bridge across the river; and this confirmed the opinion of De Melas, that Turin was the destination of his enemy—an opinion strengthened by general Thurreau's descent from Mont Cenis, and his capture of Susa and La Brunetta. He therefore sent a strong force to oppose Lannes at Chiavaso; while Murat, with his cavalry, occupied Vercelli, on the right bank of the Sesia, without opposition; and the entire army passed over, no enemy appearing to dispute their advance. At the Ticino, where the French found themselves on the 31st of May, a corps of Austrian cavalry, under general Festenberg, was drawn up in front of Turbigo, to oppose their passage. Under cover of artillery, the first division of the French, commanded by general Gerard, seized the bridge of Naviglio; and though the Austrians attacked them with great determination, and at first made a considerable impression on their ranks, killing and wounding a great many men—they were baffled by the French retiring into a position where the union of wood and water checked the impetuosity of the horsemen's charge. There they remained, attracting the attention of the enemy, till so many of the republicans had crossed the Ticino, that they were enabled to drive the Austrians from Turbigo at the bayonet's point. No further opposition was offered; and, on the 2nd of June, the first consul entered Milan.

The French were received, apparently, with great joy by the Milanese; though as they had made similar manifestations on the arrival of Suwarroff the previous year, the sincerity of the demonstration may well be doubted. They were greatly surprised to see Bonaparte. It had been reported that he had been drowned in the Red Sea, and that it was one of his brothers who commanded the army: they would not, for some time, therefore, believe that it was really the hero of Lodi who was in their city. However, they were soon convinced, and then their apparent satisfaction was unbounded. The first consul lost no time in exercising the authority which the fate of battles had again placed in his hands. He took up his residence in the ducal palace; and having dismissed all the Austrian officials, he re-established the republican magistrates, and had the Cisalpine republic again proclaimed. He forbade, however, the adoption of any harsh measures towards the defeated party. He did not forget to procure, by levies and contributions, the means of obtaining supplies for his troops; and having taken these steps, he impatiently awaited the arrival of general Moncey, with the contingent from Moreau's army. The troops with him were not, however, suffered to be idle. A division under Lannes took possession of Pavia; Lodi was also occupied; and Pizzighettone, twelve miles from the latter, invested. On the 5th of June, three days after the occupation of Milan, during which all the above movements were made, Moncey and his troops arrived. They were somewhat more numerous than was anticipated, the division consisting of 25,000 men; and they rendered the army more than a match for the Austrians, even if Melas could have concentrated all his soldiers on the spot to attack them. On the 6th of June, Lannes crossed the Po at Pavia; and Murat at Piacenza. Duhesme, the same day, made an attack on Cremona, drove out the garrison, with the loss of 800 men, and established himself in their place. On the 6th and 7th, the first consul reviewed all the soldiers in the neighbourhood of Milan; and, on the latter day, addressed to the entire army a proclamation, in which he reminded his soldiers of what they had done, and what remained to do; and assured them, that "the result of their efforts would be a cloudless glory, and solid peace."

At Milan, Bonaparte obtained possession of all the despatches that had passed between the baron de Melas and the court of Vienna; and they made him acquainted alike with the plans and the strength of his enemy. A spy, who had been useful to him in his first Italian campaign, but who had lately been in the pay of the Austrians, also made his appearance at Milan, where he had been sent to obtain, and convey to baron de Melas, information as to the movements of the French. He, however, went to his old employer, and betrayed to him all he knew of the designs of the Austrian general; giving him a description of the Austrian corps, their numbers, their positions, and the names of their generals. For this he received 1,000 louis d'or from Bonaparte, who said he did not want to conceal a knowledge of the strength of his forces, and their position, from the Austrians: Berthier, therefore, gave the spy what particulars he required, with which he returned to Coni, and received another reward from De Melas.* The information thus obtained, induced that general to advance to Alessandria, where he remained three days inactive, while the French were strengthening themselves on the right bank of the Po; and three out of four corps which De Melas had ordered to advance on Piacenza, from different directions, were met by the enemy, and defeated in detail. The fourth, and the most numerous one, under general Ott, met Lannes and Victor, with two advanced divisions of the French army, at Montebello, near Voghera, on the 9th of June. The Austrians amounted to nearly 15,000 men, chiefly Hungarian grenadiers. This division had been engaged in the siege and blockade of Genoa, whose fall Bonaparte had been apprised of by intercepting a courier from Ott to De Melas; and he had warned Lannes that he would meet 15,000 or 18,000 troops coming from that city, where Hohenzollern had been left in command. On the way to Piacenza, Ott met the fugitives from that town, Pavia, and Cremona. He formed a junction with them; and on learning the advance of the French, he posted his men on some gentle eminences, in two lines—the right resting on the heights formed by the roots of the Apennines, and commanding the road to Tortona, which wound round them; the left extending into the plain, where their fine cavalry would have ample room to manœuvre. Lannes' division was in advance, and first came into action. It was not more than 9,000 strong; but the men advanced en échelon, attacked the Austrian positions, and fought for some time against the odds with great desperation. They were giving way, and must have been utterly routed, when Victor's division came up, and turned the fortune of the day. The Austrians were then outnumbered, but they fought desperately. As the battle continued, the men crossed fields covered with grain nearly as tall as themselves, and the opponents were frequently hid from each other till they found themselves in immediate contact. In this position, much hand-to-hand fighting took place, and the slaughter was great. At last, the Austrians, their left being turned, were obliged to retreat, having lost 5,000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. In this battle, for which Lannes afterwards received the title of Duke of Montebello, that general said, "bones cracked like glass in his division." After the engagement, general Ott rallied his men under the walls of Tortona, four miles from the field where it was fought.

It had been the intention of the first consul, after occupying Milan, to relieve Genoa; but the fall of that place caused an alteration in his plans. He therefore moved his army to Stradella, about thirty-four miles to the east-northeast of Alessandria, where De Melas had his head-quarters. There he remained three days; and there he was joined by Desaix, who, on arriving in France from Egypt, found letters, wishing him immediately to go to Italy. From Stradella messengers were dispatched to Suchet, ordering him to cross the mountains by the Col di Cadibona, and march on the river Scrivia; thus placing himself in the Austrian rear. The first consul also stationed from 9,000 to 10,000 men on the Ticino; left from 3,000 to 4,000 at Milan and Ancona, and placed from 10,000 to 11,000 on the lower course of the Po and the Adda. All these different corps and divisions were posted in such a manner that they could, with the utmost promptness, reciprocally support each other; and the two bridges over the Po, which afforded the only means of retreat in case of disaster, were covered with formidable têtes-du-pont. Bonaparte had with him, at Stradella, about 32,000 men; and he had succeeded in occupying the only line by which the Austrian general could reach the plains of Lombardy.—That general was environed with dangers. He had Bonaparte in front, and Suchet in his rear. On his right the ridges of the Apennines, backed by the sea; and, on his left, the Alps, the passes of which led to an enemy's country. He appeared thus to be in a net; but he was not disheartened. He had 30,000 excellent troops, on whose disposition and bravery he could confidently depend; his artillery was far superior to the enemy's; and his cavalry deserved the epithet which has been frequently applied to them, of "magnificent." He determined, therefore, to give battle, and to break through the lines of circumvallation which Bonaparte had drawn round him. To enable him to carry out this determination with greater assurances of success, he summoned Elnitz from Ceva, and Hohenzollern from Genoa. The latter had orders to bring with him every able-bodied man, and to leave the defence of the place to

* This man's information was very useful to the French; and, after the battle of Marengo, Bourrienne, by Bonaparte's order, gave him another thousand louis. On receiving them, the man said he would never more follow his "odious profession;" which he appears to have despised whilst he practised it.

those troops who had been prisoners within its walls, and who had not yet recovered from the effects of the privations they had endured. A courier was also dispatched to lord Keith, to request him to transport from Minorca the English auxiliary corps, which had been for some time inactive. This courier left head-quarters on the 10th of June, after De Melas had learned the full extent of Elnitz's losses, and the fatal result of the battle of Montebello. Even this did not dishearten him; and he addressed a proclamation to his troops, couched in firm and heroic language, in which he called upon them to emulate their past deeds, and live with glory, or die with honour.

The position of Stradella was admirably adapted to resist attack, and "to compensate," remarks an historian, "the inferiority of the first consul in cavalry and artillery. The right rested on impracticable morasses, extending to the Po; the centre was strengthened by several large villages; the left, commanding the great road, extended over heights, the commencement of the Apennines," where a field battery was placed. There Bonaparte awaited the attack of De Melas; and when, at the end of the third day, he neither saw nor heard anything of him, he imagined that he must have "escaped, either by ascending towards Genoa, or by crossing the Upper Po, with the intention of forcing the Ticino. Tired of waiting," writes Thiers, "he left his position at Stradella in the afternoon of the 12th of June, and advanced, followed by his whole army, to the heights of Tortona. He gave orders for the blockade of that fortress, and established his head-quarters at Voghera. On the morning of the 13th he crossed the Scrivia, and debouched in the immense plain extending between that river and the Bormida, which, at the present day, has no other name but the plain of Marengo." There the troops bivouacked, and Victor was ordered to take possession of the bridges over the Bormida. The French advanced with their usual daring; carried the village of Marengo with little loss; but were arrested at the Bormida by a cannonade from the têtes-du-pont. There was no appearance, however, of any large bodies of the enemy; and the first consul drew the not unnatural conclusion, that De Melas had found an outlet in another direction; as, if he had intended to fight a battle, and force his way from Alessandria to Piacenza, it did not appear likely that he would have suffered the plain and village of Marengo to have been occupied without a struggle. So impressed was the first consul with this idea, that, having ordered Victor and his two divisions to remain at Marengo; sent Desaix, to whom he had entrusted the command of the reserve, to Rivolta, with a view to observe the communications with Genoa; and placed Lannes en échelon in the plain, with Watrin's division—he directed all the officers of his staff to meet him at head-quarters at Voghera, and set off on his return there. The waters of the Scrivia had, however, risen during the day, and overflowed its banks. To pass was impossible; and he fixed his head-quarters for the night at Torre di Garofalo, between Tortona and Alessandria. But for that event, a very different result might have ensued on the following day.

De Melas had not retired. On the contrary, he was advancing with 24,000 infantry, 7,000 cavalry, and 200 pieces of cannon, towards Marengo; a council of war having been held on the 12th, at which it was resolved immediately to give battle to the French. The field where the battle must take place was the plain of Marengo, just alluded to. This plain was traversed, for its whole extent, by the high road from Alessandria to Piacenza. San Giuliano was the first town when the Scrivia was crossed. From thence it was three-quarters of a league to Marengo, which was near the Bormida. The road between the two places ran in a straight line; and the plain on each side was covered with corn-fields and vineyards. Early on the morning of the 14th of June, the Austrian army was in motion, and crossed the Bormida by three bridges which were thrown over the stream. General Victor, when he occupied Marengo, had placed Gardanne's division in advance. It consisted of two demi-brigades; and they were the first that came in contact with the imperialists. O'Reilly's brigade, supported by a park of artillery, had crossed the Bormida as the advanced guard of De Melas's army; and its superiority of numbers soon compelled Gardanne to retreat to Marengo. Two lines followed O'Reilly—the first led by generals Haddick and Kaim; the second by De Melas and Zach. Elnitz commanded the cavalry, which made a detour by Castel Ceriolo, in company with general Ott's division. As the Austrians advanced, Victor united his two divisions to defend Marengo; and he dispatched a messenger to the first consul, to inform him that the whole Austrian army was advancing, with the evident intention of giving battle.

Marengo, if the numbers were at all equal, was well situated for defence. Between the Bormida and the village there was a deep and muddy rivulet, called the Fontanone. It formed the arc of a circle; the Bormida, into which it fell on both sides, being the chord. Victor disposed his force in three divisions—the centre, in the village; the right and left, on the Marengo side of the rivulet; the former extending to Castel Ceriolo. The division of Lannes was posted, part on the right, between Marengo and Castel Ceriolo; and part as a reserve in the rear, and at some distance. The French gallantly received the fire of generals Haddick's and Kaim's column; and, for two hours, the firing was incessant—two divisions of the French troops, Gardanne's and Chambarlhac's, being drawn up in a semicircle, round the Fontanone, and pouring a converging fire into Kaim's brigade. While it continued, general Pilati attempted to pass the Fontanone, and turn the left of the French. He was repulsed; but renewed the attempt, when general Kellermann met him at the head of his brigade; and though Pilati had 2,000 of the "magnificent" cavalry with him, he could not stand the shock. The French "dashed upon his squadrons as soon as they attempted to debouch, slaughtering, and hurling them into the muddy bed of that little stream, which could not have been better formed by the most consummate art for covering the position of the republicans." But numbers prevailed. De Melas brought up his column in aid of Haddick, who received a severe wound, of which he subsequently died, and was obliged to leave the field. The rivulet, as well as the river, were passed, and the village carried by assault. The brave officer who defended it, Oliver Rivaud, though wounded, returned, and drove out the Austrians; but they retook it; and, after two hours' fighting, from 7 to 9 A.M., it remained in their possession. Receiving intelligence that Suchet was moving on his rear, and had reached Acqui, De Melas detached 2,500 horse to arrest his progress, and then devoted all his energy to drive the French across the plain. For two hours more the battle raged. At the expiration of that period the French showed signs of weakness; the Austrians pressed on with redoubled ardour; and Chambarlhac's division, in the centre, was well-nigh mowed down. Oreilly drove back the extreme left of the French: Ott, debouching from Castel Ceriolo with a fine body of cavalry, turned the right wing, where Lannes commanded; and though the cavalry brigades of Champeaux and Kellermann made some brilliant charges (in one of which Champeaux was mortally wounded), they could not make an impression on the imperialists. After four hours' fighting the French gave way. At first they retired in some order; but, repeatedly charged by superior numbers, at last the mass broke up, and the plain of Marengo was covered with the dying and the dead, and with numerous detached bodies of men trying to escape the ruthless fire which was pouring upon them, and still desolating their ranks. A few squares of Lannes' division only maintained their ground; Victor's was entirely broken and dispersed.

If Bonaparte had retired to Voghera on the previous evening, the defeat of Victor and Lannes would have been complete. But Victor's message soon reached him at Torre di Garofalo, and he immediately hastened to the scene of carnage, taking with him the consular guard and Mounier's division of three demi-brigades; two regiments of cavalry following in his rear. Before he started he dispatched a messenger to Desaix, with orders for him to return with the reserve to San Giuliano with the utmost expedition. It was eleven o'clock when Bonaparte arrived on the plain of Marengo. He rode at the head of his guards, and the sight appeared to give the flying troops new spirit. The fugitives, who had reached San Giuliano, rallied in the rear of Lannes. Bonaparte dispatched 800 grenadiers of his guard to check the career of Ott in that direction; Mounier's division was sent to Castel Ceriolo, to stop the further progress of the enemy from that point; and the first consul placed himself in the centre. Again the battle raged; Lannes' demi-brigades effected wonders; and the grenadiers of the guard, though charged by cavalry and attacked by cannon, for some time maintained their ground unbroken. Castel Ceriolo was taken and retaken; but at length Cara St. Cyr drove out the Austrians, and, by barricading the houses, maintained himself there for the remainder of the day. The reserves brought up by Bonaparte thus preserved the right wing from that frightful disorder which prevailed in the left, and extended to the centre. If so large a portion of the Austrian cavalry had not been detached to watch Suchet, those portions of the French army must have been entirely cut up. Even the right was obliged to give way at last; and Bonaparte ordered them to fall back by degrees, anxiously longing for the hour when he might expect the approach of Desaix.

It was past the middle of the day. De Melas (who had two horses shot under him), supposing the victory won, and greatly fatigued with the exertions of the morning, which few men of his age could have sustained, had returned to Alessandria, leaving the command to Zach. The broken centre and left of the French were falling back, in great disorder, upon San Giuliano; and the Austrians were following, more leisurely than Zouaves or Chasseurs de Vincennes would have done on such an occasion. The right wing was also retreating, but in good order. Lannes was two hours in retiring three-quarters of a league—halting, and charging with the bayonet, when the enemy approached and became too pressing. At length, about 3 P.M., the heads of the columns of Desaix's division were seen debouching on the plain, near San Giuliano. The first consul immediately rode up; and on encountering Desaix, his first words were, "What think you of the day?" "That we've lost the battle; but there's time to gain another," was the reply; and steps were immediately taken to retrieve the misfortunes of the previous eight hours. "The French soldier," says Scott, "understands, perhaps better than any other, the art of rallying after having been dispersed. The fugitives of Victor's division, though in extreme disorder, threw themselves into the rear of Desaix's position, and, covered by his troops, re-formed their ranks, and renewed their courage." Desaix had 6,000 fresh troops with him. Zach was advancing upon San Giuliano, at the head of about 5,000 men. The arrangements to stop him had to be made instantaneously; and if they failed, all would indeed be lost. Not daunted by the responsibility of their position, a few minutes sufficed for the first consul and Desaix to make their arrangements: all the other leading officers counselled a retreat; but of that Bonaparte would not hear. Desaix's fresh troops were formed in advance of San Giuliano, a little to the right of the high road: on their left were the relics of Victor's division; on their right, Lannes' demi-brigade: the whole formed an oblique line, from San Giuliano to Castel Ceriolo; and twelve pieces of artillery, all that were left, were ranged, under Marmont, in front of Desaix's brigade. The troops were scarcely formed when the Austrians appeared, "in order of march, rather than in order of battle," it is remarked. As soon as they were fairly in sight, Marmont discharged a shower of grapeshot upon them, to their great surprise. Desaix, at the same instant, led on one of his demi-brigades. He was on horseback; and, sending Savary to the first consul with the message that he was going to charge, and wanted some cavalry to support him, he gave the word, and the republicans advanced, with a brisk discharge of musketry. The Austrians returned it, and Desaix was mortally wounded at their first fire. His fall from his horse was seen by his troops, and appeared to inspire them with an intense desire for vengeance. The 9th light infantry, which he was leading, poured in their fire, and then, forming column, charged the enemy with an irresistible impetuosity; and their front line, broken up, fell back upon the second in complete disorder. The Austrians, however, stood their ground well; and the Hungarian grenadiers, advancing to the charge, made the French halt: a fearful discharge of musketry took place, and the French line wavered, broke, and fled. At this moment, Kellermann, who, with his dragoons 800 strong, had been concealed from the Austrians by the festoons of a vineyard, charged them when "they were rapidly advancing to follow up their success, in all the disorder and security of victory."* The column was cut in two; and such was the fearful slaughtering to the right and left, that the Hungarians, absolutely cowed, laid down their arms to the number of 2,000, and, with the general and his staff, were made prisoners. The rest fled in great disorder, and, in their route to the rear, threw into irretrievable confusion the other divisions which were advancing to their support. Then the remains of Victor's and Lannes' divisions attacked with renewed spirit the infantry of general Kaim, which was opposed to them; and retrieved the misfortunes of the early part of the day, by driving them, in the utmost disorder, towards the Bormida. The flying foe made for the bridges—some took the stream itself; amongst whom were the artillery, who not able to get on the bridges, which were choked up by the infantry, dashed into the river, where horses and guns were entangled in the mud, and twenty pieces fell into the hands of the republicans. The loss was great, and would have been much greater, had not baron de Melas hastened to the spot. He rallied the rear-guard in front of the bridges, and by a bold and determined courage, which reflects the greatest honour upon the men under the circumstances, they checked the pursuit, and gained time for their comrades to cross. Having reached the ground they left in the morning, the remnant of the troops re-formed, and retired to their quarters, depressed and spirit-broken; whilst the French were exulting over their hardly-won victory.

This was one of the most important victories Bonaparte ever gained; for if he had been defeated, he would have lost France. Yet the death of Desaix made the recollection of it unpleasant to him; for he seems never to have loved nor regretted any one so much as he did this young general, who was cut off at the early age of thirty-three. His body was found by Savary, and it was carefully embalmed by the orders of the first consul, who retained Savary and Rapp, who had been his aides-de-camp, near his own person. But he had soon to turn his thoughts from private friendship to public affairs. When baron de Melas retired to his quarters, and considered the position of his army, he found that the losses he had sustained were quite irreparable; and on the next morning (June 15th; 27th of Prairial), he sent prince Lichenstein with a flag of truce to the first consul, to solicit an armistice. The proposal was very acceptable to Bonaparte, whose position was not much more favourable than that of De Melas. He therefore at once assented; and the same day the terms were agreed to, and signed at Alessandria. They were as follows.

A general suspension of arms till the emperor could be referred to at Vienna; and if his approbation was received, the Austrians were to retire behind the line of the Mincio, with all the honours of war; and to surrender to the French all the fortresses they occupied. The latter were to be delivered up between the 16th and the 26th of June; the Austrian army to be divided into two columns, and to retire as fast as the fortresses were given up. M. de Melas had accumulated a vast store of provisions, which were to be divided equally between the contracting parties: the artillery at the Italian foundries to be delivered to the French, and that at the Austrian foundries to the imperialists; and the latter, on evacuating Lombardy, were to confine themselves behind the Mincio, the Fossa Maestra, and the left bank of the Po, from Borgo Forte to the mouth of the river, in the Adriatic. Peschiera and Mantua were left to the Austrian army.

The armistice signed, there was nothing to detain the first consul at Marengo; but before he left, he wrote a letter to the emperor of Austria, "amidst the sufferings of a multitude of wounded, and surrounded by 15,000 dead," to "beseech his majesty to listen to the voice of humanity, and not to permit two brave nations to slaughter each other for interests which were foreign to both." M. de St. Julien, one of the generals who possessed the confidence of the emperor of Austria, was sent to Vienna with this letter and the convention of Alessandria. On the 17th of June (29th of Prairial), the first consul left Marengo for Milan, where he instituted a provisional government till that of the Cisalpine republic could be thoroughly reorganised, and appointed general Jourdain the commissioner. He recognised the new pope, Pius VII. (whom he induced to liberate Talleyrand, ci-devant bishop of Autun, from his obligations as an ecclesiastic); and the Milanese having made preparations for a solemn Te Deum in the ancient cathedral, he determined to attend it. Writing to his colleagues, he said—"To-day, in spite of all that our Paris atheists may say, I am going in great state to the Te Deum which is to be sung in the cathedral of Milan." The same day, he assembled the clergy of Milan at the ducal palace, and addressed them in a very impressive speech. In the course of it, he said—"No society can exist without religion; there is no good morality without religion; it is only religion, then, which gives to a state good and lasting support. I inform you, that the churches in France have been opened again, that the catholic religion there resumes its former splendour, and the people look with respect to their old pastors, who return full of zeal to their old flocks." * * * "This is what I wished to communicate to you on the subject of the Christian religion, catholic and Roman. I wish that the expression of these opinions may remain engraven on your hearts, that you may give effect to what I have been saying. And I give permission for this to be communicated to the public through the press, in order that my opinions may be known, not only in Italy and France, but all through Europe." The publication of this speech produced a great effect in France.

CHAPTER III.

THE CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY; ALTERNATE SUCCESSES AND DEFEATS OF THE AUSTRIANS; ARMISTICE OF PARSDORF; THE FIRST CONSUL AT PARIS; FAILURE OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE; SECOND CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY; BATTLE OF HOHENLINDEN; ANOTHER ARMISTICE; SECOND CAMPAIGN IN ITALY; ARMISTICE OF TREVISO; MALTA TAKEN BY THE ENGLISH; AFFAIRS OF EGYPT; CONVENTION OF EL ARISCH; REFUSAL OF ENGLAND TO RATIFY IT; ASSASSINATION OF GENERAL KLEBER; INTERNAL CONDITION OF FRANCE; THE INFERNAL MACHINE.

THE first consul, having appointed Masséna commander-in-chief in Italy, left Milan on the 24th of June. He was accompanied by M. Duroc, his favourite aide-de-camp; M. de Bourrienne, his secretary; Savary, one of the officers he had attached to his person, in memory of Desaix; and Bessières, commandant of the consular guard. Before, however, we notice the events which transpired in the French capital towards the close of the year and the century, we must take a glance at the campaign in Germany, where misfortune had also awaited the Austrian arms.

The month of April was occupied by both Austrians and French in taking up their positions. The head-quarters of field-marshal Kray were at Donauschingen, in the grand-duchy of Baden. His right wing, 26,000 strong, rested on the Maine. It was commanded by general Starray, whose head-quarters were at Heidelberg. The left, consisting of 26,000 men, under the prince de Reuss, was in the Tyrol; with 7,000 militia, who occupied the Rheinthal, and the shores of the Lake of Constance. Kray commanded the centre division of 43,000 men, stationed behind the Black Forest, in the environs of Villingen and Donauschingen. Another body of 15,000, under Keinmayer, guarded the passes from the Reuchen to the Valley of Hell, and formed the connecting link between the centre and the right wing. Moreau had also divided his army into three corps. The centre, of 26,000 men, under Gouvion St. Cyr, occupied the left bank of the Rhine, from New Brisach to Plobsheim; the right, of 32,000 men, under Lecourbe, occupied Switzerland, from Basle to St. Gothard; and the left, of 21,000 men, under Sainte Suzanne, extended from Kehl to Haguenau. The reserve, composed of 28,000 fine troops, under Moreau himself, was in the neighbourhood of Basle. The campaign commenced on the 24th of April (4th of Floréal), when Moreau put his troops in motion. The remainder of the month was occupied in marchings and counter-marchings, which it would be of no interest to detail, the object being to deceive the Austrians as to the real intention of the French general, which was to cross the Rhine; and the Austrians were most desirous of preventing him. He, however, succeeded, by the 1st of May, in placing the entire army beyond that river. The corps under Moreau, St. Cyr, and Lecourbe, occupied a line, passing through Boudorf, Stühlingen, Schaffhausen, and Radolfzell, to the Lake of Constance; having taken, in their manœuvres, the fort of Hohentwiel (in which were forty guns), 1,500 prisoners, and six field-pieces.

On the 3rd of May, Lecourbe was ordered to march on Stockach, a walled town of Baden, fifteen miles N.W. of Lake Constance, where marshal Kray had placed immense magazines of provisions, and where the prince of Lorraine (Vaudemont) commanded with 12,000 men. Moreau himself advanced with the reserve on Engen, fifteen miles from Stockach, to support Lecourbe, if necessary. That general encountered the Austrians in various places, inflicting and suffering loss; and Stockach fell, with all its magazines, 4,000 prisoners, and 500 horses, on the 2nd of May. The same day, the French centre, 32,000 strong, which Moreau had removed, defeated 40,000 Austrians, under marshal Kray in person, in front of Engen. The fighting was severe; and the loss of each of the combatants was about 7,000 killed and wounded. The Austrians were again beaten at Möeskirch, in Styria, on the 6th of May; at Biberach, a village of Baden, on the 9th; and at Memmingen, on the Iller, on the 10th. Both the French and Austrians had many killed and wounded in these engagements; but the latter were the greatest sufferers, and, in consequence, abandoned all their positions between the Rhine, the Lake of Constance, the Danube, and the Lech; and Kray placed his division in an intrenched camp at Ulm. This camp was originally traced out by the archduke Charles, and occupied both banks of the Danube, and the heights of St. Michel. It was of great strength. The town and tête-du-pont on the river, were armed with 140 pieces of heavy cannon; the redoubts of the camp were lined with artillery, and the magazines were ample. From this position Kray was enabled to keep up his own communications, and also to threaten those of the French. At this time, in consequence of a message from the first consul, of which Carnot, the minister at war, was himself the bearer, Moreau sent off general Moncey, with 25,000 men, to Italy; and this nearly equalised the contending forces, notwithstanding the great losses of the Austrians, whose position at Ulm embarrassed Moreau. He felt that it must require a long time to take the camp, even if it could be taken at all; that it was not likely the imperialists would be tempted to quit it; and that it would be dangerous to push on in advance, and leave such a formidable foe in his rear. The circumstances dispirited the French, and encouraged the Austrians, whose soldiers, lodged in excellent quarters, we are told, "rapidly recovered their strength; while the morale of the army, which had been considerably weakened by the continued disasters of the campaign, as quickly rose, when they perceived that a stop was at length put to the progress of the enemy."

During the remainder of the month of May, Moreau employed various means, but all in vain, to dislodge the imperialists from this stronghold; whilst they made several sorties on their besiegers. In one of these enterprises, the archduke Ferdinand, on the 16th of May, inflicted a severe loss on the French left; and in another on the 24th, Kray put a considerable number of the republicans hors de combat. A third sortie took place on the 4th of June, when the Austrians assailed the left flank of the investing force, under the orders of Richepanse. This body was broken, and on the point of being completely routed; but was saved by Ney. That general receiving orders to support Richepanse, made such a vigorous assault upon the enemy with his division, that he caused them to pause in their career. The routed republicans rallied when they saw that their opponents were checked, and renewed the fight on their part. After another short struggle, the imperialists retired to their intrenchments with a loss of 1,000 prisoners, besides the killed and wounded.

Finding that he could make no impression on Ulm, Moreau resolved to cross the Danube below that town, and thus cut the Austrians off from their great magazine in Bohemia. He concentrated his forces between Günzburg and Donauwörth; and, on the 19th of June, effected the passage at Blindheim. As soon as this movement was known (which it was, in fact, while it was making), all the Austrian troops were ordered up, to drive the enemy back, if possible. Starray commanded in that quarter; and Kray sent the greater part of his cavalry and light artillery to support him. The shock between the opposing forces took place at Hochstadt. The Austrians were defeated after a bloody conflict, and retired behind the Brenz, leaving the French securely established on the left bank of the river. The consequences of this victory were very serious to the imperialists. In the recent actions, they had lost 4,000 prisoners and twenty pieces of cannon. Kray, cut off from his resources, was obliged to abandon the intrenched camp, and retire to Nördlingen, leaving 11,000 men in garrison at Ulm. He reached his destination on the evening of the 23rd, his troops having performed a perilous march—described as “a semicircle, of which the republicans occupied the chord”—chiefly by night. Moreau, as there was some distance between him and the Austrians (and he knew they could evade him if they pleased), resolved, instead of immediately pursuing them, to occupy Munich. General Decaen was dispatched on that service from Dillingen, with 10,000 men; and after defeating the troops under Meerfelt, by whom the city was protected, he made his entry on the 28th of June, just after the elector had left it, carrying away everything of value from the palace. At the same time, general Richepanse invested Ulm on both sides of the Danube; whilst Kray continued his retreat—abandoning all Swabia and Franconia. On the 29th of June, general Montrichard, with the republican vanguard, came up with the imperial rear-guard at Neuburg. He attacked them with great fury; but field-marshal Kray, while the contest was raging, brought up reinforcements, and the assailants were beaten, broken up, and thrown back two leagues, in great confusion. Kray then crossed the Danube, and descended the right bank to Landshut—a town on the Iser, in Lower Bavaria. There the rear-guard, under the archduke Ferdinand, remained; but the main body continued the retreat to the camp of Ampfing, on the Inn, where marshal Kray halted, occupying, also, the têtes-du-pont of Wasserburg and Mühl-dorf. Moreau, at that time (the beginning of July), had his front clear, and his advanced posts at Linz, on the Danube. He also occupied Moosburg, Freisingen, and Munich. The road to Vienna seemed to be open to him; and he had turned his attention to clearing his extreme right from the forces of the prince de Reuss, who, from the Tyrol, threatened his communications. At this period, intelligence of the battle of Marengo, and the suspension of arms at Alessandria, reached both armies, and led to proposals for an armistice being made by marshal Kray. Rest was necessary to imperialists and republicans alike; still, at first, Moreau did not appear inclined to peace. He, however, assented after several messages from the Austrian commander-in-chief; and, on the 15th of July, an agreement for a suspension of arms was signed at Parsdorf, a place situated in advance of Munich. By this armistice, it was stipulated that hostilities were to cease, and a notice of twelve days to be given before they were resumed. The French were to retain, for the present, possession of the country they occupied, from the Grisons to the source of the Inn; the valley of that river, from that point to the sources of the Lech; the intermediate country along the Iser, to its junction with the Danube; and from thence, by Weissenburg, to the Maine. In this vast tract, the imperialists held the fortresses of Ulm, Ingolstadt, and Philipsburg; the garrison of which they agreed not to augment till the conclusion of peace.

The first consul, after he left Milan, travelled with great rapidity till he reached Paris. He was received at Lyons, Dijon, and other places, by enthusiastic crowds, assembled to welcome his arrival; and he re-entered Paris on the 2nd of July. His return was not an hour too soon for his own interests. His sudden rise to power had created many enemies; and his dislike to the Jacobins caused them to be as decidedly opposed to him, as were the most ardent royalists. A courier had arrived at Paris with news of the disasters sustained at Marengo previous to the arrival of Desaix; and there had been delay in transmitting the intelligence of the victory. Those who were anxious for another political change, seized the opportunity to concert together, and they were joined by many personal enemies of the first consul. Some of this latter class went so far as to get up an “infernal machine,” consisting of a barrel of gunpowder, stuck round with grapeshot and pieces of old iron; which was to explode in a public street when the first consul was passing. They, however, tried its effect one day, to see how it would work; and this led to the arrest and imprisonment of several of their number.—For several weeks, the principal topic of conversation was, the necessity of “overturning the government, and avenging the crimes, of the 19th of Brumaire.” Many and fresh revolutionary projects were disturbed by the opportune arrival of the man against whom they were directed. The people, generally, evinced the greatest joy at his arrival, which they manifested in the usual way by ovations, illuminations, &c. These rejoicings had scarcely subsided, when M. de St. Julien arrived from Vienna, with an autograph letter from the emperor, accepting the armistices signed at Alessandria and Parsdorf—expressing his own desire for peace, and wishing Bonaparte to explain himself confidentially, and with perfect frankness, respecting the bases of a further negotiation. “I send to you,” said his imperial majesty, “the count de St. Julien, major-general in my army. He is charged with my instructions; and to point out to you how essential it is not to enter into public negotiations, likely to excite, prematurely, in so many nations, hopes, perhaps illusory, till it is ascertained, at least in a general manner, if the bases that you mean to propose for peace are such as to afford a prospect of obtaining that desirable end.” The emperor then stated that engagements, which could not be broken, bound him to England; and this rendered it the more desirable that the first consul’s views should be made known, in order that it might be seen how far they would coincide with those obligations.

The engagements alluded to, arose out of a treaty which had been signed at Vienna on the 12th of June, two days before the battle of Marengo. By that treaty, or convention, England agreed to advance the sum of £2,000,000 to Austria, free of interest, as long as the war continued, both parties binding themselves not to make a separate peace with the enemy for one year from the date of the agreement. Probably count de St. Julien was not aware of the existence of this treaty. At all events, on the 22nd of July he had an interview with prince Talleyrand; and the latter proposed, that they should not confine themselves to a mere convention, but draw up preliminary articles of peace. The Austrian envoy thought that he had not sufficient power. But the emperor's letter to Bonaparte contained the words—"You will give credit to everything which count St. Julien shall say on my part; and I will ratify whatever he shall do:" which, Talleyrand contended, really conferred upon him full powers to negotiate; and the count suffered himself to be convinced. The negotiations, therefore, proceeded; and, on the 28th of July, preliminaries, based on the articles agreed to at Campo Formio, were signed, the Rhine frontier being assigned to France; and particular indemnities for Austria being taken from Italy, instead of Germany, by which the Austrian territory would be carried beyond the Adige. As the usual forms of exchanging full powers had not been adhered to, because the Austrian ambassador had no full powers to exchange—he being sent, it appeared, rather to learn the first consul's views, than to make any definite arrangement—it was provided that the preliminaries should not bind the parties till they were ratified; and it was agreed that the ratification should be exchanged on the 18th of August.

On that day, count Lehrbach, sent as special envoy by the emperor of Austria, informed the French government, that he could not conclude a treaty to which England was not a party: but, he added, lord Minto, the English ambassador at Vienna, had assured M. Thugut, the Austrian minister for foreign affairs, that his government was quite willing to enter into negotiations. The first consul was very indignant at this communication; and he immediately announced that the armistice should expire on the 10th of September; at the same time, issuing orders that the army of reserve, then organising at Dijon, should enter Switzerland on the 5th; and that Augereau, with 18,000 men from Holland, under Lahn, should co-operate with the left of Moreau's army. Before these orders were carried out, he instructed M. Otto, who resided in London, under a safe-conduct from the British government, as agent for the exchange of prisoners of war, to propose a naval armistice to lord Grenville. This proposal was at first definitely rejected, as it was quite a novel idea to propose a naval armistice before the preliminaries of peace were signed. Anxious, however, to put an end to a destructive war, the British government offered to agree to a suspension of arms both by sea and land—Malta, and the harbours of Egypt, to be put on the same position as that in which Ulm, Philipsburg, and Ingolstadt were placed by the armistice of Parsdorf; the blockade of Brest and the maritime ports to be raised, so as not to impede commercial transactions; but the British squadrons not to quit their stations, and the French men-of-war not to be permitted to sail. Bonaparte would not agree to these terms without an important addition: he demanded, that his ships of the line only should be confined to the ports; that frigates should be permitted to sail; and that six frigates should be allowed to proceed from Toulon to Alexandria, without being visited by English cruisers. At the same time that he made this demand on England, he sent a message to Vienna, refusing to continue the armistice, or to proceed in the negotiations, unless Ulm, Philipsburg, and Ingolstadt were placed in the hands of France as a guarantee for the good faith of Austria. The emperor, owing to the state of his army, of which he had made himself an eye-witness, felt bound to submit to the demand; and, by a convention signed at Hohenlinden on the 28th of September, those fortresses were made over to France, and the armistice was prolonged for forty-five days, both in Germany and Italy. England, however, would not abandon her propositions; and the negotiations with her did not commence. The first consul, in consequence, intimated to Austria, that he would in future only treat with the two courts separately; and as Austria was bound, by the treaty of the 12th of June, not to adopt this course, both parties employed themselves, during the armistice, in preparations for prosecuting the war, when it expired, with renewed vigour.

At that time it was not known why Bonaparte insisted upon the liberty of sending six frigates to Egypt. We know now, from his own revelations, made at St. Helena, that it was to reinforce his army in Egypt. He intended the vessels should be armed en flute, and convey 3,600 troops and military stores to Alexandria, by which means he hoped to establish his authority there, and to defy all attempts to dislodge the republican army. As he could not effect anything in that quarter just then, he turned his attention to another. The interests of the northern powers, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, were directly opposed to the maritime code which England maintained formed part of the law of nations. They contended, that trade should be as free in war as in peace, except for articles technically termed "contraband of war;" that is, such as are actually used in warlike operations: and that "the flag should cover the goods;" that is, that goods of belligerents might be conveyed from place to place in neutral ships. These demands England would not yield: she claimed "the right of search" with respect to neutral vessels, to enable her cruisers to ascertain whether these vessels had merchandise belonging to belligerents on board; and, if that were the case, then she claimed the "right of confiscation." During the American war, in 1780, Catherine II., of Russia, formed a northern league to resist the claims and the practice of England; and in 1800, the emperor Paul, greatly pleased with Bonaparte for sending home the Russian prisoners,* at the instigation of France, suggested the league known as the "Armed Neutrality;" and although Denmark was obliged, by the presence of an English force, to sign a convention on the 24th of August, by which the right of search was for the time conceded, she ultimately joined the league, which was not formally organised till the 16th of December. In the meantime, Paul refused to listen to the entreaties of Austria to aid her in resisting the progress of a power which threatened to annihilate the independence of Europe; and Frederick William of Prussia also persisted in his system of neutrality, till, in December, he joined the league of the "armed neutrality," which was really an act of hostility to England. The formation of this league in Europe, was preceded by the signing of preliminaries for a treaty between the first consul and the United States of America, negotiated by Joseph Bonaparte, and signed on the 30th of September. The terms were, that the alliance should continue eight years, during which time certain modifications were to be made in the right of search; commerce was to be free between the two countries; and the captures that had, up to that time, been made on either side, were to be restored, except such as were contraband.

The armistice with Austria expired on the 15th of November. Before that time the Austrian army had been reinforced by 5,000 men sent by Bavaria; 18,000, the garrisons of the three fortresses of Ulm, Philipsburg, and Ingolstadt; and 15,000 recruits from the interior; the entire force on the Inn, to defend the entrances to the hereditary states, amounted to at least 110,000 men. Marshal Kray had retired, and the archduke John had taken the command. In Italy, field-marshal Bellegarde had about 100,000 men: but, in both instances, the effectiveness of the force was again lessened from the wide extent of territory over which it had to be distributed. To compete with these forces, Augereau had 20,000 men on the Maine; Moreau 110,000 in Bavaria; there were 80,000 troops in Italy, under Brune; a reserve of 10,000 chosen men at Amiens; and a second army of reserve of 15,000 men, to be augmented to 30,000, at Dijon. The number of French troops then in the field was estimated at quite 240,000; and it was supposed that the army of Egypt, the garrisons in the interior and along the coast, and the dépôts, amounted to an equal number; so that France had little short of half a million of men under arms.

The condition of France is represented as being greatly improved during the year VIII. of the republic; that is, since the overthrow of the directory. A better feeling had sprung up on religious matters. By a decree of July 26th (8th of Thermidor), the first consul had given every one liberty to observe what holidays he pleased; and though officials were still bound by the décade, by others Sunday became to be again generally observed. The prosperity of the people had made rapid advances; trade was brisk; and just before hostilities recommenced, the fundholders received half a year's dividend for the first time since 1790. Bonaparte, to whose wise government this agreeable change was attributed—as the successes of the French arms were ascribed to his bravery and generalship—was at the height of his popularity in consequence. He had also excited a furor among the Parisians, by removing to the Invalides, on the 22nd of September, with great pomp and ceremony, the body of Turenne from the care of M. Alexandre Lenoir, to whom it had been committed when the tombs of St. Denis were violated. When, therefore, it was announced that the armistice was at an end, and that the war was to be recommenced, there was no feeling prevalent in the French capital but manifestations of joy and exultation, and anticipations of more triumphs for the arms of France.

The French armies had orders to advance as soon as the armistice expired; and in Germany, Moreau crossed the Iser, whilst Augereau pressed forward into Bohemia, repulsing the Austrians at all points. On the 3rd of December he halted behind the Regnitz—a river of Upper Franconia, formed by the union of two smaller ones at Fürth—till Würzburg (then the capital of Franconia) was subdued. Thus the way was cleared for the operations of the left wing of Moreau, which was threatened by the strategies of the imperialists. That general had to force the line of the Inn, which forms the western frontier of Upper Austria. It was prodigiously strong, being flanked by the fortresses of Kufstein and Braunau, and defended by the natural bastions of the Tyrol, and the chain of the Böhmerwald, with their hardy and brave inhabitants. Amongst those of the Böhmerwald, the archduke Charles was then employed in organising a numerous body of troops. Had the imperialists defended this line, it is very improbable that the French could have forced it; but the archduke John resolved to cross the river, carry the war into Bavaria, advance to Hohenlinden, and throw the weight of his forces on Moreau's left. On the 27th of November, the imperialists moved towards Landshut: at the same time Moreau was concentrating his force, and advancing by Haag, towards Ampfing and Mühldorf. He was unaware of the movements of his enemy; but the archduke was apprised of his; and, on the 30th of November, had, in consequence, retraced a part of his way, and moved, by cross-roads, on Ampfing and Dorfen. This movement brought him, on the 1st of December, near Haag, into contact with three divisions of the French, under Grenier, Grandjeau, and Hardy; all of which were defeated, broken, and compelled to fall back, notwithstanding Ney did all he could to rally them, and restore the fortunes of the day. The movement should have been followed up without delay, and there is scarcely a doubt but that Moreau's forces would have been crippled and dispersed, and the campaign brought to a close. But the Austrians were inactive the remainder of that day, and also on the next; and thus the French general was enabled to retire upon Hohenlinden, and to reunite his beaten troops between the Inn and the Iser, at the outskirts of the forest of that name. Here he was attacked, on the 3rd, by the Austrians, who were divided into four columns, and advanced through the forest—only one, the centre, having the advantage of a good road, the others using paths intended exclusively for timber. They were to meet in the open space, extending between Hohenlinden and Harthofen; but before they could clear the forest they were attacked by the French in the midst of a snow-storm, and the laurels of the 1st of December were wrenched from them. They were completely defeated, losing 10,000 men, who were left dead on the field; 7,000 prisoners, amongst whom were two generals; eighty pieces of cannon, and 200 caissons. Moreau lost no time in securing the advantages of his victory. He had lost 10,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, since the 30th of November; but, with the remainder, he marched to the Inn, behind which the whole imperial army had retired; crossed that river on the 9th of December, driving the Austrians before him, and capturing Salzburg on the 13th; his only mischance having been the discomfiture of one of his divisions, under Montrichard, before Salzburg, which was driven back by the Austrian cavalry, with a loss of 500 men. The archduke Charles was now once more placed at the head of the Austrian army. Had he occupied that post at first, the probability is, that that army would not have been defeated. But he found it impossible to retrieve the disasters which the incapacity of his brother (who was, it may be remarked, brave as a lion, though incompetent as a commander) had mainly caused; and, the road to Vienna being open, he sued for an armistice. It was refused, unless Austria would consent to conclude a separate peace. Necessity—for though the Austrians had gained some advantages over Augereau since the battle of Hohenlinden, and Moreau was in a perilous situation if he had been opposed by a good general and a resolute army, yet the archduke could not depend upon his—obliged the Austrian general to yield; and, on the 27th of December, the armistice* was acceded to, and war, for the present, ceased.

In Italy success had also attended the French arms. Macdonald, with the army of reserve from Dijon, had crossed the Splugen between the 26th of November and the 7th of December, on which latter day he arrived at Chiavenna, on the Lake of Como; his only loss being a battalion of dismounted hussars, who were captured, owing to their own negligence, by a well-concerted movement of the imperialists. On arriving in Italy, by order of the first consul, he placed himself under the command of Brune; and, in advancing to join him, his right wing was twice repulsed in an attempt to surmount Monte Tonal, which lies between the Oglio and the Adige; but his left wing spread itself into the Engadine, a valley in the Grisons, and took two important stations—Glurens and Martinsbruck, on the Tyrolean side of the mountains. Brune did not commence hostilities till he had received intelligence of the victory of Hohenlinden, and the passage of the Splugen. The Mincio was then crossed, on the 20th of December, near Molino, by two divisions under Dupont and Suchet, who had to sustain a most desperate combat with the Austrians on the left bank, being alternately repulsed and victorious; and the village of Pozzuolo was taken and retaken four times, ultimately remaining in the possession of the Austrians. On the 26th, the remainder of the army crossed; fighting desperately as they reached the eastern shore, but driving the Austrians before them at last, who fell back towards the Adige, leaving garrisons in Mantua, Verona, Legnago, and Peschiera: thus reducing the army under marshal Bellegarde to 40,000 men. In the struggle on the Mincio, they had lost about 3,000 men killed, and near 4,000 prisoners, with forty pieces of cannon. After more fighting, mostly to the advantage of the French, though they were beaten on two or three occasions, the two generals, Bellegarde and Brune, agreed to an armistice at Treviso, on the 10th of January, 1801.

* Known as the armistice of Steyer

The Austrians gave up Peschiera, Verona, Legnago, Ancona, and Ferrara, but retained Mantua, much to the displeasure of the first consul, who never employed Brune again, because he did not insist upon its surrender.

Whilst the French were thus successful in Germany and Italy, Malta surrendered to the British blockading force on the 15th of September, 1800; and the French troops in Egypt were subjected to the greatest hardships. The desertion—for that is the right name—of Bonaparte created the most intense dissatisfaction; and Kléber is said to have declared that the same world should not contain them both. The disposition of the troops, and their real inability to defend themselves against the united Turkish and English force which it was anticipated would be brought against them (and a large Turkish army was concentrating under the grand vizier), induced Kléber to agree to a convention for the evacuation of the country; which was signed at El Arisch—a fort captured by the Turks a few days before—on the 24th of January, 1800. The parties to this convention were Sir Sidney Smith, on the part of England; general Desaix, acting for general Kléber, on the part of France; and the grand vizier, on that of the sultan. The tenor of the agreement was, that the republican army was to be collected in three divisions—at Alexandria, Rosetta, and Aboukir—which, with their baggage and effects, were to be embarked in vessels provided by the first consul, or by the Porte, and conveyed to France. Sir Sidney Smith had been minister plenipotentiary from his Britannic majesty to the Ottoman Porte; but lord Elgin now occupied that post; and the gallant admiral had not the necessary powers to bind the British government to this agreement. That government had received information of the wish of the French army to evacuate Egypt; and had sent instructions to lord Keith to agree to a convention for bringing them to Europe; but only as prisoners of war. His lordship received those instructions at Minorca, before the convention of El Arisch was fully carried out; and that convention, of course, fell to the ground. The French had, in fact, acted upon it; for they had given up all their positions on the right bank of the Nile, and some of those in the Delta, Damietta and the fort of Lesbeh included; and their troops were already on the route for Alexandria, with their baggage and stores. They refused, however, to surrender themselves prisoners; and Sir Sidney Smith proposed that the armistice should be continued, as the terms of the convention of El Arisch had been sent to London, and he had not the least doubt but they would be ratified. Kléber was quite willing to agree to this proposal; but the grand vizier demanded that Cairo should also be immediately given up by the French. This was refused, and hostilities were resumed. On the 10th of March, the army of the grand vizier—which was intrenched near the village of El Matarieh, on the plains of Heliopolis, and in advance of the ruins of that ancient city—was attacked by the French troops from Cairo, and totally defeated, losing more than 8,000 men in killed and wounded. One thing which tended to gain the French the victory, was the defection of the Mameluke, Murad Bey, at the head of 600 splendid cavalry, who made terms with the French, because he thought the Turks were about to reconquer Egypt, not for the Mamelukes, but for themselves. Kléber followed up his success by driving the remnants of the vizier's army completely out of Egypt into the Syrian desert; and, by the 25th of April, the supremacy of the republicans was restored: they had regained all they had given up, and stood in a much better position, substantially, than they did when the convention of El Arisch was signed; besides having recovered their prestige, and revived their spirits. Sir Sidney Smith was right as to the course which the British government would pursue. He was authorised to carry out the convention of El Arisch, or conclude another on the same terms; but, on the 14th of June, Kléber was assassinated by a fanatic Mohammedan, who imagined the desire he felt to slay the enemy of the prophet and the grand signor, was an inspiration from heaven. The assassin was seized, and condemned to die; but the barbarity of his execution disgraced his executioners. He was impaled alive, and endured unspeakable tortures for four hours, without flinching in the least. Then death put an end to his sufferings. The body of Kléber was interred with great pomp; a monument was raised to his memory, and a medal struck in his honour; and every one expressed sincere regret at the loss of so excellent an officer. He was succeeded by baron Menou, who refused to evacuate Egypt. This officer really carried out in practice what Bonaparte only professed in theory. He married a Turkish woman, embraced the Mohammedan religion, and took the name of Abdallah Menou. This renegadism did him no good, as he was ridiculed by the French, and forfeited the respect even of the most dissolute amongst them, while it did not in the least tend to conciliate the Turks. He, however, maintained the French authority in Egypt till the English had made the necessary arrangements for driving him out, which they resolved to do, when they found he was not to be induced by fair means to evacuate the territory of their ally.

At this period (the closing months of 1800), notwithstanding "the external position of France was daily becoming more brilliant," and its internal condition more prosperous, she "exhibited a spectacle, at times frightful, of the last convulsions of expiring parties." In the south, bands of robbers were so persevering, and so successful in their depredations, that Bonaparte proclaimed martial law to suppress them; and this made a number of desperate men his enemies, in addition to those who opposed him from political motives. The latter resorted to plans of assassination; and in those plans, Italians at first were the most active. Arena, a Corsican; Giuseppe Ceracchi, Diana, and Demerville, Italian refugees; and Lebrun, an historical painter, a native of Marseilles, and a pupil of David—conspired, with others, to assassinate the first consul at the opera. The attempt was to have been made on the night of the 10th of October; but one Harel, a conspirator, revealed to Bourrienne the intentions of the assassins; and Ceracchi and Diana were arrested in the lobby of the opera-house, armed and fully prepared for the attempt. Singular as it appears, these conspirators were not punished, nor the circumstances of the plot made public, till some royalists disgraced themselves and their cause by also making an attempt upon the life of Bonaparte, with what was called at the time, and since, an "infernal machine." At first the royalists believed, from Bonaparte's hatred of the Jacobins, that he would restore the Bourbons. This led to the letters of Louis XVIII., to which we have already adverted; and to the readiness evinced by some of the royalist chiefs, who had been leaders in Normandy and the Vendée against the directory, to enter into terms of accommodation with him. But when it was quite apparent that the directory had been overthrown and the monarchy restored in fact, though not in name, for the benefit of Bonaparte alone, some royalists resolved to rid the world of one whom they looked upon as the usurper of the rights of others, as well as the only obstacle to the restoration of the Bourbons. Some time before, a Jacobin, named Chevalier, assisted by another named Veyrer, had invented a machine, consisting of a hollow cylinder filled with combustibles, that could be exploded by the application of a match; and of this machine the conspirators resolved to avail themselves. On the night of Christmas-eve, the first consul was engaged to go to the opera with Josephine. He evinced little disposition to keep his engagement; and, falling asleep after dinner, had to be awakened by Josephine, who found him extremely reluctant to move. However, after a short delay, he arose, dressed, and, joining his wife and suite, they repaired to their carriages. The carriage in which the first consul rode was in advance of Josephine's; who had been retarded for a minute or two whilst general Rapp adjusted her shawl, which she playfully asked him to do for her, "after the style of the Turkish ladies." Bonaparte, with whom were Lannes and Bessières, had again fallen asleep as soon as he had entered the carriage. The cortège was going through the narrow street of St. Nicaise, and he was dreaming that he was passing the Tagliamento by torchlight, when there was a terrible flood, which lifted up the carriage by its force. At the moment he awoke, a tremendous noise was heard, and a bright flame appeared to be blazing around him. "We are blown up!" he exclaimed: but the coachman drove on furiously; and it subsequently appeared that he was drunk, and imagined the noise was a cannonade in honour of his master. The machine had been discharged just as the carriage passed with great rapidity. A second or two earlier it would have done its work; and if Josephine had followed the first consul instantaneously from the Tuileries, her carriage would have been destroyed. The machine exploded between the two;* and, though the first consul and his consort escaped, the consequences were lamentable. Twenty persons were killed; fifty-three were wounded; and several houses were much damaged. The party whom it was designed to destroy entered the opera-house unhurt, and was received with the usual demonstrations of welcome. These had not subsided, when the box-door was opened. Bonaparte eagerly exclaimed, "Josephine!"—being about to inquire where she was; but seeing her, he sat down, merely saying—"The rascals wanted to blow me up." By this time an agitation was observed in the house; groups gathered in the lobbies; and soon the narrow escape of the first consul was known. Then the audience rose as one man, and the warmest congratulations were expressed. These Bonaparte acknowledged from his box, and soon after returned to the Tuileries.

This attempt caused the police to proceed against the former conspirators, and to take steps to trace those who were guilty in that of December. Bonaparte was very violent on the subject, attributing the attempt to the Jacobins. Some one wished to direct his thoughts into another channel; but he flew into a passion, and exclaimed—"I am not to be bamboozled. This is no attempt of Chouans, emigrants, or ci-devant nobles and priests. I know the authors; I shall be sure to get at them, and to inflict upon them an exemplary punishment." The next day there was an animated scene before the council of state, the first consul maintaining that there were "ten thousand scoundrels spread over the whole country, who had persecuted all the honest people, and who were steeped in blood. The chiefs of these men," he said, "must be struck boldly, and the others would disperse. Fifteen or twenty of the villains must be shot, and two hundred of them transported;" and he declared he was "ready to constitute himself sole judge; to have the culprits brought before him, to examine them, to try them, and to have sentence of justice executed." The council were astonished at this ebullition, which only one man, admiral Truguet, opposed. The next day Cambacérès summoned the council to his own house, and endeavoured to excuse the warmth of the first consul. Several other meetings were held, in which that functionary suggested the idea of a new law, which the first consul had conceived; but the year closed before anything was concluded, either as to who were the real offenders, or as to the new law which Bonaparte wished to enact.

CHAPTER IV.

CLOSE OF THE 18TH, AND OPENING OF THE 19TH, CENTURY; PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE CONSPIRATORS OF OCTOBER AND DECEMBER; NEW CRIMINAL LAW; TREATY OF LUNEVILLE; DIFFERENCES WITH NAPLES; GALLANT DEFENCE OF PORTO FERRAJO; THE "ARMED NEUTRALITY;" ENGLISH EXPEDITION TO THE BALTIC; BATTLE OF COPENHAGEN; ASSASSINATION OF THE EMPEROR PAUL; ENGLISH EXPEDITION TO EGYPT; BATTLE OF ALEXANDRIA; THE FRENCH EVACUATE EGYPT; BATTLE OF ALGEZIRAS; TREATY BETWEEN ENGLAND AND RUSSIA; NEW ARRANGEMENTS IN ITALY; AFFAIRS OF PORTUGAL AND SPAIN; PREPARATIONS TO INVADE ENGLAND; ATTACK ON THE FLOTILLA AT BOULOGNE; PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE CONCLUDED WITH ENGLAND; TREATIES WITH BAVARIA, THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, RUSSIA, TURKEY, AND ALGIERS; THE PEACE OF AMIENS.

THE 18th century closed, and the 19th opened, under circumstances very favourable to France, which country seemed rapidly recovering material prosperity at home, and acquiring glory and honour abroad. Her influence was established nearly all over the continent; Portugal and Turkey being the only powers that had not succumbed to the arms or the diplomacy of Bonaparte, who, by a "succession of fortunate events, had consolidated his power, and was, de facto, ruler of France,"* and appeared to hold in his hand the destinies of Europe. On all hands changes seemed imminent. "We are standing," said his brother Lucien, "amid the graves of old, and beside the cradles of new, institutions;" and no one could tell where innovation and revolution would stop. The only power that appeared able and willing to resist the progress of the great colossus was England; and even her government took a step which, right enough in every sense of the word, might, being taken just at that time, be construed into a concession to that republic whose power and resources were wielded by one who was certainly the most remarkable man of the era. On the 1st of January a royal proclamation was published in the London Gazette, announcing the future style and title of the sovereign, as—"George the Third, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, king, defender of the faith;" the title of king of France being laid aside. No disposition was, however, shown by the English government to waver in its opposition to the aggressive and encroaching policy of the first consul; though Austria was about to conclude a separate peace with him, contrary to her treaty with England of the previous June; and the northern powers, influenced by the emperor Paul of Russia, had entered into that league which, they fondly hoped, would deprive England of her maritime supremacy.

The successful ruler of France was engaged, in the first days of 1801, in taking steps to punish the actors in the conspiracy of the 24th of December, which had so nearly put an end to his rule and his life. Under the impression that it was a Jacobin plot, he and Fouché made out a list of 153 individuals, who were termed "Terrorists;" many of whom had figured in the wildest scenes of the revolution; and, amongst them, were those members of the council of five hundred, who had been most violent in the opposition made to Bonaparte on the 8th of November (18th of Brumaire), 1799. The council of state was asked—but in truth commanded—by Bonaparte to sanction a report, attributing to these men crimes of every description, including assassination. "All these men," it was stated in the document, "have not taken up the dagger; but all are universally known to be capable of pointing it, and of using it." As soon as this report was agreed to, the first consul, on the 4th of January (15th of Nivôse), drew up and signed a decree, sentencing all these men† to be transported beyond the seas, without trial, and without hearing. The next day the senate declared, that this act of the first consul was necessary to the preservation of the constitution. Then the conspirators of the 10th of October were proceeded against. Chevalier and Veyrer, said to have been the original inventors of the "infernal machine," were tried by a military tribunal—condemned, and sentenced to be shot; which sentence was immediately carried into execution. Arena, Ceracchi, Topino-Lebrun, Demerville, and Diana, were tried before the ordinary tribunal, for the conspiracy of October. The latter was acquitted; the others were condemned and executed, the principal evidence against them being that of the informer Harel. The trial took place on the 9th, the execution on the 31st, of January.

During these proceedings Fouché was endeavouring to unravel the plot of December; and, from a clue obtained through a female, the police were put upon a track, by which it was ascertained that the conspiracy to assassinate the first consul on Christmas-eve had originated with the Chouan Georges Cadoudal, then in England; and two of his agents, named St. Réjant and Limoëlan—the former of whom had set fire to the match, and was himself wounded in the explosion—were arrested, tried, condemned, and executed. Under the bed of St. Réjant a letter to Georges was found, in which he had narrated the principal circumstances of the attempt, and justified himself for its failure. Fouché had, from the first, contended that the conspiracy of December was not a Jacobite plot; and he was severely censured, holding this opinion, for sanctioning the transportation of the 153 so-styled “Terrorists.” Those men were all collected and dispatched to Nantes the day after Bonaparte had condemned them, but they were not deported. They were allowed to live in France, under the surveillance of the police, being prohibited for some time from visiting Paris.

The first consul was not satisfied with the punishment of the conspirators: he wanted a law which would enable him to punish future offenders, if not in an absolutely arbitrary manner, still, that there should not be any delay; and without affording them the slightest chance of escape. He sent a draft of such a law before the tribunate, where it was opposed most vehemently by Benjamin Constant, Daunon, Chenier, and others; and only carried by forty-nine to forty-one. There was also a considerable minority against it in the legislative body. The new tribunal, created by this law, was called the “Special Commission Court.” It consisted of eight judges, in three classes:—1st, the president, and two judges of the ordinary criminal tribunal; 2nd, three military men, bearing at least the rank of captain; 3rd, two citizens, to be chosen by the government, from the persons pointed out by the constitution as being qualified for judges. Thus five out of the eight were directly nominated by government. Offenders were to be brought before this tribunal, which decided without a jury; and no appeal was allowed against their decision, or any revision of the sentence. Upon a trial, not fewer than six members of the court were to be present; of whom four had to agree in a sentence of guilty; and if all the members were present, then six must so agree. Before this tribunal, all persons taken in arms; all those charged with conspiracy; and the chaffeurs—that is, the robbers already alluded to, who rendered travelling so unsafe, and whose existence was one of the ostensible reasons for proposing the law—were to be brought. Another law was passed, even more arbitrary; by which the executive government was authorised to banish any parties suspected of entertaining opinions opposed to it, whether they gave them effect in overt actions or not. All branches of the legislature were opposed to these laws; but except in the tribunate, the opponents were too cautious to make any very decided demonstration. The first consul exulted in his success. “He made use of the boldest language; and, on more than one occasion,” writes Thiers, “hesitated not to declare, ‘that, if he was too much annoyed—if people would endeavour to prevent him from restoring peace and order to France—he would rely upon the opinion which the country had of him, and govern by consular ordinances.’” His ascendancy increased every moment with success; his boldness with his ascendancy; and he was no longer at the pains of dissembling the extent of his designs.” All who in any degree thwarted him, were made to feel his anger in some way or other. After Benjamin Constant had opposed the law for the “Special Commission Court,” madame de Stäel, who was visiting him, was banished from France. Fouché at first attempted to check his violent denunciations of the Jacobins, and incurred, in consequence, his anger, which was scarcely withdrawn when the minister of police assisted him in making out the list of the 153 proscrits. He subsequently remodelled the police, so as to control somewhat the conduct of Fouché, and to enable him to become acquainted, as he thought, with all that minister’s proceedings. But Fouché was more than a match for him. He gave Bourrienne 25,000 francs a-month; and Josephine 1,000 francs a-day; and whilst the former informed him exactly of all the proceedings of Bonaparte, the latter revealed to him all that passed in the interior of the Tuileries.

Whilst the first consul was engaged with the domestic occurrences just narrated, he was carrying on negotiations with Austria; involved in differences with Naples; and had to conduct the continued hostilities with England. The result of the armistices of Steyer and Treviso was, that negotiators from Austria and France—M. Cobentzel for one, and Joseph Bonaparte for the other—met at Luneville, a town of France, in the department of the Meurthe, in January. They discussed the terms of a treaty; and the warm words which on more than one occasion occurred between them, rendered it very doubtful, for some time, whether any agreement would be come to. On the 9th of February, however, the treaty of Luneville was signed; by which, for the second time, a commanding position in Italy and on the left bank of the Rhine, was ceded to France. The emperor gave up all the territory on that bank, extending from Switzerland to Holland; the German princes who yielded territory there being indemnified by cessions on the right bank. Lombardy was declared independent, and the Adige made the boundary between that country and the dominions of Austria in Italy; Venice, with its territorial possessions to the left bank of that river, being guaranteed to the emperor. The duke of Modena gave up his duchy, to be annexed to the Cisalpine republic; and received the Brisgau in exchange. The emperor's brother, the grand-duke of Tuscany, gave up his dominions, on the promise of an indemnity in Germany, to the infant duke of Parma, who was a branch of the royal family of Spain. France gave up Kehl, Cassel, and Ehrenbreitstein, on condition that those forts should remain in the situation in which they were when she evacuated them. The independence of the Batavian, Helvetic, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics, was guaranteed, and their inhabitants were to be allowed to "have the power of choosing any government they pleased."* These terms did not differ materially from those of the treaty of Campo Formio, or from the offers which Bonaparte made before hostilities broke out after the armistice of Parsdorf; and as the French had obtained great successes at Marengo, Hohenlinden, and on the Mincio, this may be regarded as a proof of his moderation. But the treaty involved the emperor in differences with the princes of Germany. He signed it, "not only as emperor of Austria, but in the name of the Germanic empire." This he had no right to do; for, although he was the head of the empire, he could not bind the minor sovereigns without their concurrence and consent, which, in this case, were not given. Bonaparte insisted: as Scott remarks, he threw his sword into the scale; and the emperor—to quote his own words, from his Apology to the Electors of Germany, which appeared on the 8th of February—was induced to comply, by "the consideration of the melancholy situation in which, at that period, a large part of Germany was placed; the prospect of the still more calamitous fate with which the superiority of the French menaced the empire, if the peace was any longer deferred;" and, "the general wish, which was loudly expressed, in favour of an instant accommodation." This appeal induced the diet to ratify the treaty; but the question of indemnities long distracted the Germanic body.

With Naples, the first consul was involved in a short war; and, at the same time, there was an insurrection to suppress in Piedmont. It broke out on the 15th of January, and was the result of the exactions of the French troops, and the annexation of Vermicelli to the Cisalpine republic. The peasants of the valley of Aosta were the first to take up arms. They expelled the republicans, shutting up a depôt of conscripts in the fortress of Ivrea. There were movements, also, at Turin and other quarters; but Soult and Murat had very little difficulty in suppressing them. The king of Naples, restored to his dominions by the allies, felt himself bound to assist them in the campaign of 1800. He did so, however, very inefficiently. After the armistice of Treviso, his army kept the field—one portion occupying the Roman states; and another, by advancing into Tuscany, encouraged the inhabitants of Sienna and Arezzo to throw off the French yoke. General Miollis, who commanded the French army in Tuscany, encountered the Neapolitans, under count Roger de Damas, near Sienna, on the 14th of January, and dispersed them almost without a struggle. The revolted towns again submitted; and Murat, at the head of 28,000 men, marched for Naples. But the forethought of the queen had secured a friend. When the winter campaign commenced in Italy, fearful of the result, she had proceeded to St. Petersburg, to beseech the czar, should that result be disastrous, to intercede with the first consul on behalf of Ferdinand. Paul was flattered by the application; and at once dispatched M. Lowascheff, an officer high in his confidence, and who held the post of "grand huntsman" of Russia, to plead for Naples, should a desire again to occupy the Neapolitan territory be displayed by the first consul, in the event of his arms being successful. This officer was courteously received by Bonaparte, whose anxiety to still further cement his friendship with Paul, led him to assent to the wishes of the autocrat—though that assent was more a form than a reality. Lowascheff was requested to go to Italy, and arrest the march of Murat. He arrived at Florence at the same time that the French general made his entry into that city; and the result of his arrival was, the armistice of Foligno, signed on the 9th of February. By the terms of that agreement, the Neapolitan troops were immediately to evacuate the Roman states; and all the ports of Naples and Sicily were instantly to be closed against English vessels of merchandise as well as of war, and remain so till the conclusion of peace. A treaty, founded on the terms of the armistice, was signed at Florence on the 18th of March. It contained the same provision against English ships as the armistice; and the prohibition against entering Neapolitan ports was extended to Turkish vessels. Porto Ferrajo, in the island of Elba; Piombino, in Tuscany; and a small tract on the sea-coast of that duchy, were ceded to France; and, in addition to stipulations respecting the cessation of political persecutions, the restoration of paintings and statues carried off from Rome, &c., it was agreed that Naples should surrender three frigates, ready armed, to

France; and that in case of a menaced attack from the troops of England or Turkey, a French corps should be sent to aid the government of Naples, and to act with a force which the emperor of Russia had promised to supply under such circumstances. By a secret article, the Neapolitan government agreed to receive from 12,000 to 15,000 French troops in the gulf of Tarentum; and promised to pay 500,000 francs (£20,000) per month to this contingent, besides furnishing all the provisions it might require. On the 1st of April, 12,000 men, under Soult, marched from Central Italy, for Naples; and, before the month closed, to the surprise of Europe, they took possession of the fortresses of Tarentum, Otranto, and Brindisi; and of all the harbours in the extremity of Calabria. Bonaparte, in his instructions to Soult, ordered him to preserve order; to suppress any appearance of revolution; and to attend mass with military music. He was also informed, that he must "maintain his army at the expense of Tuscany and Naples, as the republic was so overwhelmed by the return of its armies to the territory of France," after the treaty of Luneville, "that he [Bonaparte] could not send them a single farthing." He also ordered that Porto Ferrajo—which was held by a garrison of 300 British, 800 Tuscan, and 400 Corsican troops, under governor Airley—should be reduced. But his soldiers were unable to obey his orders. The governor made a gallant resistance; and it was, says Dunias, "an extraordinary spectacle, in the midst of triumphal songs, and in the bosom of a continental peace, to see an island, easy of access, and almost touching the continent, the scene of a long-continued and doubtful strife." That strife was steadily maintained; and Bonaparte's troops were unable to reduce the fortress, which was only surrendered in the following year, as a condition of the peace of Amiens. The frigates given up to France by the treaty of Foligno, were intended for Egypt; and one object which Bonaparte had in sending his troops to Naples, was to reinforce the army in the former country; which he thought he might be enabled to do, probably, from the ports of that kingdom. When he left Egypt, he had promised Kléber to send reinforcements speedily. He had not forgotten his promise; but had been unable to fulfil it. Admiral Gantheaume had sailed from Toulon with a squadron of ships of the line and transports, having from 5,000 to 6,000 men on board; but the English were on the watch; and the admiral had to put back, with difficulty regaining the harbour. Other attempts failed; and though the French naval commanders were constantly on the lookout to evade the enemy, only two frigates, with 500 or 600 men, reached Egypt. The occupation of the Neapolitan ports had no better result.

Successful in the south, Bonaparte was now to meet with disappointment in the north, where his efforts to organise a maritime confederacy against England, and to get Russia to join him in attacks upon her Indian empire, were signally thwarted. We have already mentioned the "armed neutrality," which the emperor Paul was mainly instrumental in organising; and that sovereign had, no doubt, received hints and suggestions, if not specific directions, from Bonaparte as to the course he should pursue. This league, to which Russia, Sweden, and Denmark were parties, and which Prussia ultimately joined, was ostensibly directed, as we have already stated, against the right of search, claimed by England, to prevent her enemies, in time of war, from carrying on their commerce in neutral vessels, and in defence of the principle, that "the flag covers the goods:" but it was really a blow aimed by Bonaparte at the commercial greatness and maritime supremacy of Great Britain. By the "league" entered into, and the agreement signed by the four powers, arms of all sorts, and saddles and bridles, were alone deemed "contraband of war;" all other articles, it was stated, "should not be subject to confiscation, but should pass free, and without restraint;" whether they belonged to the subjects of the contracting parties, or to those of the belligerent powers. The four powers agreed mutually to defend each other, if disquieted or attacked on account of the convention; and it was stipulated, that the principles promulgated in the agreement, should apply to every maritime war by which Europe might unhappily be visited. The ports of the Baltic were closed against England till she assented to the conditions demanded by the "league."

The naval armament with which England was at that time threatened, was of a formidable description; the fleets of the northern powers and France comprising the following ships of the line, and other vessels:—

	Ships of the Line.	Frigates.	Smaller Vessels.
Russia	82	40	—
Denmark	23	31	—
Sweden	18	14	74
France	50	40	—
Total	173	125	74

Besides this numerous armament, the Dutch and Spanish fleets were at the disposal of the first consul, who, within three months after the league of the "armed neutrality" was signed, obtained the control also of the Neapolitan ships of war. A serious danger, therefore, threatened England, which prompt and determined action only could avert.

Mr. Pitt was at that time at the head of affairs in England; and, under his auspices, the most decisive steps were taken to make the offensive measures adopted against that country, recoil on their originators, and break up the league. On the 14th of January, an order in council was issued, laying an embargo on all vessels belonging to the confederates, which might be in British ports, except those of Prussia, whose adhesion to the league was not then known in England; letters of marque were issued for the Baltic; and a fleet was collected at Yarmouth, to proceed to that sea, and crush the league before the various fleets of the confederates could be all collected together and directed against this country. This fleet consisted of seventeen sail-of-the-line, carrying seventy-four and fifty guns; four frigates, four sloops, two fire-ships, and seven bombs. The command was given to Sir Hyde Parker; lord Nelson being the second in command, and rear-admiral Graves the third. The squadron sailed from Yarmouth on the 12th of March, Mr. Pitt having just resigned; and Mr. Addington succeeded him as premier of England. It arrived in the Cattegat on the 26th. Mr. Vansittart, who was on board Sir Hyde Parker's ship, immediately went to Copenhagen with a flag of truce; but all attempts to induce the Danes to abandon the "armed neutrality" failed. It was then resolved to attack the fleet collected at Copenhagen, and the Sound was passed on the 30th—a fierce bombardment being kept up from the castle of Cronenburg, and a number of batteries erected on the shore. But the shots fell short of the British ships, and the fleet arrived before Copenhagen the same day. The 31st of March, and the 1st of April, were employed by Nelson in sounding a narrow channel leading to the city; so intricate, that the Danes thought they might defy the approach of a hostile fleet. This service effected, it was resolved that the attack should take place on the 2nd of April. The defences were formidable. Six sail-of-the-line, eleven floating batteries, mounting from eighteen to twenty-eight heavy guns; one bomb-ship, and a number of schooners, were flanked by the Crown batteries, which were two artificial islands at the mouth of the harbour, mounting sixty-six guns, according to the Danish account; but Nelson said he counted eighty-eight. The command of the attacking squadron was given to Nelson. It consisted of twelve out of the seventeen ships of the line, and all the frigates, fire-ships, and bomb-vessels that accompanied the squadron. The attack was successful. After fighting four hours, the fire of the batteries was silenced, and seventeen ships, small and great, struck their colours. Negotiations were then resumed; a suspension of hostilities followed; and the "armed neutrality" was virtually dissolved.

The very day that the conditions of the armistice were agreed upon by the crown prince of Denmark and Nelson, intelligence reached Copenhagen, that Paul, the emperor of Russia, had been assassinated by his nobles, in the night between the 23rd and 24th of March. When the news reached Paris it had a serious effect upon the first consul. A passionate exclamation of "My God!" escaped him; and for some time he appeared to be in deep and anxious thought. He felt that his alliance with Russia was endangered, and that the accomplishment of one of his darling schemes was rendered more than doubtful. This scheme was, to attack the British possessions in India; in which attack Paul had engaged to aid him. Twenty-five thousand Russian troops and 50,000 Cossacks were to have joined the French army; and a passage through Persia was secured. It is doubtful whether such an expedition would have succeeded; but, had it been undertaken, it would certainly have tasked the resources and the energies of the British empire in the east, where the marquis of Wellesley was governor-general; and his brother, afterwards the celebrated duke of Wellington, held a high command in the Indian army.

Before Mr. Pitt retired from the British ministry, he had been induced, by Mr. Henry Dundas (subsequently created lord Melville), then secretary for war, to send an expedition to Egypt. The king, George III., was opposed to this measure; and declared that it was with the greatest reluctance that he consented to engage the flower of his army in a dangerous expedition, against such a distant province. In this instance, however, as in many others, adventurous daring, zeal, and energy, were crowned with success. The troops which had been employed at Minorca and elsewhere, under Sir Ralph Abercromby, were collected at Malta, from whence they embarked on the 10th of December, 1800, and reached Marmorice, in the Levant, after a tedious voyage of six weeks. Some delay took place there, to allow measures of united operation to be concerted with the Turks; but the latter were so disheartened by recent disasters, that they were in no spirits to resume the contest; added to which, the plague was ravaging their camp, and a violent feud existed between the grand vizier and the pasha of Alexandria. The English general, therefore, resolved to undertake the enterprise alone, although he had only 17,512 men, including about 1,000 sick; whilst the French, with the same number of invalids, amounted to 27,516. The troops were embarked on board of about seventy transports, and, being escorted by a squadron commanded by lord Keith, arrived in Aboukir Bay on the 1st of March. Bad weather prevented the landing being attempted till the 8th, when all the troops were disembarked after a severe contest with the French, who were beaten, with the loss of 300 men and eight pieces of cannon; the English losing 500 in killed and wounded. Sir Ralph Abercromby occupied three days in landing his artillery and ammunition, and in organising his forces. On the 12th, the army moved forward to Alexandria; and, on the 13th and 14th, encountered the French under general Friant, strongly posted, but in inferior numbers, who inflicted severe loss upon the English troops, though they were eventually beaten, and compelled to retire. On the 21st, the decisive battle of Alexandria was fought, in which the French were thoroughly defeated, and Menou was compelled to retreat to the heights of Nicopolis. He lost 2,000 men in killed and wounded; and the English loss amounted to 1,500. To them the joy of victory was damped by the loss of their gallant chief, who received a mortal wound, and was conveyed on board lord Keith's flag-ship, where he died on the 28th. The command of the army, in consequence, devolved on general Hutchinson (subsequently created lord Donoughmore), who remained inactive for some days; but 6,000 Albanians having arrived in the bay of Aboukir, they were joined by 1,000 British, and the combined forces occupied Rosetta, capturing Fort Julien, and its small garrison of 150 men, on the 19th of April. A reinforcement of 3,000 British troops joined general Hutchinson early in May; and—having isolated Alexandria, by cutting a neck of land that ran between lakes Maadieh and Mareotis, and letting the water of the former into the dry bed of the latter—he advanced on Cairo, where general Belliard had retired with 10,000 men, after being repulsed, in an attempt to proceed to the east, by a body of Turks led by majors Hope and Holloway, two English officers. Cairo was invested by the English on the left, and by the grand vizier on the right, bank of the Nile, on the 20th of May; and, on the 22nd, the French general proposed a suspension of arms. This was acceded to: further negotiations followed; and, on the 27th of June, a capitulation, similar in its terms to that of El Arisch, was signed. It was ratified the next day; and 13,672 troops of the line were, in consequence, sent to France, with their arms and baggage, leaving 320 pieces of heavy artillery in the hands of the victors.

Menou, shut up in Alexandria, and his force reduced to one-half the original number—whilst, on the 9th of July, Hutchinson was reinforced by 3,600 British troops, and 2,400 sepoy from India, under Sir David Baird—on first hearing of the capitulation of Cairo, vowed that he would bury himself under the ruins of the town before he would follow the example of his colleague. However, when general Hutchinson, after the embarkation of the men who had surrendered at Cairo, invested Alexandria, he soon found his position untenable. There were several gallant affairs, in sorties and attacks, in which the English were uniformly successful; and, on the 31st of August, Menou consented to capitulate on the same terms which were granted to Belliard. Nearly 11,000 men surrendered, on condition of being sent to France; but the British took 389 cannon, chiefly brass; 195,000 lbs. of powder, and 14,000 gun-cartridges. The French writers attribute this result to the incapacity of the French generals, and to the failure of the attempts made to reinforce them.

After the English had landed in Egypt, admiral Gantheaume had made another attempt to take out a supply of troops. He sailed from Toulon on the 25th of April, and reached the coast of Africa, a few days' march to the west of Alexandria, about the middle of May. Before the troops he had on board landed, however, and while it was in debate whether they should land or not, as they could not make friends of the natives, and would have a long march through the desert—Gantheaume thought he saw the English fleet; and he immediately slipped his cables, and sailed for France. On his voyage home, on the 24th of June, he encountered and captured, after a gallant resistance, the Swiftsure, 74, captain Hallowell; with which he re-entered the port of Toulon.—Bonaparte, during Gantheaume's absence, ordered a fleet of fifteen ships of the line, French and Spanish, to be drawn from the harbours of France and Spain, in order to support him. The British blockading squadron, when it was found that Gantheaume had eluded them, having sailed in pursuit, enabled the French commanders to collect twelve ships of the line at Cadiz; and admiral Linois, with three more and one frigate, was sent to join them from Toulon. He found, as he approached the port, that the blockade was resumed by Sir James Saumarez; and he put into Algeziras Bay, where he was protected by powerful batteries. There, on the 6th of July, the French vessels were attacked by Sir James Saumarez with six ships of the line; but, in consequence of the severe fire from the French ships and the batteries, Sir James was obliged to retire, with the loss of the Hannibal, which grounded, and was taken possession of by the enemy. The British, in this engagement, had 361 killed and wounded; the French and Spaniards, 586. Six days after, the British ships, having been refitted at Gibraltar, encountered the united squadron of French and Spanish vessels, of nine ships of the line and four frigates; and, after a desperate engagement, continued into the night, compelled them to return to Cadiz. After the day closed, and while the engagement was at its height, the Real Carlos and the Hermenigeldo (both Spanish ships, carrying 112 guns), each mistaking the other for an enemy, exchanged their broadsides with great fury. Whilst this unhappy encounter was going on, the Real Carlos was set on fire; her sails, which had been recently tarred, having burst into flames, from a broadside poured in by an English vessel, the Superb, while passing. The wind blowing violently at the time, spread the flames to the Hermenigeldo, and soon both vessels blew up with a most awful explosion.

Out of 2,000 men, about 250 were saved by the English boats: all the rest perished.* The Superb also captured the San Antonio, of 74 guns: the remainder of the squadron escaped; but most of the vessels were greatly shattered. The gloom which the loss of these ships occasioned in Spain did not extend to France, to damp the joy which the capture of the Swiftsure and the Hannibal, and the retreat of the British fleet from Algeiras, occasioned. Those isolated triumphs over the British flag were not sufficient, however, to console Bonaparte for the loss of Egypt. Junot affirms, that the first consul's "design was, to have made that country the point from which the thunderbolt was to issue which was to overwhelm the British empire." When the news of Menou's capitulation reached him, he exclaimed—"Junot, we have lost Egypt! My projects and my dreams have alike been destroyed by England." Junot remained with him two hours after the intelligence arrived; and the duchess d'Abrantes informs us, that he "wept like a child" whenever he recounted what passed during the time.

The period occupied by the occurrences in Egypt and in the Mediterranean, which we have just described, was not uneventful elsewhere. Shortly after the battle of Copenhagen, Nelson was appointed commander-in-chief in the Baltic. On the 20th of May, he signed a convention with Sweden and Denmark, by which all the restrictions laid on British commerce in that sea were removed; and corresponding steps were taken by the British government. The first consul had sent his favourite aide-de-camp, Duroc, to St. Petersburg, to congratulate the new emperor, Alexander, on his succession; and to endeavour to persuade him to enter into similar relations with France, as those his predecessor had sanctioned. The French ambassador was received with cordiality; but lord St. Helen's, from England, was welcomed still more warmly; and, on the 17th of June, his lordship concluded a treaty with the vice-chancellor Panin, by which all the principles of the "armed neutrality" were abandoned. The first consul was filled with indignation at this arrangement, which, he said, "was equivalent to an admission that England was sovereign of the seas. She could desire no more," he affirmed, "than such a treaty conceded; and a third-rate power would have been ashamed to have signed it."

Bonaparte had not been inactive whilst the foregoing events transpired. The peace of Luneville relieved him from any apprehensions he might have entertained from continental combinations; and, although that treaty guaranteed

"the independence of the Batavian, Helvetic, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics," and gave their inhabitants "the power to adopt such forms of government as they might judge proper," he resolved, that the reorganisation of those governments should proceed from him. The Cisalpine republic, which comprised Lombardy, Modena, and the Legations—and where, according to Ugo Foscolo, "the overbearing insolence of foreign preconsuls, the iron rule of French captains, and a foreign military power mocking the people with the name of liberty, and violating all the existing laws," had produced nothing but misery—was placed, says Thiers, "in the state of an ally dependent upon France." The affairs of Naples were adjusted on the basis of the treaty of Florence; the constitution of Liguria was submitted to the first consul, that it might be altered so as to strengthen the executive authority. Tuscany was converted into a regal domain—"the kingdom of Etruria"—and bestowed upon Don Louis, a son of the duke of Parma, who had married a daughter of the king of Spain; the duke renouncing Parma and Placentia, to be disposed of as Bonaparte pleased. Godoy, known as the "prince of peace," was at this time the ruling spirit in Spain; and, whilst the public were wondering why the head of the French republic should thus favour a branch of the Bourbons, the reason became apparent. Under the influence of Godoy (who had been promised a share in the spoil), the king of Spain had declared war against Portugal, in order to make that power break off her friendly relations with England. The prince of Brazil†—who then ruled Portugal as prince-regent, on account of the mental aberration of the queen, Maria Francesca Isabella—had applied to England for the aid of 25,000 troops; to which he would have joined the Portuguese army, and, giving the command to an English officer, would have carried the war into Spain. But the expedition to Egypt, and other causes, prevented the English government from complying with this request: they could only send a few hundred men, and £300,000 in gold. Portugal, alone and unaided, could offer no effectual resistance to Spain; and, in June, a cessation of hostilities took place. This, however, did not suit the first consul, who ordered a division of his army, under generals Le Clerc and St. Cyr, to advance into Portugal; his object being to occupy some part of the Portuguese territory, that, whenever peace was concluded with England, he might make the withdrawal of his troops dependent on the restoration of the conquered colonies of France. The French troops

* M. Thiers, in his History of the Consulate and the Empire, says, that admiral Saumarez, after his defeat at Algeiras, "carried his rancour so far as to put on board his ships furnaces for red-hot shot;" and that it was one of these shots, discharged from the Superb, that set the Real Carlos on fire. This is not true. There was no furnace on board the Superb, or any other British ship. The fire was occasioned as stated in the text.

accordingly entered Portugal, invested Almeida, and threatened Lisbon and Oporto. The English, on learning of these aggressive steps, took possession of Madeira, that that fine island might not also be seized by the French. The prince-regent, alarmed at the prospect before him, entreated Lucien Bonaparte, who was then ambassador at the court of Madrid, to intercede with his imperious brother; and, eventually, peace was restored—the ruler of Portugal placing 20,000,000 francs in the hands of bankers at Paris, for the use of the first consul; and making Lucien Bonaparte, Talleyrand, and others, presents of diamonds and other jewels. Thus, says Capefigue, “the first consul was appeased. He stood in need of many resources to organise his new power. To some he gave offices; to others, rank; but money to all. When he wanted to enrich a man, he gave him the embassy of Madrid or of Lisbon—countries which had not yet been drained, like Italy and Germany, by a French invasion, and where an envoy was sure to make his fortune, because he had to do with weak people, who had their hands full of the wealth of Mexico and of the Brazils.”

Whilst warlike operations were pursued in Egypt, in Portugal, and on the high seas, negotiation was being carried on between the governments of France and England, with the view of settling the terms of peace. The change of ministry in the latter country had been occasioned more by the desire for peace than any other reason. On the 21st of March, soon after his accession to office, lord Hawkesbury, who had succeeded lord Grenville as secretary of state for foreign affairs, intimated to M. Otto the desire of England to terminate the war; and as the first consul professed to be equally anxious for that event, an interchange of terms took place, which led to no result. England does not appear to have asked more than she was entitled to from her position. The French were required to evacuate Egypt, their tenure of which was most precarious; and England, retaining Malta, Ceylon, and either Trinidad or Martinique, offered to give up all her other conquests. The first consul, however, would only consent to her retaining either Ceylon or Trinidad. For several months an interchange of couriers kept taking place, but neither party was inclined to recede from its terms; and, in the midst of the negotiations, Bonaparte commenced his preparations to invade England. He collected, from the ports of the Calvados, the Lower Seine, the Somme, and the Scheldt, a number of gun-boats and flat-bottomed praams; constructed batteries for heating shot; fortified every point of the coast, so as to enable the gun-boats to creep round from distant ports to that of concentration; and collected at Boulogne much of the artillery and infantry force which had been set at liberty by the treaty of Luneville, and had since been unemployed. An ordinance of the 12th of July, directed the organisation of the flotilla into nine divisions, each with its proper proportion of men and artillery; and the first consul announced to his colleagues his determination, if peace were not concluded, to enlarge this flotilla, so that it could transport 100,000 men; to embark with it himself; and to make an impression on England by some decided blow. “A fair wind for thirty-six hours,” was, however, he considered, necessary to make a successful descent; and whilst the flotilla was collecting, Robert Fulton made his appearance at Paris, and offered to the government the means of transporting its vessels across the channel in the face of wind and tide, by the means of steam. Bonaparte listened to him, and submitted his plan to some of the most eminent savans, by whom it was stigmatised as “visionary,” and rejected as “impracticable.” We now know it was neither; but the world was not then prepared to adopt the bold suggestion.

These preparations in France could not be carried on without attracting the notice of England; and Nelson was appointed to command a fleet of three ships of the line, two frigates, and thirty-five bomb-vessels, brigs, and schooners, with which he sailed from Deal, on the 1st of August, for the coast of France. He made his appearance off Boulogne on the 4th, and attacked the floating batteries and gun-boats of the enemy, sinking two of the former, and destroying a few of the latter, which were without-side the pier. This attack was more of the nature of a reconnaissance than anything else; and the English admiral returned on the 15th, when he found great precautions had been taken to defend the flotilla. Every boat had from fifty to a hundred soldiers on board, was secured to its moorings by chains, and protected from boarding by iron spikes projecting from its sides, and strong netting braced to its lower yards. The flotilla was attacked at midnight; but being thus protected, and the approach to the harbour being commanded by the batteries on shore, Nelson was for once defeated. A most unequal combat was maintained for four hours, the wind and tide preventing the English boats from arriving at their destined points at the time assigned to them. If they had, Nelson declared, that “all the chains in France could not have prevented our men from bringing off the whole of the vessels.” The English at last retired, with the loss of 172 men, killed and wounded; and the French characterised the affair as being “not an unsuccessful attack, but a decided defeat.”

The negotiations were continued, after this failure, through the month of September; and the first consul, irritated by Spain's concluding the peace with Portugal in opposition to his views, ceased to insist upon the abandonment of Trinidad; but he gave peremptory orders to M. Otto, to have the preliminaries signed before the 2nd of October. They were signed on the 1st of that month.—A few hours after the signatures of the negotiators—lord Hawkesbury and M. Otto—had been attached, a messenger arrived in London with the news of the evacuation of Egypt by the French. There is every reason to believe that Bonaparte knew of that event much earlier, and before the negotiations had been brought to a close. If the preliminaries had been signed before the intelligence reached Paris, he would never have given vent to the exclamations recorded by the duchess d'Abrantes, on the authority of her husband, as having escaped him on the occasion. If the English government had been aware of the success of their army, they would, lord Hawkesbury declared, have been compelled, in "deference to public opinion," to have demanded better terms: and it would appear, that it was the knowledge of that success which induced Bonaparte to concede those he did. This is the only conclusion we can draw; unless we suppose that Junot was guilty of deliberate falsehood when he detailed to his wife the conversations narrated in her Memoirs.—By the preliminaries, England agreed to give back to France, Spain, and Holland, all her conquests except Ceylon and Trinidad. Egypt was to be evacuated by the British and French forces, and restored to the Porte. The island of Malta was also to be evacuated by the English troops, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem; and to secure the independence of that island from both the contracting parties, it was to be placed under the guarantee of a third power, to be named in the definitive treaty. The integrity of the Porte was guaranteed; France agreed to evacuate the harbours of Rome and Naples, and England to give up Porta Ferrajo, which the gallant little garrison still defended; a compensation was provided for the house of Nassau; a new republic was created of the seven Ionian Isles; and the fisheries of New foundland were restored to the situation in which they were before the war. These preliminaries were ratified by France; and when colonel Lauriston arrived in London with the ratification on the 12th of October, the horses were taken from his carriage, and he was drawn by the populace to Downing-street, where the ratifications were interchanged. At Paris, the welcome intelligence of "peace with England" was proclaimed at the theatres; and that, M. Thiers tells us, "amidst such acclamations of joy as had not been heard for a long time."

The signing the preliminaries of peace with England had been preceded by the conclusion, on the 24th of August, of a definitive treaty between France and Bavaria; by which, in consideration of a guarantee of its possessions on the right bank of the Rhine, the latter agreed to give up to the former its territories on the left bank of that river.—On the 30th of September, a treaty was concluded between France and the United States of America, in which the commercial privileges granted to France by the preliminaries signed in 1800, were considerably curtailed, though she was put on the footing of the most favoured nations.—On the 8th of October, a third treaty was signed at Paris, between France and Russia—M. de Talleyrand and M. de Markoff being the negotiators. The public treaty—which merely recited, that a good understanding was restored between the two governments, and that they would not allow emigrants from either country to carry on secret conspiracies—was accompanied by a secret convention; the articles of which bound the two powers to act together to introduce into Germany such territorial arrangements as would tend to conduce to the adjustment of the balance of power. It was also stipulated, that Naples should be evacuated when a maritime peace was concluded; that the interests of the king of Sardinia should be adjusted, "in the mode most compatible with the present state of affairs;" and that the republic of the seven islands should be independent. The eleventh and concluding article was as follows:—"As soon as possible after the signature of the present treaty, and these secret articles, the two contracting parties shall enter upon the consideration of the establishment of a general peace, upon the following basis: 'To restore a just equilibrium in the different parts of the world, and to ensure the liberty of the seas;' binding themselves to act in concert for the attainment of these objects by all measures, whether of conciliation or vigour, mutually agreed on between them, for the good of humanity, the general repose, and the independence of governments."—On the 9th of October another treaty was concluded at Paris, between M. Talleyrand and the Turkish ambassador, Ali Effendi, who had been detained there under a species of honourable restraint, and was ignorant of the French disasters in Egypt. By this treaty, France was put in possession of all the advantages of the most favoured nation in the Levant.—A treaty was also concluded with the dey of Algiers on the 1st of December.

Soon after the preliminaries of London had been agreed to, Amiens was selected by the two governments as the place where the terms of the definitive treaty should be considered. Lord Cornwallis was appointed the plenipotentiary for England, and Joseph Bonaparte for France. The discussions were prolonged, and were, more than once, on the point of terminating unfavourably. But at last, on the 27th of March, 1802, the terms were finally agreed upon, and the definitive treaty signed. It did not differ, in any essential point, from the preliminaries, and it was duly ratified by both powers. It gave rise to long and angry debates in the British parliament; but the government was supported, in the Lords by 122 to 16; and in the Commons by 276 to 20.

CHAPTER V.

NEW CONSTITUTION IN HOLLAND; NEW CONSTITUTION FOR THE CISALPINE REPUBLIC; BONAPARTE DECLARED PRESIDENT OF ITALY; CONCORDAT WITH ROME; RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF RELIGION IN FRANCE; MEASURES TO PROMOTE EDUCATION; ESTABLISHMENT OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR; BONAPARTE DECLARED CONSUL FOR LIFE; ALTERATIONS IN THE CONSTITUTION; FRENCH VIOLATIONS OF THE TREATY OF LUNEVILLE; REFUSAL OF ENGLAND TO SURRENDER MALTA; RENEWAL OF THE WAR; EXPEDITION TO ST. DOMINGO.

DURING the negotiations, which were at last terminated by the peace of Amiens, Bonaparte had been engaged in extending his power and influence, both at home and abroad, in various ways. Abroad, the constitutions of Holland and Italy were remodelled under his influence. At home, by the conclusion of a concordat with the pope, and the creation of a Legion of Honour, he found the means of attaching a number of both clergy and laity personally to himself; and thus paved the way for the acquirement of that supreme power, which it is impossible to doubt became the object of his ambition subsequent to his accession to the first consulate. The constitution of Holland was entirely recast in the autumn of 1801. By a proclamation of the Batavian directory (who were supported, or more properly controlled, by a body of French troops), the legislative chambers were dissolved; and a new constitution, which had been drawn up at Paris, was promulgated. By this constitution, the republic was redivided into its old provinces; the number of members of the legislative assembly was reduced to thirty-five; and that of the executive body, under the name of a council of state, extended to twelve. A president, to be changed every three months, was placed at the head of the whole; and M. Schimmelpennick, the Dutch ambassador at Paris, was the first raised to that post. The constitution was proclaimed by the directory, whose functions it abolished, and quietly accepted by the people, in November, 1801. As the preliminaries of peace had been signed, England felt itself entitled to demand an explanation of these changes. The only reply obtained from Talleyrand was to the effect, that "Holland had a right to organise itself as best suited its interests; and that the Batavian republic was perfectly free, having its ambassador at Paris, like any other independent state. Besides," he added, "what had taken place at the Hague was by no means an obstacle to further diplomatic arrangements; it being only a progress towards the reconstruction of society, agreeably to those views of order and justice which the first consul entertained." With this "explanation" the English government was obliged to be content.

The government of Holland thus rearranged, that of Italy next demanded attention. That country had experienced no benefit whatever from the changes introduced by Bonaparte. All classes and all parties were equally oppressed; and the Italians were taunted, according to Foscolo, with not exerting themselves to attain a state of independence it was predetermined they never should enjoy. The members of the executive council nominated by Bonaparte, found themselves involved in financial and other difficulties; and the first consul determined upon some new arrangement. With this view, a consultum, composed of 452 members, was convoked, to meet at Lyons, as Bonaparte could not go to Milan. They assembled in December, 1801, 450 being present—a proof of the interest taken by the Italians in the matter, when the season and the distance are considered. The members of this consultum comprised those of the provisional government—with deputations from the clerical and legal bodies, the universities and academies, the chambers of commerce, the several towns and departments, and the regular army and national guard. They were met by MM. de Talleyrand and De Chaptal, who opened the assembly on the 31st of December with great pomp. A commission of thirty members was appointed to inquire into, and report upon, the state of Italy; and the consultum was divided into five sections, to consider a new constitution, which the first consul had ordered to be drawn up. The commission soon agreed to its report, which was very much in accordance with a draft arranged beforehand, between the first consul, M. de Talleyrand, signor de Mareschalchi (the minister from the republic at Paris), and signori Aldini, Serbelloni, and Melzi, who had been sent to Paris on Italian affairs. It was to the effect, that the want of confidence between the various countries of which the republic was composed, rendered the tutelary support of France necessary during its infancy; and after various details to prove this fact, it concluded with a request to Bonaparte to assume the chief direction of Italian affairs. The constitution submitted to the consultum, proposed to establish three electoral colleges—1st, of 300 proprietors; 2nd, of 200 members of the learned professions; 3rd, of 200 merchants and manufacturers. These colleges were to elect the members of the legislature, and the judges of the upper courts; and the legislative body was to vote, without discussion, on the projects of law submitted to it by the executive, to consist of a president appointed for ten years, a vice-president, and a council of six members. The president was to nominate to all civil and military offices.

The first consul left Paris for Lyons on the 8th of January, 1802, accompanied by Josephine and a numerous array of troops. He arrived on the 11th; and his entry into the city was a perfect triumph. A brilliant troop of 150 young men, of the first families, met him beyond the gates, and formed his escort into the city, where he was received with the most enthusiastic acclamations. No great time was spent in deliberation after his arrival. The consultum accepted the constitution, with trivial modifications; and when the report of the commission was presented to the first consul, he at once accepted the office of president, and appointed M. Melzi, who possessed extensive landed property in Lombardy, to that of vice-president. The constitution was proclaimed on the 25th of January, (6th of Pluviôse), Napoleon Bonaparte being announced as the first president of the republic, which, instead of Cisalpine, was, hereafter, to be named the Italian republic. This was the first time that the christian and surname of the first consul had been used together. By the territorial arrangement, connected with the adoption of this constitution, the whole of Lombardy to the Adige, the Legations, and the duchy of Modena were included in the republic. Parma remained in abeyance; and Piedmont, for the present, was considered to appertain to France. The Italian republic, thus constituted, contained near 5,000,000 inhabitants, could raise, it was estimated, a revenue of from 70,000,000 to 80,000,000 francs, and support an army of 40,000 men. While at Lyons, Bonaparte gave a new constitution to the Genoese, or Ligurian republic—similar to that of Italy; and placed a native doge at its head.

The first consul left Lyons on the 28th of January, having, before his departure, presented the three mayors of that city each with a handsome scarf, in commemoration of his visit. He re-entered Paris on the 31st; at which time France certainly presented an aspect of comfort and tranquillity it had not enjoyed for some time. The measures which had been adopted—and it is due to Bonaparte to say, that they were principally founded on his suggestions, when they were not precisely and definitely devised by him,—these measures, for re-establishing religion; rendering travelling safe and secure; for giving activity to commerce and industry; for introducing order and regularity into the administration of the finances; and for reorganising society, shattered as it had been by the convulsions of the revolution—had all been successful. The security of the high-roads had been mainly effected by the military, who, after the treaty of Luneville, having returned to France in great numbers, were formed into movable columns, which, traversing all parts of the country, succeeded so completely in dispersing or arresting the banditti by whom the provinces were infested; that although, in January and February, 1801, travellers could not go from one place to another without the risk of being murdered, they might, before the end of the year, penetrate into any part of France without danger. In many of his measures, especially those for re-establishing religion, the first consul had found great opposition in the tribunate and the legislative body, who also opposed his proposal to create a Legion of Honour. During his absence at Lyons, the renewal of the first fifth of those bodies took place, and, by the management and the influence of Cambacérès, sixty members of the legislative body, and twenty of the tribunate, who had been most strenuous in opposing what they considered the usurping pretensions of the first consul, were not re-elected. After this elimination of its more important members, the tribunate sank into a state of complete insignificance. Thus, when the first consul returned to Paris, he found submission in every quarter; and the resistance he had experienced in the assemblies completely overcome. He was received with addresses from the public bodies, and with warm congratulations from many distinguished foreigners in the French capital, where the gayest season was experienced, in the winter of 1801-'2, that had occurred for many years. It was distinguished by the marriage of Louis Bonaparte to Hortense Beauharnais. They received the nuptial benediction from the cardinal Caprara, in a private house; and it was administered, at the same time, to Murat and his wife Caroline, whose marriage had been contracted before the civil magistrate.

None of Bonaparte's measures were of so much importance as that vital one—the re-establishment of religion in France. We have already noticed the early steps he took in that direction; also his recognition of the pope, with whom he was anxious to conclude a concordat, for the purpose of consolidating, as he expected, the interests of the church and the state. The negotiations for that purpose commenced in 1800. They were carried on by monsignor Spina, on behalf of the pope, and the abbé Bernier, the pacificator of the Vendée, for France. The terms being settled, the concordat was signed at Paris on the 15th of July, 1801. The papal sanction was not given till September; and although the first consul explained its conditions, and spoke eloquently in their favour to his council, they were not submitted to the tribunate and the legislative body till April, 1802. On the 8th of that month, the projet de loi, approving of the concordat, and re-establishing the christian religion throughout the French dominions, was adopted by those assemblies, but not without opposition. There were divisions in both: in the tribunate, the ayes being 78, the noes 7; in the legislative body, the numbers were 228 for, to 21 against. Such a result could not have been obtained a few months earlier. By the concordat, the Roman catholic religion was again established in France as that of the nation; the republic was divided into fifty dioceses, and ten arch-dioceses; the archbishops being to receive 15,000 francs (£600), and the bishops, 10,000 francs (£400), per annum. The bishops were to take an oath of fidelity to the republic, and prepare a prayer for the consuls. One parish priest was allotted to every district of a juge de paix, with as many more as might be considered necessary. These inferior clergy were to be nominated by the bishops and archbishops; but the prelates were to be appointed by the first consul, who was thus, in reality, made the head of the church of France. Very trifling salaries were awarded to the parish priest—about £60 per annum in large, and £40 in small parishes; but the departmental councils were charged with procuring houses or lodgings for them, and also for the bishops. There were several important articles, in addition to those merely organising the church, for securing its independence, to a great extent, of the pope.

It was on April 18th (Easter Sunday), 1802, that the return of the French people to the christian faith was solemnly celebrated. In Paris there was a grand procession to the church of Nôtre-Dame, to inaugurate it once more as a temple of Christ, and to restore the Roman catholic worship. This sacred edifice had been greatly injured by the infidel revolutionists—the worshippers of the goddess of Reason. They had pulled down the high altar, cut the paintings into pieces, and destroyed the decorations of every kind. Bonaparte had done much to efface the memory of these enormities. He had a new altar erected, more costly than that which rude infidelity had overthrown; he took great pains to collect all the relics, statues, and paintings that had been removed, and not destroyed, which he had replaced, as nearly as possible, in their original style; and he resolved that the reopening of the cathedral should be conducted with every solemnity. On the morning of the day before mentioned, 500 troops (cavalry and infantry) assembled in the court of the Tuileries, and, preceded by the consular guard, led a long cortège, composed of the carriages of the senate, the legislative body, the tribunate, and all the public officers, with those of the foreign ambassadors, and many private equipages. These were followed by eight cream-coloured horses, that had been presented to Bonaparte by the king of Spain—each led by a young Mameluke in eastern costume; by Roustan, the Mameluke friend of the first consul, on a splendid charger; and by the state-coach, drawn by eight horses, containing the three consuls, each attended by a footman, in a livery of green velvet trimmed with gold. Several troops of cavalry closed the procession, which was received at the church by the clergy of Paris, with the archbishop at their head, arrayed in their richest pontificals; and high mass was celebrated with all the imposing pomp and ceremonial of the Romish church. At its close, the procession returned in the same order to the Tuileries, having been hailed, both going and returning, with the most cordial and enthusiastic tokens of popular approbation. This important day was closed in a manner which, to the professors of the reformed religion, appears a profanation of the Lord's-day, but which is common in all Roman catholic countries: the theatres were opened gratuitously; there was a concert for the public in the gardens of the Tuileries; the palace and gardens were brilliantly illuminated, and fireworks were discharged in many parts of the city. From thenceforth all government offices were closed on Sundays; the performance of daily mass was resumed at the Tuileries; and the use of the republican calendar discontinued.

The re-establishment of religion was followed by an attempt, on the part of the first consul, to restore all the inalienated national property to the original proprietors, in which he was only partially successful; but, on the 29th of April, he published a general amnesty, which permitted all exiled Frenchmen to return to their native country, with the exception of the members of the royal family, and a few others. Above 100,000 emigrants, in consequence, returned to France, and to each was restored such parts of his former property as had not been alienated by the state. But many were without any present means of subsistence; and, to raise money, they proceeded to cut down the forests on their estates. This was considered injurious to the public interests, and led to some restrictive regulations being issued, as well as to unpleasant contests between the state and individuals. However, altogether the amnesty was productive of great benefits to many thousands. It was followed, on the 1st of May, by a decree, promulgating

a project for a general scheme of public education. Schools for primary instruction were permitted to be established in each commune: secondary schools, taking education a higher step, could also be set on foot, with the sanction of government, which contributed nothing towards the support of these elementary institutions. But thirty lycées, or special schools, were established in different parts of the republic, the number of pupils in which was limited to 6,400. The entire expense of these lycées was borne by the state. The system of education taught in them comprised the ancient languages, rhetoric, logic, morality, the elements of the mathematics, and physical sciences; and the pupils were selected by the government from the secondary schools, and other sources. Later in the year, 60,000 francs (£2,400) were appropriated to encourage the study of electricity and galvanism: any stranger who resided a year in France, and made important discoveries in science, was admitted to the rights of a French citizen; and the Institute was placed at the head of all the educational institutions. It was divided into four classes, each member receiving a pension of 1,500 francs (£60) a-year. Measures were taken simultaneously to encourage commerce and trade; a council-general of commerce being established in Paris, and a council of commerce in each city of France. A plan was also formed and adopted for establishing chambers of agriculture in the colonies; but before a proper organisation could be made for carrying it out, war was resumed, and interfered with its operation. Measures for recruiting the army and navy, and putting the finances on a better footing, were also adopted; and the Valais being detached from Switzerland, was erected into the "republic of Valais," and placed entirely under French influence. The roads over the Simplon, over Mont Cenis, and from the Rhone, over Mont Genevre to Turin, which now afford so much accommodation to travellers, were commenced.

Napoleon was strongly impressed with the necessity of an aristocracy to support any government, and contribute to its stability; and he deeply regretted that, to any nobility which he created, he could not give the stamp of antiquity. He very early, however, resolved to do what he could in that direction; and his first step was to establish a Legion of Honour, "which should gradually restore the gradation of ranks in society, and enlist all classes of people in its support." This project met with great opposition; and before he finally succeeded in procuring its adoption, the legislature passed, on the 8th of May, a senatus consultum, declaring him first consul for ten years beyond the first ten fixed as his original appointment. At length he obtained the sanction of the legislature to the Legion of Honour; but his proposal was adopted in the council of state by a majority of only 14 to 10. In the tribunate, the numbers were 56 to 38; in the legislative body, 166 to 110. The object of this institution was, to confer an honorary distinction and a pension upon meritorious individuals, civil or military. The legion was divided into fifteen cohorts, each consisting of seven grand officers, thirty subalterns, and 350 members. The pensions varied from about £200 to the grand officers, to a few francs to the private members; and the first consul was named captain-general of the legion, and president of the council for its administration, which was composed of the three consuls and a member of the council of state, the senate, the legislative body, and the tribunate. The decree establishing the legion appeared on the 18th of May; and then Bonaparte took notice of the senatus consultum, which added ten years to his term of office. He had been steadily advancing and consolidating his own dignity and power, from his first acceptance of the consulate; his aim being to become the sole ruler of France. Those who encouraged him in his views, and supported them in the legislature, endeavoured, when the senatus consultum was discussed, to have him declared first consul for life; but the senate refused to go beyond an additional ten years. In reply to the address presented to him, and announcing that extension of his term of office, he declined to accept it, unless it was "confirmed by the suffrages of the people, who first invested him with supreme authority." The legislature agreed to take the sense of the people on the question; but, by a decision of the council of state, without appealing to the other bodies, the question put to them was—"Shall Napoleon Bonaparte be consul for life?" To this question, 3,368,259 affirmatives were received, and only 189,626 negatives. So, on the 2nd of August, 1802, Napoleon Bonaparte was declared to be, for life, the ruler of the French people. He occupied at this time St. Cloud, as well as the Tuileries; occasionally retiring to Malmaison, as a calm retreat from the cares which pressed upon him. He still wanted two things more—a regal or imperial title, and that his office should be hereditary. These he did not despair of attaining.

In reply to the address which was presented by the senate, announcing the result of the appeal to the people, Bonaparte remarked, that "the nation, in bestowing upon him a new and a permanent pledge of their confidence, had imposed upon him the duty of moulding the system of its laws, so as to bring them into harmony with durable institutions." To carry out this view, on the 4th of August, several alterations in the constitution were proclaimed. The tribunate was reduced from a hundred to fifty members—a prelude to its total extinction. The number of the legislative body was reduced to 258, who were divided into five sections; one to be renewed every year. The senate was to be invested with the power of dissolving both the other legislative bodies, and of modifying the fundamental institutions of the republic. To the first consul was given the power of nominating his successor, and pardoning all offences. The senate accepted the new constitution on the 8th of August; and on this occasion, for the first time, Bonaparte went to the senate-house with all the "pomp and circumstance" of regal power. The Parisians shouted loudly at the display; and the gaiety of their capital—where luxury and pleasure again began to prevail; where the ambassadors—especially lord Whitworth, from England (at whose hotel Mr. Fox was a visitor), M. de Markoff from Russia, and the marquis Luchesini from Prussia—endeavoured to outvie each other by the brilliance of their equipages and appointments; where the drawing-rooms and levées of the first consul emulated the splendour of the ancient régime; and over which, the spoils gained in vanquished Europe cast an evanescent lustre—quite reconciled the giddy Parisians to the restoration of that monarchical form of government (for such, in effect, was the appointment of Bonaparte as consul for life) which they had shed oceans of blood to extinguish. Bonaparte aimed at possessing all the power of the ancient kings. Looking on Fouché with a jealous eye, and thinking that he might interfere with his future projects, one of his first acts, after the senate had accepted the new constitution, was to abolish the ministry of police, and unite it with that of justice, under Regnier. He made Fouché a senator; and new regulations of pensions and honours conferred on the members of that body, rendered it very amenable to his will.

The senatus consultum, declaring Bonaparte consul for life, and ordaining that a statue of Peace, holding in one hand the decree of the senate, and in the other the laurel of victory, should attest to posterity the gratitude of the nation, was proclaimed throughout France on the 15th of August, the birthday of the first consul. The statue of Peace was, however, a great mistake; for his ambition was even then preparing the way for another war. We have already seen how, in violation of the eleventh article of the treaty of Luneville, the independence of Batavia, Cisalpia, and Liguria was interfered with—evidently for the purpose of extending French influence; and Bonaparte had scarcely been declared first consul for life, before (having already quartered a large army on the Dutch) he began to interfere with the freedom of the Swiss. Several of the cantons—Underwalden, Schweitz, Zurich, Glarus, Appenzell, and the Grisons—were averse to the government of a republic, "one and indivisible," which France had forced upon them; and wished to restore the federal constitution. A declaration to that effect was made at the diet on the 6th of August; and a civil war commenced, in which the government of the Helvetic republic was obliged to retire to Lausanne. Aloys Reding, whose family had often taken part in the wars and government of Switzerland, summoned a general assembly, which met at Schweitz on the 27th of September, and proceeded to organise a government upon the ancient basis. Some cantons adhered to the republic; and the first consul offered his mediation. It was refused; as nothing would satisfy the majority of the Swiss but a return to the old state of things. Twelve thousand French troops were, in consequence, immediately marched across the frontiers; the leaders of the Swiss were arrested; the country was overrun; and although the Swiss appealed to England, and the English government protested against the infraction of the treaty of Luneville, the cantons were obliged to submit, and accept a constitution which Bonaparte, as "mediator," transmitted to them in February, 1803—a constitution that, in fact, placed Switzerland in subjection to France. Whilst this contest with the Swiss was going on, first the Isle of Elba was annexed to France: next, on the 11th of September, a formal decree was issued, declaring Piedmont a part and parcel of the territory of the republic; to which another decree, issued on the 23rd of October from Parma, declared that the states of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, belonged. Whilst he made these acquisitions in Europe, Bonaparte obtained, by secret treaties with Portugal and Spain, Guiana from the one, and Louisiana from the other; and in October, he sent general Sebastiani on a mission to Egypt, with what view, except to see whether it could be reconquered, it is difficult to guess. On the 30th of January, 1803, a report from that officer was published in the official paper, the Moniteur. It described minutely the condition of Alexandria and its forts, St. Jean d'Acre, &c.; with the amount of the military strength of the country, and the state of its finances. It was expressly stated in this report, that "6,000 French soldiers would, at present, be enough to conquer Egypt;" and that England "dared not renew war against France."

It does not appear that the parties to the treaty of Luneville made any formal objection to the above annexations. Indeed, the German powers were engaged in settling the indemnities to which the events of the war, terminated by that treaty, entitled one or other of them. By a treaty agreed to on the 4th of June, 1802, France and Austria were to have acted together in the adjustment of these indemnities; but the latter power appears to have sided with Prussia and Russia against the former. At length, on the 18th of August, a congress assembled at Ratisbon, and its deliberations were not concluded till the 25th of February, 1803. It would occupy more room than we have to spare, to give the details of the arrangements agreed upon; but Sir A. Alison gives that arrangement its true character, when he says, "it was the most important which had taken place since the treaty of Westphalia;" as by it, "the old Germanic constitution was entirely overturned, and a new division made, which for ever subverted the fundamental principles of the empire." Though the parties to the treaty of Luneville were silent under its infractions, England was not disposed to regard them as unimportant. The 10th article of the treaty of Amiens bound her to evacuate Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, and Alexandria; and her troops had begun to withdraw from those places. The interference with the Batavian, Italian, and Swiss republics, and the annexation of territory in Italy, caused the movement to be arrested; and when the English parliament assembled on the 16th of November, 1802, the king's speech spoke of a renewal of hostilities, as not only probable, but, it was feared, inevitable. From that time very active military preparations were carried on in France and England; and it was quite apparent that the army and navy, in the former country, were rapidly returning to the state of a war establishment. Public speakers and writers, in the two countries, mutually blamed each other for this state of things. France demanded the evacuation of Malta; and England, that the treaty of Luneville should be observed, and the independence of nations respected. After the appearance of the report of Sebastiani, the evacuation of Malta was formally refused till France fell back to her position when the peace was signed. The English government maintained, that it was their duty to preserve the balance of power, and protect Europe from a military despotism; and that they would not be justified in giving up such an important position as Malta, till the ruler of the French abandoned those plans of ambitious aggrandisement which he had evidently formed. The misunderstanding between the two governments was increased by the vexatious regulations which Bonaparte, who had refused to enter into a commercial treaty with England, imposed on British shipping. He, on the other hand, conceived himself very much aggrieved by articles in the British press, particularly those which appeared in a paper, published in London, called L'Ambigu, the editor of which was Peltier, a French emigrant. He demanded that such articles should be suppressed; and that the emigrants, who, he said, were forming conspiracies against him, should be expelled from the United Kingdom. Of course the latter was a demand which the British government could not comply with; but they did prosecute Peltier for a libel on the first consul. He was ably defended by Sir James Mackintosh: the jury, however, returned a verdict of "guilty." Before judgment was passed, the quarrel between the two nations reached its climax, and war again broke out: Peltier was therefore never called up to receive sentence.

On the 20th of February, Bonaparte, in an interview with the English ambassador (lord Whitworth), stated his causes of complaint against England, and demanded a performance of the conditions of the treaty of Amiens, as the only alternative of war. He professed no desire for the latter course. "Why should I wish to go to war?" he said: "a descent upon England is the only mode I have of combating her; and this, if compelled, I am resolved to undertake. But why suppose that, arrived at my present height of power, I should risk my reputation and life, unless constrained thereto by necessity, in an expedition in which myself and the greater part of my army would, most probably, go to the bottom of the sea—for there are a hundred chances to one against me?" He would, however, make no promise to abide by the treaties into which he had entered, and which he had violated so egregiously; and England, having withdrawn her troops from the Cape of Good Hope, determined, under the circumstances, to hold Malta; with which determination lord Whitworth acquainted him. The result of this interview, which was reported by his lordship to his government, was, that, on the 8th of March, the king of England sent a message to parliament, to the effect, that the military preparations going on in the ports of France and Holland, rendered it necessary that the army and navy of England should be augmented. The same day both houses voted addresses in accordance with the message; on the 9th, it was announced that the militia were to be called out; and, on the 10th, the House of Commons resolved to increase the naval force, from 50,000 men, already voted, to 60,000. On the 13th of March, at a diplomatic levée, the first consul singled out the English ambassador, and attacked him in the most intemperate manner.—"You are, then, determined on war!" he exclaimed; and when lord Whitworth, in courteous language, began to disclaim the imputation, he would not hear him; but, interrupting his lordship in the middle of a sentence, said—"We have been at war for fifteen years; you are determined on hostilities for fifteen years more, and you force me to it." Then, turning to the Russian and Spanish ambassadors, he said—"The English wish for war; but, if they draw the sword first, I will be the last to return it to the scabbard. They do not respect treaties, which, henceforth, we must cover with black crape." Then, again turning to lord Whitworth, he continued—"To what purpose are these armaments? Against whom do you take these measures of precaution? I have not a single ship of the line in any port of France. But if you arm, I, too, will take up my arms; if you fight, I will fight: you may destroy France, but you cannot intimidate her." "We desire neither one nor the other; we desire to live with her upon terms of good intelligence," was lord Whitworth's reply. "You must respect treaties, then," rejoined Bonaparte. "Woe to them by whom they are not respected! They will be accountable for the consequences to all Europe." He repeated these words twice over; then rose abruptly, and left the room.

Lord Hawkesbury replied very temperately to the remarks of the first consul. He declared, that the king had "the most sincere desire that the treaty of Amiens should be executed in as complete a manner as possible; but it was impossible for him to consider the treaty as founded on principles different from those which had invariably been applied to every other treaty or convention—viz., that they were negotiated with respect to the actual state of possession of the different parties, and to the treaties or public engagements by which they were bound at the time of its conclusion; and that, if that state of possession or engagement was so materially altered by the act of either of the parties as to affect the nature of the compact itself, the other party had a right, according to the law of nations, to interfere, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction or compensation for any essential difference which such act might have subsequently made in their relative positions." The late treaty, it was contended, was based on the condition "specially agreed to in a note of the French government," that "his majesty should keep a compensation out of his conquests, for the acquisition of territory made by France on the continent." France had made great acquisitions subsequently to the signing of the treaty, which his majesty, for the sake of peace, would have overlooked; and the evacuation of Malta was in progress, "when his majesty's attention was arrested by the report of colonel Sebastiani on Egypt, which disclosed views utterly inconsistent with the spirit and letter of the treaty of Amiens." Then it became necessary to pause, before so important a place was given up.

It was now quite evident, that the recommencement of hostilities was only a question of time. The British government and the British people were alike indignant at the attack made on their ambassador; and the former instructed his lordship to demand, that the French forces should withdraw from Batavia and Helvetia; that a provision should be made for the king of Sardinia, whose territory had, in violation of treaties, been forcibly annexed to France; and that England should be permitted to garrison Malta for ten years. These terms were presented, in April, as an ultimatum, and a week allowed for their consideration. Talleyrand offered some modifications, which were deemed inadmissible; and the ultimatum was rejected. On the 6th of May, the British parliament was informed that negotiations were pending, on which the mutual recall of the ambassadors depended: on the 16th, the return of lord Whitworth was announced; he having demanded and received his passports on the 12th: on the 17th, an embargo was laid "on all ships in the British ports, belonging to French or Batavian subjects, or to countries occupied by the French armies:" on the 18th, general Andreossi, the French ambassador, embarked at Dover, and war was declared; the declaration being followed, on the 22nd, by a decree from Bonaparte, ordering all the British subjects who had visited France on business or pleasure, to be detained. In consequence of this decree, between 10,000 and 11,000 men, women, and children were restrained from departure, and lodged in the various prisons of France; and between 1,200 and 1,300 in those of Holland.

The war was very popular in England with the people; and addresses, pledging the two houses of parliament to support government in carrying it on, were adopted—in the House of Lords, by 142 votes to 10; and in the House of Commons, by 398 to 67. Many writers, however, since, lay all the blame of the rupture upon the British government; as Mr. Fox, and other speakers, did at the time. But there is reason to believe, that the government in London had positive information that Bonaparte had no intention that peace should be lasting; but only wanted to gain time, to extend his power and influence in Europe. Not satisfied with the acquisitions given him by treaty, he had seized upon additional territories, in violation of treaties; and, if England had given up Malta, the island would have been garrisoned by troops quite unable to resist an attack from France. Undoubtedly, it does not appear, primâ facie, that because Bonaparte broke his engagements with other powers, therefore England was justified in not keeping her's made with him. But she had, certainly, reason to apprehend that war would be less dangerous than peace; particularly when it was found that Bonaparte had not abandoned his designs upon Egypt. That country in his possession, and Malta under his control, our dominion in India would not have been worth a year's purchase. As to the embargo, and the detention of British subjects by which it was retaliated, the former was in strict accordance with international law, and the usual practice, when hostilities between two countries were about to commence; whilst the latter was a violation of both law and practice, and brought great obloquy on the name of the first consul.*

* We now know that the instructions of the first consul to Talleyrand were anything but honest and straightforward; that directly after the treaty of Amiens was signed, he spoke of it as a measure only necessary that he might restore and recruit his navy; and that his hope

Before we enter upon the narrative of the long and destructive war which desolated almost every part of Europe, and which laid a terrible responsibility upon the shoulders of those who were the cause of it, we must briefly advert to a second correspondence between the first consul and Louis XVIII.; to an alteration in the law of succession, made by Bonaparte; and to the events which were transpiring, during 1802, in the important island of St. Domingo. At the commencement of 1803, Louis XVIII., as the count de Lille, was residing at Königsberg, under the protection of the king of Prussia. In January, a communication was made to his majesty, from the first consul, offering, if Louis would renounce his right to the throne of France in his (Bonaparte's) favour, to give him a principality and an ample revenue in Italy. Louis refused the offer; though there appeared, at the moment, little prospect of his ever regaining the throne of the Bourbons. In his reply to the first consul, which was dated in February, he said—"I do not confound M. Bonaparte with those who have preceded him. I esteem his valour and his military talents. I am gratified by many acts of his administration; for the happiness of my people must be ever dear to my heart. But he deceives himself, if he imagines that he will prevail upon me to surrender my rights. So far from it, he would establish them himself, if a doubt could be admitted respecting them, by the step he has just taken. I know not the intentions of God to my family or myself; but I know the obligations which he has imposed upon me. As a christian, I will discharge the obligations which my religion prescribes, to my latest breath: as a son of St. Louis, I will cause myself to be respected, even in fetters: as a successor to Francis I., I wish ever to be able to say, with him—"All is lost, except our honour." The application, thus firmly refused, was not renewed.

It was on the 19th of April, 1803, when engaged on the code Napoleon (which was not promulgated till the following year), that the first consul issued a decree, completely revolutionising the law of succession. It took away the right of primogeniture, and abolished the distinction between fixed or real, and movable, or personal property; and all entails or limitations. From that time (with an exception subsequently made for those on whom he bestowed hereditary nobility), every description of property has been divided, in equal proportions, between those who stand in equal contiguity to the deceased. The subdivision of land which has taken place in France in consequence of this was, to be enabled so to concentrate the naval powers of Europe, that they might all be brought to bear upon this country, whose power and influence he then calculated upon being finally enabled to extinguish, "by another battle of Actium."

law, has been immense; and it certainly has not added to the happiness or prosperity, or increased the means, of the French people. It may be added, that about the same time, the first consul altered the law of divorce—permitting a husband to divorce his wife for adultery; and the woman might divorce her husband for the same offence, if he brought his concubine into the house.

The island of St. Domingo, or Hayti, as it is now generally called, is, with the exception of Cuba, the largest in the West Indian Archipelago; and was, previous to the French revolution, the most flourishing of any. In 1789, about one-third of the island belonged to France, and two-thirds to Spain; the French portion being the richest and the most productive. The population consisted of the governing whites, free mulattoes, and the negro slaves; the number of the two former being about equal, and the slaves exceeding both in the proportion of at least eight to one. When the news of the revolution in France reached this mixed population, it excited both mulattoes and blacks with a desire for social rights; and the former immediately demanded to be put upon an equality with the whites. The latter refused to admit a "man of colour" to the same privileges they enjoyed; and a civil war broke out, in which the Spanish proprietors, and some English troops on the island, supported the mulattoes, whose pretensions had been encouraged by a decree of the constituent assembly, issued on the 8th of March, 1790, empowering all the French colonists to make known their wishes on the subject of a constitution, through the medium of assemblies freely elected by the citizens. While the disputes raged between the whites and the mulattoes, the national, which had succeeded the constituent, assembly, issued a decree (on the 15th of May, 1791), conferring freedom upon all persons of colour in the colonies, the children of free parents. This was followed by a general insurrection of the slaves, which extended to the Spanish possessions; the insurgents having a daring fellow at their head, named Jean François. A more remarkable man was brought forward by the events of the times—a slave named Toussaint, who had risen from a herdsman to be coachman to the bailiff, upon an estate called Breda. He had learned to read and write—very unusual accomplishments for slaves; and, after the insurrection broke out, he joined Jean François; very soon becoming his aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel. The civil war which followed was productive of great horrors and atrocities; and the democratic passions of the insurgents were further inflamed, when the intelligence of the execution of the king, and the establishment of a republic in France, was received. This intelligence was soon followed by the capture of Cape Town by the slaves, and the massacre, without distinction of age or sex, of all the inhabitants who were not enabled to get on board the ships in their harbour, and make their escape. The fugitives went to the United States, where they were kindly received; but one vessel, with 500 souls on board, foundered at sea, and all met a watery grave.

Early in 1794, a British squadron appeared off Port-au-Prince, and took possession of the town, with the mole of St. Nicholas; and a negro chief, Hyacinthe, with 12,000 blacks, joined a small force left there; which, with their allies, undertook the reduction of the island. However, Toussaint, with the French troops on the island, and a much larger number of negroes than were under Hyacinthe, succeeded in maintaining their ground, and in detaching the blacks from the standard of the English, great numbers of whom were carried off by the climate. Subsequent to the arrival of a decree which the national convention issued on the 4th of February, 1794, giving liberty to all slaves, and declaring St. Domingo an integral part of France, Toussaint carried on a series of successful attacks upon the Spanish portion of the island, being at the head of a considerable force of French and blacks, with the rank of general of brigade. The Spanish posts fell before him so rapidly, that the French commissioners, who were with the army, said—"This man makes an opening (l'ouverture) everywhere." Hence the name by which he is generally distinguished, of Toussaint L'Ouverture. By 1798, so successful had been the operations of Toussaint, that the whole island was under his control. The Spanish planters had laid down their arms; the English troops had left the island, after their commander had held a conference with Toussaint, surrounded with his negro warriors; and the mulattoes, as well as the whites, had been completely subdued by the blacks. Toussaint had been recognised by the republican authorities at home as lieutenant of St. Domingo; and when tranquillity was restored, he sent his children to be educated in Paris; writing to the directory, then in power, a letter professing fealty, in which he said—"I guarantee, under my personal responsibility, the submission of my black brethren to order, and their fidelity to France."

When Toussaint heard of the downfall of the directory, he dispatched one of his officers, colonel Vincent, to Paris, to lay the state of the island before the first consul, who sent back that officer, with a decree confirming Toussaint in the position he then held, of general-in-chief; with a proclamation to the blacks, calling upon them to be faithful to France, which had recognised their freedom. The successful black now thought his power secure; and committing to one of his lieutenants, Dessalines, the task of following up and extinguishing the few who still remained in the island with views hostile to his own, he proclaimed a general amnesty, and made a triumphal tour to the various towns, surrounded by a cortège, in which all the pomp of European splendour was imitated. Some months were then employed in tranquillising the island; and, this effected, Toussaint assembled, at Cape Town, those whom he considered the principal men. After some days' consultation, these persons drew up a constitution, by which Toussaint was named president and governor of the island for life, with the power to appoint his successor. A copy of this constitution he dispatched to Paris, by the hands of his former messenger, colonel Vincent, who was also the bearer of an autograph letter from the president of St. Domingo to the first consul of France, which commenced with the words, "From the first of blacks to the first of whites." Colonel Vincent arrived in Paris on the 14th of October, 1801, just after the signing of those preliminaries of peace with England, which were afterwards incorporated in the treaty of Amiens.

But Bonaparte had no liking for blacks. He had caused a bill to be passed through the legislative bodies, maintaining the old system of slavery as it existed before the revolution in the colonies; and the slave-trade was re-established under the tricoloured flag. He had expected that Toussaint would have held St. Domingo as long as it suited his purpose that he should do so, as his lieutenant. He found himself mistaken; and that the island was lost to him and to France, unless strong means were used to restore the authority of the mother-country. At this period his aim was to equal England in her "ships, colonies, and commerce," to which he rightly ascribed her greatness; and he could not bear the idea of losing an island which, with the addition of the Spanish portion (ceded to France by the treaty of Bâle), might be expected so largely to employ both ships and seamen. He therefore resolved to reconquer the island, and restore everything to the state in which it existed previous to 1790, except that its entire territory would belong to France, instead of being divided between that country and Spain. This resolution he persisted in, notwithstanding the remonstrances of colonel Vincent, who, even if he approved of the enterprise, had no idea that it could be successfully achieved.

Active measures were taken to carry out the plans of the first consul. The workmen in the dockyards of Brest, L'Orient, Rochefort, Toulon, Havre, Flushing, and Cadiz, were all employed, night and day, in preparing transports. Troops were marched to those posts; and the destination of the armament was announced in a proclamation, dated the 22nd of November, in which he said—"At St. Domingo, systematic arts have disturbed the national horizon. Under equivocal appearances, the government has permitted itself to see only the ignorance which confounds names and things, which usurps when it seeks to obey; but a fleet and an army, which are preparing in the harbours of Europe, will soon dissipate these clouds, and St. Domingo will be reduced, entire, to the government of the republic." Another proclamation was sent to the island, addressed to the blacks, who were told by the first consul, that, "whatever might be their origin or their colour, they were Frenchmen, and were all alike free and equal before God and the republic. At St. Domingo and Guadaloupe, slavery no longer existed; all were free—all should remain free. At Martinique, different principles must be observed."

The expedition sent out appeared to be sufficient to command success. It comprised thirty-five ships of the line, twenty-one frigates, and eighty smaller vessels, having on board 35,000 troops. Admiral Villaret Joyeuse commanded the fleet, and general Le Clerc (who had married Pauline Bonaparte, sister to the first consul), the army. The vessels, collected at Brest, L'Orient, and Rochefort, sailed on the 14th of December. They had about 10,000 men on board, under the immediate command of Le Clerc; and were followed by those from the other ports. An American vessel had passed the first division, and apprised Toussaint of what he had to expect. He immediately commenced his preparations for defence; but he had scarcely 20,000 men, scattered over the island; and the conclusion of peace between England and France, prevented him from deriving assistance from general Nugent, the governor of Jamaica, as he at first expected he would be able to do. He appointed Christophe, whose name has since become celebrated in connection with the island, to command at Cape Town; before which port, the French, under Le Clerc, appeared on the 1st of February, 1802, and disembarked on the 4th; the delay being caused by the impossibility of procuring pilots. In the interim, Christophe had made preparations for burning the place. As soon as the French landed, in two divisions, one on each side of the capital, under cover of a brisk cannonade from the ships, the town was set on fire; and so well had the measures of Christophe been taken, that, out of 800 houses, scarcely sixty were left standing. All the stores and provisions in the place were either carried off or destroyed; and out of the ruins of the city, arose, we are told, "those pestilential vapours, which afterwards proved more fatal to the troops, than all the forces which Toussaint could assemble for their destruction." It was the forerunner of a similar, but more terrible, catastrophe at Moscow.

The negroes, however, were found incapable of affording effectual resistance to the whites, who soon possessed themselves of the sea-coast and the plains of the island—Toussaint's troops withdrawing themselves to the forests in the interior, where they made a determined stand. These woody fastnesses were called the "Grand Chaos;" and it was Toussaint's plan to maintain himself there, till the Europeans were so weakened and reduced by the climate, that a successful foray might be made upon them. Le Clerc was well aware of the difficulty of forcing this position; and having brought Toussaint's two sons from France, he sent them and their preceptor, M. Coisson, to the black general, with a letter from the first consul, offering him the command of the colony if he would submit to the laws of France. He was at Ennery, thirty leagues from Cape Town; and it was with difficulty that his children reached him. Their presence had a great effect upon Toussaint, who was at first inclined to yield to the entreaties of their mother, and accept the offer of Bonaparte. Reflection, however, convinced him that that offer was a snare to effect the slavery of his country; and he sent back his children, refusing the terms. The boys were returned to him; but Le Clerc issued a proclamation, declaring him a rebel, and announcing that war would be carried on to the last extremity.

A squadron from Toulon followed closely that from Brest, and, on its arrival, Le Clerc, on the 28th of February, made an attack on the wood where Toussaint had intrenched himself. The insurgents were defeated, with the loss of 700 men. Toussaint's lieutenant, Maurepas, who at first gained a considerable success, was obliged to surrender. Dessalines was also defeated; and the blacks had to retreat towards the mountains, destroying all the plantations, and massacring all the whites who fell in their way. A body of them took possession of a fort, called Crête à Pierrot, erected by the English, at the confluence of two streams, near Port-au-Prince. They were attacked by the French on the 3rd of March; who were repulsed, losing 700 of their men. A second attempt had the same result; and when Le Clerc surrounded the fort, and attempted to batter it down with heavy artillery, the blacks cut their way through his troops, and escaped. A guerilla warfare was then kept up through March and April, in which both parties suffered great loss; but, on the 5th of May, all the black chiefs, except Toussaint, submitted, and went over to the French, with whom they retained their rank and appointments. Toussaint found it useless any longer to keep the field, and he also gave in his submission; but, instead of taking service under Le Clerc, he retired to his farm at Ennery. There he lived quiet and retired, till some insurrectionary movements that occurred amongst the negroes near his dwelling, were made the pretext for his arrest, which took place on the 5th of July. He was sent to France, and imprisoned in the dungeons of Besançon, where he died.—About this time an insurrection broke out at Guadaloupe, and Richepanse's division was sent to subdue it. This caused the blacks in St. Domingo to rise again; and the chiefs—Christophe, Dessalines, and others, who had joined the French, after a time, placed themselves at the head of the insurgents. The French were soon reduced to great straits. Le Clerc, out of the force he brought with him, had not more than 13,000 men under his command, and of them 5,000 were in hospitals. He concentrated his small force at Cape Town and Port-au-Prince; and, whilst the operations were going on, he caught the yellow-fever, of which he died on the 2nd of November. Rochambeau succeeded to the command; but he was unable to make head against the blacks in the field; and, on the 17th of February, 1803, Christophe and Dessalines made a nocturnal attack on Cape Town, surprising Fort Belair, and putting the garrison to the sword: they were only driven off in an assault on the town itself, by a most desperate exertion on the part of the garrison. After this, disaster followed upon disaster. Rochambeau, having been reinforced with 1,200 fresh troops from France, sailed to Port-au-Prince, and marched from that town to attack the blacks in the open field. He fell into an ambush, and was driven back with great loss. Soon after news was received of war having again broken out between England and France. English cruisers arrived off the coast, and supplied the blacks with arms and ammunition (the only things they wanted), which enabled them to push on their operations with renewed vigour. All the fortified places in the south and west fell into their hands in a short space of time; Port-au-Prince capitulated with its garrison, which, under the command of Lavalette, was suffered to leave the island, and reached the Havannah in safety. Rochambeau was blockaded in Cape Town by the blacks on shore and the English at sea. The want of provisions compelled him at last to surrender to the latter at discretion, and he and his men were conveyed to Jamaica. The last officer who remained on the island, the viscount de Noailles, succeeded in getting, with a few men, on board a vessel off the coast; but though he escaped the English squadron, he was wrecked on the coast of Cuba.

Thus ended the expedition to St. Domingo, and that island has never since come under the French rule. The fate of the fine army which was sent to subdue the blacks, was indeed lamentable. Out of the 35,000 troops originally dispatched from France, and the 1,200 which followed, scarcely 7,000 returned to their native country; and, till the expedition to Russia took place, a few years after, there is scarcely an instance recorded in the history of Europe, of such a disastrous result to an expedition so well fitted out in every respect, composed of such splendid troops, and so well officered. The result was a great mortification to Bonaparte, who subsequently said, he had "to reproach himself for that expedition; it was a great fault." But he threw the blame on others. "It was undertaken," he said to Las Casas, "against my opinion, in conformity to the wishes of the council of state, who were carried away by the cries of the colonists." This may have been the case; but, at the time, he got all the blame; and his treatment of Toussaint—confining him in an unhealthy dungeon till he died—is one of those blots which time will not remove from his name.

CHAPTER VI.

MILITARY PREPARATIONS OF FRANCE; FIRST OPERATIONS OF THE WAR; PREPARATIONS TO INVADE ENGLAND; CONSPIRACY AGAINST THE FIRST CONSUL; ARREST, TRIAL, AND EXECUTION OF THE DUKE D'ENGHIEN; TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS; THE CODE CIVIL DES FRANCAIS; THE CONSULATE CHANGED TO AN EMPIRE; NAPOLEON BONAPARTE CROWNED BY THE POPE; EVENTS OF THE WAR; RELATIONS OF EUROPE WITH FRANCE AT THE CLOSE OF 1804.

It has been asserted by one of Napoleon's eulogists, that "France was totally unprepared for the sudden declaration of war—a proof sufficient to show that the first consul had not desired the termination of peace." This is not exactly conformable to truth; for it was the military preparations in France and Holland which led to the calling out the militia, and the augmenting the number of seamen, in England. Those measures were the cause of increased activity on the part of France; and Talleyrand addressed a note to London, stating, that if the armaments in England took place, the first consul would march 20,000 men through Holland, and encamp them on the borders of Hanover; that camps would be formed at Calais, and on different parts of the coast; that the French army would be continued in Switzerland; and that a fresh force would be sent into Italy, to occupy Tarentum if necessary. Twenty thousand men were immediately put on the road towards Hanover, and another army was organised, ready to march into Italy. On the night of the 13th of March, after Bonaparte had addressed such intemperate language to lord Whitworth at the diplomatic levée, he not only sent couriers to the different European courts, to warn them that war might be again expected; but special envoys, general Duroc and colonel Colbert, were dispatched to Berlin and St. Petersburg, their mission being to engage Prussia and Russia in a league with France, and to revive the "armed neutrality" of the north. The mission failed; but Bonaparte most energetically carried out his measures of preparation in other directions. The army was put on a war footing—a senatus consultum, of the 25th of March, placing at his disposal 120,000 conscripts; Flushing and Antwerp were declared to be in a state of siege; orders were issued for the formation of those great arsenals, which subsequently were erected in the Scheldt; and corps d'armée were set in motion, by various routes, to the coast. The rapidity with which these orders were issued, and the facility with which they were executed, is the best reply to the assertion that France was unprepared. In that country, as in England, the war was very popular with all classes of the people; and large sums of money were, at the request of the war minister, voluntarily subscribed, to enable the government to build ships. That minister promised, that "every vessel should bear the name of the town or district which had contributed to its formation."

Soon after lord Whitworth had demanded his passports, the differences between France and England were taken up in the legislative bodies. On the 23rd of May, M. Daru presented a report on the subject to the tribunate; and it was resolved, that the following message should be carried to the first consul, by all the members:—"The tribunate expresses a wish, that the most energetic measures be immediately taken to cause the faith of treaties to be respected, and also the dignity of the French people." The senate and the legislative body followed this example, and carried up similar addresses to the Tuileries. They were very acceptable to the first consul, who acknowledged them in an appropriate reply. He then issued instructions to the bishops to offer up prayers for the success of the war.

On the 26th of May, the French force, 20,000 strong, which, under Mortier, had advanced from Holland to the frontiers of Hanover, received orders to occupy the latter territory; though the king of England, as elector of Hanover, had a separate treaty with Bonaparte, and that electorate was bound to observe neutrality, and could have taken no part in hostilities unless Germany had joined in the war. The duke of Cambridge was at that time viceroy of Hanover, and he had an army of about 16,000 men. General Walmoden commanded on the frontiers, and made a gallant stand against the invaders at Borstell, when they crossed the Weser, on the 2nd of June. As a large number of troops were preparing to follow Mortier, and there was no time for succour to arrive from England, it was resolved not to prolong what appeared to be, and no doubt would have been, a useless resistance to an overwhelming force—a resistance which must have entailed great sufferings on the inhabitants. On the 5th of June, therefore, a convention was signed between general Walmoden and Mortier, at Sühlingen, by which the Hanoverian troops were to retire, with their arms and artillery, behind the Elbe, and not to serve against France till they had been exchanged. The French troops were immediately put in possession of the arsenals, &c., where they found 400 cannon and 30,000 muskets, besides various colours and standards (thirty-five in all), which were taken by prince Ferdinand in the Seven Years' War. The British government refused to ratify this convention; and hostilities recommenced on the 27th; however, they were not prolonged. The contest was too unequal for the Hanoverians to hope for success; and the French, instead of requiring the troops not to serve till formally exchanged, permitted them, by another convention, signed on the 5th of July, to return to their homes. They soon re-entered the service; and formed the nucleus of the king's German legion, which rendered such good service till the conclusion of the war.

Mortier followed up his successes in Hanover by occupying and levying contributions upon Hamburg, Cuxhaven, and Bremen. The Elbe and the Weser were closed against British merchandise; and the foundation was laid of that crusade against the commerce of England, in which, under the name of the "continental system," Bonaparte laboured so strenuously to engage all the powers of Europe. These steps, clearly in violation of all international law, alarmed the northern powers; but Russia, Austria, and Prussia contented themselves with diplomatic remonstrances, while little Denmark gallantly assembled an army of 30,000 men to protect her territory from invasion. Unsupported, however, these troops were obliged to retire into cantonments; and, though Hamburg was evacuated, troops were left at Cuxhaven; and Northern Germany, for the time, submitted to the controlling hand of the first consul. England—her ships being excluded from the Elbe and the Weser—declared the mouths and ports of those rivers in a state of blockade. In his note to the British government (as before mentioned), Talleyrand had said, that a fresh force would be sent into Italy. That force was immediately organised. It was ready to march when lord Whitworth left Paris; and on the 14th of May, general St. Cyr, the officer in command, addressed the following proclamation to the Neapolitan people:—"The king of England has refused to execute the treaty of Amiens. The French army is obliged to reoccupy the positions which it quitted in virtue of that treaty—positions which we will maintain, so long as the English shall persist in retaining Malta." This proclamation preceded the entry of the French troops, who soon after crossed the frontiers, and, advancing to Tarentum, took possession of that important post. At the same time troops were sent to Tuscany, and all the English merchandise in the port of Leghorn was seized—the town being declared in a state of siege; and the protest of the king of Etruria, against the violation of his territory, was disregarded. Simultaneously with these movements of troops to the north and to the south, vast numbers of workmen were set at work to fortify Alessandria, the islands of Elba and Corsica, and the entire coast from Otranto to the Texel; extensive preparations were also commenced on the coast of France, nearest Great Britain, for the invasion of this country. On the 14th of June, the first consul addressed a rescript to the minister of war, in which the organisation of the army destined for that purpose was fixed. It was to consist of six divisions, encamped in different positions, as follows:—1st, in Holland; 2nd, at Ghent; 3rd, at St. Omer; 4th, at Compiègne; 5th, at St. Malo; and the 6th at Bayonne. Thus it extended along the whole coast from the Texel to the Pyrenees. These divisions were commanded by Marmont, Mortier, Soult, Davoust, Ney, and Junot. The force was termed, collectively, "The army of England;" and Boulogne was fixed upon as a central point for the concentration of vessels for its embarkation. All the dockyards in the kingdom were employed in the construction of gun-boats and transports, which, as fast as they were finished, were removed to Cherbourg, Calais, Boulogne, and Dunkirk. The British blockaded all these ports; and the vessels could only move from one port to another, by creeping along the shore when the wind blew the blockading fleets off their appointed stations.

On the 23rd of June, Bonaparte issued the first of his formal decrees against the commerce of the United Kingdom. By this document it was ordered, "that no colonial produce and no merchandise coming directly from England, should be received into the ports of France, and that all such produce or merchandise should be confiscated." This step was not contrary to international law, and afforded no ground for complaint; but, by the same decree, regulations much more vexatious were imposed upon neutral vessels than those which England enforced, and which were made the pretext for the "armed neutrality." The object was, to discover from whence the vessel had come, or where she was bound. If she was going to, or coming from, the United Kingdom, or, under any circumstances, had touched at any of its ports, it was liable to seizure and confiscation. At this period, the foreign commerce of the continent was almost entirely arrested. The English were now excluded from every port under French influence, and, in consequence, all those ports were blockaded by English ships. The plan of the French government was, by every means, to cripple the power, and exhaust the resources, of its enemy; but the large fleet of England enabled her to inflict much greater injury upon France and her allies than she received; and she carried on an extensive and increasing trade with the east and the west, which the first consul felt himself powerless to interrupt.

To inspirit both his troops and the workmen, and to hasten the warlike preparations against England, Bonaparte, accompanied by Josephine, and attended by a splendid suite, left Paris on the 23rd of June, for the purpose of making a tour of the departments. He visited Montreuil, Etaples, Boulogne, Ambleteuse, Vimereux, Calais, Dunkirk, and many other places. His progress was a continued ovation. When he entered a town, he passed under triumphal arches; the keys of the place, and addresses, were presented to him; the clergy chanted Te Deums, and splendid fêtes were given. He proceeded from Dunkirk to Flushing and Antwerp; and he appears, from his inspection of the latter port, to have been strongly impressed with its importance as a naval station to France. He ordered it to be converted into a maritime arsenal of first-rate importance; and caused it to be defended by fortifications of immense strength. The first consul returned to St. Cloud on the 11th of August; having visited, during his absence of forty-eight days, eighty towns and seventeen departments. As soon as he arrived, the authorities went to congratulate him; and M. Séguier, president of the court of appeal, in introducing his colleagues, said—"The magistrates, sire, are proud to lay at your feet the tribute of their hearts."

No doubt, the presence and approval of Bonaparte greatly stimulated both the military and naval preparations; and an immense flotilla was, before the year closed, collected at Boulogne. It consisted of upwards of 1,300 vessels, of four classes. The first was intended to protect the transports; and each boat carried six 24-pounders. The second class, which were flat-bottomed, could each receive from 150 to 200 men; and were armed with one howitzer, and four 24-pounders. The third and fourth were smaller: one would carry about eighty, the other from forty to fifty men; each was armed with two pieces of artillery. This immense flotilla had not been harboured at Boulogne without great difficulty. There were English vessels constantly off the coast, which, in the first instance, approached very close, and greatly annoyed the workmen, and damaged the works. Bonaparte, however, caused batteries to be thrown up, the guns of which would propel 24-pound shot and shell an immense distance; and this prevented the vessels from coming very near the shore. Corps of horse artillery also constantly watched the coast. When the light vessels moved from one port to the other, they crept along the shores, being rowed by the troops; and although often fired on by the English, no great damage was done. Only three or four vessels were captured, and from ten to twelve destroyed.

Besides this flotilla of praams and flat-bottomed boats, large ships were building in several ports; and Spain had some fine men-of-war, both in Europe and the West Indies; which Bonaparte calculated upon as his own. His original plan was, to assemble a fleet at Martinique, composed of all the Spanish ships, which, as Spain was not at war, he expected could be brought together without difficulty; and some large vessels he was building at Toulon. The combined squadron was to raise the blockade of Rochefort and Brest, enter the channel, and convoy 150,000 men from Boulogne to the English coast. In November he again visited Boulogne, arriving there on the 3rd of the month. Then the harbour was literally alive with vessels, and the surrounding country was covered with troops. He reviewed the army on the 16th, and saw the troops practised in the manœuvres of embarking and disembarking. Many thought the decisive moment had arrived; but the first consul knew better than to venture. The English coast was defended by strong walls and stout hearts, and the English fleet commanded the channel. No attempt at invasion was made, therefore, if it was even contemplated at that period. On the 18th, Bonaparte returned to Paris; and it was known that the expedition would not take place that year. Thiers intimates, that the reason for the delay was, that the Batavian flotilla was not ready; nor the Brest and Texel squadrons, the former of which was to have conveyed Augereau to Ireland. These divisions would have raised the invading army to 160,000 men, exclusive of sailors. The first consul, according to Thiers, hoped to have all in readiness by February, 1804.

The naval operations of 1803 were very inconsiderable. France had scarcely any ships at sea, for her fleets were not in a sufficient state of forwardness to allow them to leave the harbour. The English fleet blockaded the entire coast, from Dunkirk to the mouth of the Seine; and a squadron was sent to the West Indies, which captured, in July, St. Lucia and Tobago; and in September, Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo. Thus the first few months of the war were not particularly advantageous to France.

The French army, at this time, was estimated to consist of 427,910 men; and the Helvetic confederation had been induced, or compelled, to agree to furnish 24,000 auxiliary troops. The expense of maintaining this army, and of carrying on the preparations for invading England, pressed heavily upon the resources of France, whose revenue, in 1803, was estimated at 570,961,000 francs (£22,832,000). To increase his finances, the first consul induced Spain and Portugal, under the threat of invasion, to enter into subsidiary treaties, by which the first agreed to pay him £2,880,000, and the latter £640,000, per annum, to exempt them from actual hostilities. He also sold Louisiana to the United States, for 80,000,000 francs (£3,200,000). All these sums were employed in defraying the charges of the enormous naval and military armaments, which were upon a scale never equalled under the old monarchy.*

The continental powers had not viewed these enormous preparations without alarm; and attempts had been made to bring the two belligerents to an agreement. If the first consul would have evacuated Hanover and the north of Germany, England would have left all differences to be decided by the mediation of the emperor Alexander of Russia, and would have agreed to abide by his award; but Bonaparte would not assent to this mode of settling the differences. When the first consul had refused to accede to these preliminaries, and when it was found that the French had taken up what appeared to be a permanent position in Northern Germany—threatening to extinguish its trade, as they had its independence—Russia, Prussia, and Austria all showed signs of resistance; and a new coalition was threatened. But Prussia was bought off by the prospect held out to her, of the future possession of Hanover; and Austria was not yet sufficiently recovered from her recent losses to plunge into another war. Russia alone continued to remonstrate warmly against the occupation of Cuxhaven by French troops; the closing of the Elbe and the Weser to British vessels, by which Germany was made a party to the war; the continued occupation of Tarentum; and the neglect to provide the king of Sardinia with an indemnity. The interchange of despatches on these subjects, and the firm tone assumed by Russia, so enraged the first consul, that he treated M. Markoff, the Russian ambassador, in a somewhat similar style to that in which he attacked lord Whitworth. The consequence was, that, in December, M. Markoff was recalled; and M. d'Oubril

* At this time, the military force of the United Kingdom amounted to 718,046 men; comprising 191,099 in

remained at the French capital as chargé d'affaires.

Whilst Bonaparte was eagerly devising his plans for the invasion of England, and superintending their execution, the emigrants had availed themselves of the displeasure felt by many of his high officers and others, at his being elevated to the dignity of first consul for life, to renew their plots against his authority. Bernadotte and Moreau, both republicans in principle and not merely in theory, as well as Lafayette, had voted against his assuming that dignity. Moreau was looked upon as the head of a large malcontent party in France: he was encouraged in his coolness towards the first consul, and his opposition to many of his measures, by his mother, madame Mulot, and his wife, both of whom were royalists; and the latter could not brook the submission which, whenever they met in public, she was obliged to show to Josephine. The discontented met at the brilliant réunions of madame de Stäel; and the manifestation made by Camille Jourdain, in favour of the liberty of the press, increased their number. Communications were opened between them, the royal princes, the other emigrants, and the following agents of the British government—Mr. Drake, the minister at the court of Bavaria; Mr. Taylor, envoy to the elector of Hesse; and Mr. Spenser Smith, the chargé d'affaires at the electoral court of Würtemberg. The result was, a “conspiracy” against the power of Bonaparte; to promote which, Georges Cadoudal, the Vendean chief, MM. Armand and Jules de Polignac, and M. Charles de Riviere (the three latter aides-de-camp to the comte d’Artois), repaired to Paris in August, 1803, being conveyed from London in a British brig of war, commanded by captain Wright. It has been asserted that this conspiracy was the work of Fouché, who longed to be restored to his office of minister of police, and who recollected well the words of the senatus consultum, by which he was displaced—that, “if difficult circumstances should again arise, there was no one to whom that ministry might so fitly be entrusted.” He is said to have sent general Lajolais to London, to inform the royalists there that they might rely upon the aid of Moreau; and Meheé de la Touche, an old Jacobin, and afterwards an emigrant, was dispatched to Germany, to open communications with the English ministers. It is certain that the emigrants went to Paris, firmly anticipating that they would be joined by Moreau, in which they were deceived; that De la Touche acted under written instructions from Fouché and Bonaparte himself, who told him what he was to learn, and what he was to say in order to mislead those with whom he had opened an intercourse; and that all the correspondence between the emigrants and their friends in France, was placed in the hands of the French authorities.

Amongst these papers were instructions given by Mr. Drake to various emissaries, whom he employed to act on the continent. These persons received minute directions as to how they were to conduct themselves, with a view to ascertain the plans of Bonaparte; to win over various parties whose aid would be essential; and to gain partisans among the army.

Towards the close of 1803, general Pichegru, who had been banished to Sinnamary by the faction of the 4th of September (18th of Fructidor), 1797, had made his escape and got to London, where he was found by Lajolais, and induced to join in the plot, which had the support of the count d’Artois; but Louis XVIII., who was then living at Warsaw, and to whom it was communicated, refused to give it his sanction. Cadoudal and his friends, according to the report of Regnier (the minister of justice and police), were received, on their landing, by men paid to guide them, by whom they were taken from one station to another, as far as Paris; where “they found rooms hired for them, by trusty guardians, in different quarters—at Chaillot, in the Rue de Bac, in the Faubourg St. Marceau, and in the Marais.” Here they appear to have employed themselves in concerting their plans. Pichegru did not arrive till January, 1804. He was also landed by captain Wright, whose vessel was, soon after, shipwrecked on the coast of Morbihan. The gallant captain, and all his crew, were brought prisoners to Paris, where the former was lodged in a cell in the Temple, from which he never emerged. Pichegru, on landing, immediately repaired to Paris, where he had several interviews with Moreau; with whom, however, no agreement was concluded. The general still wished for a republic; whilst Pichegru and Georges would undertake nothing, except for the restoration of the Bourbons. Georges’ plan (which appears to have been embraced by Pichegru) was, to collect a certain number of the bravest Vendéans in Paris, and, at their head, to attack Bonaparte in the midst of his guards; relying on the other members of the conspiracy to take advantage of the confusion which would ensue when the head of the republic was dead or a prisoner. The emigrants, generally, agreed to the plan of Georges; but, after six months had been spent by the latter and his immediate friends, in personal intercourse with those parties in Paris from whom, they were told, when in London, they might expect prompt and effective aid—the result was so disheartening, that it would appear the plan of any active movement was abandoned, and that the De Polignacs and others were preparing to leave France, when a number of arrests took place.

The French authorities professed to have known nothing positive about Georges and Pichegru till the arrest, on suspicion, of a man named Querelle, in January, 1804; who, to save his own life, betrayed his friends. The published letters, however, of the first consul, to Meheé de la Touche, and the evidence given by other agents, show that those authorities were aware of all that was transpiring. Fouché, whether he originated the movement or not, was possessed of more information respecting it than anyone else; and, having previously told Bonaparte, that "the air was full of poniards," just about the time when, according to Jules de Polignac, the conspiracy was really given up, he communicated to the first consul numerous details respecting it, with which he had been furnished by the double spies, who are affirmed to have been his own agents. Of many of these facts (particularly of the presence of Pichegru in Paris), Regnier was found to be ignorant. As a consequence, the first consul was induced to change his police minister, along with the measures necessary to suppress the movement. Orders were in consequence given, early in February, to arrest all those whose names were on Fouché's list; and forty-five persons were taken into custody. Pichegru and Georges, however, and many others, escaped at the time. On the 17th of February, the following order of the day was, to their surprise, as well as that of the inhabitants, addressed to the garrison of Paris:—"Soldiers! Fifty brigands have penetrated into the capital. Georges and general Pichegru are at their head. Their coming was occasioned by a man who is yet numbered among our defenders—by general Moreau, who was yesterday consigned to the hands of the national justice. Their design was, after having assassinated the first consul, to have delivered over France to the horrors of a civil war, and all the terrible revolutions of a counter-revolution."

These arrests threw Paris and the army into the utmost consternation. The soldiers were, generally, indignant at the imprisonment of Moreau, who, many declared, was only a victim to the ambition of the first consul; and had Richepanse and his brigade been in France, instead of St. Domingo, the consequences might have been serious. "The crisis," said Bonaparte, many years after, to Las Casas, "was of the most violent kind. Public opinion was in a state of fermentation. The sincerity of the government, the reality of the conspiracy, were incessantly called in question. All the violent passions were awakened; the rumours of change were incessant; the storm was tremendous." In the midst of it, the legislative assembly passed a law the same day that the first consul submitted it to them, decreeing death against any person who should shelter Georges, Pichegru, or any of sixty of their accomplices whose names were mentioned. Any one who was aware of their hiding-place, and did not reveal it, was sentenced to the galleys, to work in fetters, for six years. Paris was also ordered to be carefully watched: all might enter who pleased; but no one was allowed to leave it. These measures were successful. On the 28th of February, Pichegru was arrested, having been betrayed by an old friend, named Leblanc, in whose house he was concealed, and who was not proof against the reward of 100,000 crowns offered for his apprehension. He was seized in his bed at night, but was not captured till after a severe struggle, when he was conveyed to the Temple in his night-dress. A day or two after, M. Armand de Polignac, M. Jules de Polignac, and M. de Riviere, also fell into the hands of the police. Georges was captured on the 9th of March, as he was crossing the Place of the Odéon in a cabriolet, but not till he had shot one of the agents of the police (who stopped his carriage), and wounded another. All the known conspirators were now in custody.

The day after the arrest of Cadoudal, the first consul held a state council, to whom he communicated his belief, that the duc d'Enghien was implicated in the conspiracy. On previous occasions he had vented his indignation more against the Jacobins than the royalists; on this, the latter seemed destined to be the objects of his vengeance. He would have pardoned Moreau, if the latter had declared his cognizance of the plot, and thrown himself on his mercy; but he was embittered against the adherents of the Bourbons, and also against the Bourbons themselves; some of the prisoners having stated that they were to be joined by a prince of that house. "These Bourbons," he said, according to M. Thiers, "fancy that they may shed my blood like some vile animal, and yet my blood is quite as precious as theirs. I will repay them the alarm with which they seek to inspire me. I pardon Moreau the weakness and the errors to which he is urged by a stupid jealousy; but I will pitilessly shoot the very first of these princes who shall fall into my hands. I will teach them with what sort of a man they have to deal." He was supported in these sentiments and intentions by Fouché; and, notwithstanding the opposition of his colleagues, Le Brun and Cambacérès, he resolved to give effect to them on the very first opportunity that offered.

The declaration made by some of the prisoners, that they expected to be joined by a prince of the house of Bourbon (the duc de Berri, as they supposed), led the first consul to dispatch Savary to watch for his arrival, and to arrest him. Some papers found during the examinations, led this officer to conclude, that Biville cliff, on the Normandy coast, would be the spot where the prince would arrive; and he went there secretly, with a body of fifty men. There he obtained such information as led him to ascertain how the emigrants had landed unobserved; which was, by making use of a rope and apparatus, placed to facilitate the arrangements of the smugglers on the coast. He also traced their route to Paris; but, to the great annoyance of Bonaparte, he could hear nothing of the expected prince. The first consul then made inquiries as to the residences of the members of the Bourbon family; and ascertained, that Louis XVIII. and the duc de Angoulême were at Warsaw; the comte d'Artois, the duc de Berri, the prince de Condé and his son, at London; and that the duke d'Enghien, the grandson of the prince de Condé, was at Ettenheim, very near Strasburg. Two of the prisoners, arrested on the 17th of February, had deposed, that Georges and the royalist chiefs had been visited, while at Paris, by a person to whom they showed great deference. "He appeared to be about thirty-six years of age. His hair was light; his height and size of ordinary dimensions; his dress elegant. He was always received with great respect. When he entered the apartment, all present rose." On this information, an officer was dispatched to Strasburg, to make inquiries respecting the duke d'Enghien. He assumed a disguise which enabled him to penetrate into the household of his royal highness; and there he learned that, though living quietly upon the whole, the duke attended the theatre at Strasburg, and joined hunting parties, and that he was sometimes absent ten or twelve days together. A person in his suite, from the name given to him by the Germans, and who was in reality the marquis de Thumery, was suspected to be general Dumouriez. The report of this officer reached the first consul on the 10th of March; and he at once drew the conclusion, that, as no young prince could have arrived from London, so closely had Biville been watched—the mysterious personage who visited the emigrants, and who was treated with so much respect, must be the duke d'Enghien, who was accompanied by Dumouriez; who, Bonaparte supposed, had, like Pichegru, been seduced from his duty. He communicated the above circumstances, and his conclusions, to the council of state, on the same day that the report from Ettenheim arrived; and, on no other evidence, he himself drew up an order for the arrest of the prince, which he laid before the council. Lebrun was alarmed at the effect which such a step would produce in Europe; and Cambacérès warmly opposed it, but in vain. The council supported the first consul, and the order to arrest the unfortunate duke was agreed to by that body.

Colonels Ordener and Caulaincourt were entrusted with its execution, to the great grief of the latter, who was attached to the ex-royal family by consanguinity. Ordener was to conduct the arrest; and Caulaincourt was to proceed to Baden, with a letter to the grand-duke, explaining the reasons for that violation of his territory which was about to be committed. A force of 300 dragoons, four pieces of light cannon, several brigades of gendarmérie, and some pontoniers, with three days' provisions, and a considerable sum of money, was put under the charge of Ordener, who immediately proceeded to Schelestadt, on the Rhine. That river was crossed by the dragoons on the 15th of March, who surprised and surrounded the little town of Ettenheim, before any steps could have been taken to prevent them. A detachment proceeded to the residence of the duke d'Enghien, who finding resistance useless, surrendered to the lawless attack made upon him. No papers implicating him in the least were found; the marquis de Thumery was in attendance, but Dumouriez was neither seen nor heard of; and there was nothing whatever discovered to justify, in the slightest degree, the step that had been taken, even if the right of jurisdiction had not been violated in taking it. The duke was removed to Strasburg, and a courier dispatched with the intelligence of his arrest, to Paris. When the first consul received it, he exclaimed—"The royalists are incorrigible; they must be intimidated." Orders were sent that the captive should be taken to Paris, "to be tried before a military court, on the charge of having sought to excite to civil war, and of having borne arms against France."

The prince and his captors left Strasburg on the 18th of March—Palm-Sunday; a day spent by Bonaparte in the retirement of Malmaison, where Josephine in vain entreated him not to pursue any further his schemes of vengeance. Unable to reply to her, and feeling the truth of the remonstrances she addressed to his better feelings, whilst he refused to yield to them, he at last exclaimed—"You are a woman, and know nothing about politics; your proper part is to hold your tongue."

His royal highness was brought to Paris about noon on the 20th of March; and Murat, the governor of the capital, and the military commandant of the district, should have assembled the commission which was to try him. He, however, expressed his reluctance to do so, to the first consul, who signed all the necessary orders with his own hand; and giving them to Savary to execute, he took them to Murat to countersign, and then proceeded to Vincennes, where the trial was to take place. The orders, says Thiers, were very full and precise. "They provided for the formation of the commission; named the colonels who were to be members; appointed general Hullin president; and enjoined its immediate assemblage, that all might be settled in the course of the night—the execution being to take place immediately, if, as was not doubted, the verdict should be one of guilty." Vincennes is an ancient castellated fortress, about a mile and a-half beyond the faubourg of St. Antoine. It had been long used as a state prison; and when the duke arrived, M. Harel, the governor, was ordered to prepare a room for him; and to dig a grave in the court. He replied, that that would not be easy, as the court was paved; and he was then told, he must find another place. Ultimately the ditch was fixed upon; and there, at the foot of the rampart, the place of interment was prepared. When "the prince arrived, at seven in the evening," says M. Harel, "he was dying of cold and hunger, but his air was by no means melancholy." The governor, as his room was not ready, received him in his own; where he sat down to table, and invited M. Harel to partake of the refreshments placed before him. He repeatedly asked, "What do they want with me?" "What are they going to do with me?" But we are told, by the same authority, "these questions made no alteration in his tranquillity, and indicated no disquietude." He retired to bed after his repast, but was soon roused, and conducted to the council-chamber. There he found general Hullin and the six other members of the court; Savary shortly after entered, and took his place behind the general's chair. The act of accusation was instantly read. It charged the duke "with having borne arms against the republic; with having offered his services to the English government, the enemies of the French people; with having received and accredited the agents of that government, furnished them with the means of obtaining intelligence, and conspired with them against the exterior and interior security of the state; with having put himself at the head of an assemblage of emigrants and others, in the pay of England, formed on the frontiers of France, in the territories of Baden; with having carried on communications in Strasbourg, calculated to disturb the peace of the adjoining departments, and favour the views of England; with being engaged in the conspiracy set on foot at Paris against the life of the first consul; and being about, in case of its success, to enter France."

By law, the accused should have had counsel to defend him; by law, there should have been witnesses to sustain the charges. The duke had, however, to conduct his own defence; and there was not even a scrap of paper put in evidence in support of the accusation. He was questioned upon them, and his answers formed the whole case against him. In these answers, says general Hullin, the president, "he indignantly repelled the assertion, of having been, directly or indirectly, engaged in any conspiracy against the life of the first consul, but admitted having borne arms against France; saying, with a courage and resolution that forbade us, even for his own sake, to make him vary on that point, 'that he had maintained the rights of his family, and that a Condé could never re-enter France without his arms in his hand. His birth, his opinions,' he said, 'rendered him for ever the enemy of the government.'" It is somewhat surprising, that, under such convictions, general Hullin could join in the verdict of "guilty," which the court pronounced; though, as even Savary admits, there were "neither documents, proofs, nor witnesses against the prince;" and "his connexion with England, in the rank in which he was born, or his correspondence with his grandfather, the prince of Condé, could not be considered as proofs of a conspiracy." Before sentence was pronounced, the prince wished to have a private audience of the first consul. The president would have forwarded his request to Bonaparte, but Savary said, that was his business; in fact, he had, according to his own statement, been forbidden to forward such recommendation to the government. The president, therefore, pronounced the sentence, which was immediately carried into execution. The duke was taken to the ditch by torchlight. Refused the presence of a priest, he offered up a brief prayer himself, cut off locks of his hair, which he delivered with his watch and a ring, to be forwarded to the princess de Rohan and his father; and then turning to the soldiers drawn up to execute the sentence, he exclaimed, as the signal for firing, "I die for my king, and for France!" He almost immediately fell dead, pierced with seven balls: and his corpse was thrown into the grave that had been dug, dressed as it was, and buried in the mould! Savary, who had orders from the first consul to see the trial take place, and the sentence executed—when all was over, returned to Paris, to communicate particulars to him who had been the main mover in the catastrophe.

Few events ever occurred, of which those engaged in them were so heartily ashamed, as this arrest, mock trial, and abrupt execution of the duke d'Enghien. Savary, Hullin, Murat—even Napoleon himself—all endeavoured to exculpate themselves from the weight of guilt which pressed upon them, and to throw it upon others. Upon Murat, certainly, only a very small share of the responsibility rested. He merely countersigned the orders drawn up by Bonaparte; and almost the last words he uttered before his death, were—"I took no part in the tragedy of the duke d'Enghien: I swear it before that God in whose presence I am about to appear." Napoleon attempted to shift the blame to Talleyrand. He said the duke wrote a letter, and sent it to Talleyrand, "which was not delivered (God knows for what reason) until he was no more. If I had seen it, I would most certainly have pardoned him." This letter, he told O'Meara, "was written to him from Strasbourg, and not delivered till two days after the duke's death." Bourrienne affirms that no such letter was written; and that the whole story was a fabrication.

However this may be, it was ascertained, very shortly after the tragedy at Vincennes, that the duke had not visited Paris as suspected; that the mysterious personage who called upon the emigrants was Pichegru; and that the duke's absence from Ettenheim at various times, was occasioned by his visits to the princess de Rohan, an emigrant lady of distinction, residing in the neighbourhood, of whom he was enamoured. Had he been guilty, his forcible arrest was a gross violation of international law; but, under the circumstances, a more atrocious crime does not stain the annals of history. Its effects in Paris, we have the authority of Thiers in stating, were most unfavourable. "Indignation had been aroused against all who had joined the Chouans in threatening his (Bonaparte's) life. This indignation extended to Moreau, whose guilt, though less conclusively proved as yet, was, nevertheless, beginning to seem very probable; and the most ardent wishes were expressed for the preservation of the man upon whom all looked as the tutelar genius of France. The sanguinary execution at Vincennes produced a sudden reaction. The royalists were much irritated, and still more alarmed; whilst worthy and reasonable men were filled with regret at seeing a government, hitherto so admirable, imbruing its hands in blood, like those who had put Louis XVI. to death; and imitating them too, it must be confessed, without the excuse of the revolutionary passions which, in 1793, had perverted the coolest heads and the kindest hearts."*

The execution of the duke d'Enghien was succeeded by several important events. The next day, the celebrated Chateaubriand was to leave Paris for the republic of the Valais, as ambassador from France. He waited on the first consul to take leave, and noticed his constrained demeanour, without knowing the cause. He learnt it soon after quitting the Tuileries, and immediately threw up his appointment—a proceeding which elicited a violent burst of anger from Bonaparte, who never forgave him. The ministers of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, all sent in remonstrances against the trial and execution. Prussia protested against the violation of the territories of the elector of Baden; and the emperor of Russia ordered his court, and all his ambassadors at foreign courts, to go into mourning for the duke. On the morning of the 6th of April, Pichegru—who had been several times examined, without eliciting anything from his answers to inculpate himself or anyone else—was found strangled in his prison; a black silk handkerchief being twisted tightly round his neck, by means of a small stick about five inches long. Whether the act was suicide or murder, has never been cleared up; and, in all probability, it never will be. Bonaparte, when at St. Helena, expressed his opinion that it was the former. "Pichegru," he said, "saw that his situation was desperate. His daring mind could not endure the infamy of punishment: he despaired of my clemency, or despised it, and put himself to death. Had I been inclined to commit a crime, it is not Pichegru, but Moreau, I would have struck." Pichegru's accomplices, or supposed accomplices, were not brought to trial till the 28th of May. Forty-five were placed at the bar; Moreau, the two Polignacs, Lajolais, De Riviere, and Georges being amongst them. The trial continued for twelve days: nothing was elicited to implicate Moreau in the conspiracy, and he was treated with the greatest respect by soldiers and people during the whole of the proceedings. He was ultimately tried under a law passed after he was imprisoned; which made the concealment of proclaimed conspirators an offence punishable by six years' labour at the galleys. The trials ended in a verdict of guilty of conspiracy against Georges Cadoudal and fifteen others, including Armand de Polignac; Moreau (whom some of his judges would have acquitted entirely), Jules de Polignac, and three others, were found guilty of a minor offence: twenty-four were acquitted. The police seized them, however, as they left the court, and they were recommitted to prison by command of Bonaparte. Georges, and those condemned with him, were sentenced to death; Moreau, and those in his category, to two years' imprisonment. Some months after these trials, captain Wright was found, in his cell in the Temple, with his throat cut. The same mystery hangs over his fate as envelopes that of Pichegru.

Some French writers—and we regret to say that some Englishmen have followed them—have endeavoured to implicate the English government in the plots against the life of Bonaparte. There is not the slightest evidence of the fact. If they sanctioned the proceedings of Messrs. Drake, Taylor, and Smith, and the connection of those gentlemen with the conspiracy of the emigrants, it was for no other object than to overthrow what they considered the government of a usurper, and to restore the Bourbons. Bourrienne, who was secretary to the first consul, positively affirms, and he had all the sources of information at his command, that, "neither in his public character nor private relations, had he ever discovered the smallest evidence to warrant the assertion that the English government was ever engaged in any plots of a dishonourable character." Elsewhere he says, that "he could affirm, with perfect confidence, that the British government had constantly rejected with indignation, not, indeed, the proposals made to them for overturning the consular or imperial governments, but all designs of assassination or personal violence against the first consul or emperor." There is now a better understanding as to the rights of nations; and no British ministry would sanction attempts of conspirators to overturn a government with whom they had unfriendly relations. But their conduct, in 1804, was not contrary to public law; it was prompted by an honest desire to restore a king, princes, nobles, and people, to rights which revolution had wrested from them; and it was a proceeding of which the first consul was not the man to complain. When his brother Joseph was ambassador at Rome, in 1797, he wrote to him—"Should the pope die, you must exert yourself to the utmost to prevent another from being appointed, and to bring about a revolution." The man who could give such instructions to an ambassador at the court of a friendly power, had no right to complain of an attempt made by an enemy to revolutionise France under his government, for the purpose of restoring the family whom a previous revolution had deprived of the throne, and exiled from the country. Besides, "from the commencement of the war," as lord Hawkesbury stated, in a manifesto on the subject of the conspiracy, the French government "had constantly kept up a communication with the disaffected in the territories of his majesty, and had assembled at that very moment, on the coast of France, a corps of Irish rebels, destined to second them in their designs against that part of the United Kingdom."

* It is now known that Talleyrand had apprised the duke of his danger, if he continued to reside at Ettenheim; and that the emissaries of Bonaparte would not have found him there, but for the tardiness of the Austrian government in preparing his passports.

In the midst of the complications, and the various unpleasant circumstances, which sprang out of the conspiracies of 1804, one most important "reform" was brought to perfection, under the superintendence of Bonaparte; which, if there were not other circumstances of a disparaging nature connected with his career, would warrant the historian in handing him down to posterity as one of the greatest benefactors of the people over whom he ruled. Previous to the period of the consulate, the state of the law in France had been, as it is now in England, most unsatisfactory. As with us, there were two systems—the written and the unwritten law; each system branching out into divisions, almost innumerable. There were, also, many local and provincial customs; and the commentators, whose name was "legion," tended rather still more to confound what was sufficiently complex, than to explain it. Some idea of the state of the law in France may be formed from the statement of Voltaire, which, those acquainted with the subject assure us, is not at all an exaggeration. "Besides the 40,000 Roman laws, of which some one is always cited at random," says our authority, "we have 500 different customs, reckoning the small towns and burghs, which derogate from the usages of the principal jurisdiction; so that a person travelling post in France, changes laws oftener than he changes horses; and an advocate, who is very learned in one city, is no better than an ignoramus in the next." In the year VIII. of the revolution, a commission was appointed to reduce these numerous and complex laws into a code. This work was carried on till the close of 1803; the council of state taking its share in the labour with the most eminent jurisconsults, Napoleon himself aiding them with his suggestions and his advice. The result of the conjoint labours of so many eminent men, was promulgated on the 31st of March, 1804, under the title of Code Civil des Français. It comprised, in fact, five codes.—1st. The Code Civil, which defines the rights and the relations of persons and of property.—2nd. The Code de Procédure Civile, by which all judicial proceedings are regulated.—3rd. The Code Commerce, defining the duties and relations of principals, agents, and purchasers, in commercial and trading transactions, and detailing the laws of exchange, partnership, insurance, shipping, &c.—4th. The Code d'Instruction Criminelle, by which the duties of municipal and police officers, as well as those of the people in their social relations, are prescribed; and the mode of proceeding in all courts of justice in criminal matters.—5th. The Code Penal defines the punishments awarded for offences.—This code, often called the Code Napoleon, being the title given to it under the empire, gave the jurisprudence and the judicial system of France the form they now bear: it has been found to work so well, that Belgium, the Rhenish provinces of Prussia, and Italy have adopted it; and having received some amendments and additions, it remains, and will long remain, as the most beneficial memento of the consulate, next to the re-establishment of christianity as the law and practice of the land.

The promulgation of this code was followed by the completion of that scheme of ambitious aggrandisement which Bonaparte had, from his first accession to power, contemplated; and towards which, his being declared first consul, the extension of his tenure of office for ten years, and its further extension for the term of his life, were all steps. His views and wishes were known to his friends; and when an address of congratulation, on his escape from the conspiracy of Georges, was under consideration in the senate, Fouché said, "that, in order to destroy the hopes of the conspirators, and to secure the permanent existence of the government after the death of the reigning chief, other institutions were indispensable." The senate assented, and incorporated the substance of Fouché's remark into the address. Bonaparte, in his reply, said, "that the subject they had suggested required the greatest consideration. For himself, he wanted nothing; but it was his duty to consider the lot of France, and what the future was likely to produce. But he would accept no new title, or any fresh arrangements, without their being submitted to the people for their sanction."

The subject thus broached, through the instrumentality of Fouché, Bonaparte submitted to the council of state three questions. 1st. Is the hereditary form of government preferable to the elective? 2. If so, is it expedient now to establish the hereditary form? 3. In what manner ought it to be established? A report on these questions was drawn up, which the council could not agree to; but the members declared their opinions separately to the first consul, and they predominated in favour of the hereditary form; twenty councillors declaring for it, to seven opponents. The council held four sittings before they came to this conclusion; and, during the time, Lucien Bonaparte had repeated interviews with members of the tribunate, senate, and legislative body, urging them to forward the wishes of the first consul. In compliance with the views expressed by Lucien, a resolution, which, in substance, declared that it was advisable "that Napoleon Bonaparte, at present first consul, should be declared emperor of the French; and that the imperial dignity be declared hereditary in his family," was laid on the table of the tribunate, on the 23rd of April, by M. Curée, who had been a member of the convention, and was a man of no mark or note. It was debated on the 30th, and on the 1st of May; being opposed, on the latter day, by M. Carnot, in an admirable speech. He alone voted against it; the other members were unanimous in its favour. Six orators were deputed to explain the wishes and objects of the tribunate to the senate; which body, on the 16th of May, adopted a senatus consultum, declaring Bonaparte emperor. The votes were taken by ballot. Except five, all were affirmatives. Of the five, three were negatives and two blanks. The legislative body was not in session; but the president, Fontanes, assembled the members who were in Paris, and they voted an address to the first consul, conveying the same sentiments as were expressed by the tribunate and senate. While these discussions were taking place, the members of the different bodies were endeavouring to make interest with the first consul for themselves. The senate wanted to have the appointments made for life; all the members of the tribunate and the legislative body had some request to prefer. "These base men," says an historian (and his assertion appears to be fully warranted), "sold a nation into bondage for a mess of pottage."

The senate couched their "decree," declaring "Napoleon Bonaparte emperor of France"—the office to "be hereditary in his family"—in absolute terms, without any reference to the voice of the people. An appeal to that source did not, indeed, appear to be very necessary. As soon as it was known that the question was mooted in the legislative bodies, the public voice appeared to be in favour of the empire; and it was with difficulty that the army was prevented from proclaiming Bonaparte emperor before the decision of those bodies was known. He, however, was not disposed to dispense with an appeal to that popular voice which had on all occasions pronounced in his favour. The decree of the senate was presented to him at St. Cloud, on the 18th of May, when, in accepting the new dignity—which in fact did not give him, personally, more power, it only exalted his rank—he said, he "should submit the law concerning the succession to the throne, to the sanction of the people." This was done, and 3,572,329 votes were given in the affirmative, the negatives only amounting to 2,569. Besides declaring the government hereditary, the senate, by another decree, on the 19th of May, created all the members of the Bonaparte family princes of the blood. It was also ordered, that the tribunate should be divided into three sections—the legislative, the interior, and the financial—each of which was to discuss the draft of laws presented to it by the legislative body. That body and the senate retained their old form, but the members were to be elected as follows:—The "domiciliated" citizens (i. e., the householders) in each canton, formed cantonal assemblies, who chose the electoral colleges, the members of which were to be possessed of a certain amount of property, or be members of the Legion of Honour. When a vacancy occurred in the senate or legislative body, the electoral college nominated two of its own members, one of whom the head of the state selected to fill it. Under this constitution Napoleon was absolute. He could, either directly or indirectly, control the legislative bodies, which were powerless against his will.

The same day that the senate decreed the modifications in the constitution, Napoleon instituted a grand council, consisting of—Joseph Bonaparte, grand elector; Louis Bonaparte, high constable; Cambacérès, arch-chancellor; and Lebrun, arch-treasurer. He thus provided for two of his brothers (Lucien and Jerome had offended him by marrying contrary to his wishes) and his two late colleagues. At the same time, he created the following generals field-marshal of the empire:—Berthier, Murat, Moncey, Jourdain, Masséna, Augereau, Bernadotte, Soult, Brune, Lannes, Mortier, Ney, Davoust, Bessières, Kellermann, Lefebvre, Pérignon, and Serurier. He also appointed Duroc grand marshal of the palace; Caulaincourt, master of the horse; Berthier, grand huntsman; and the count Ségur, master of the ceremonies of his court. Maret, who had been his secretary since his appointment as consul for life, continued in that office; but the emperor summoned Bourrienne to the Tuileries, and resumed his communications with him.

On the 27th of May, Napoleon, as emperor, received the oaths of the senate and the various public bodies; and, soon after, he pardoned eight of the conspirators who had been condemned with Georges, including M. Armand de Polignac and Lajolais, the latter of whom had been a spy of Fouché's; and, probably, his trial and sentence were only nominal. Moreau asked, and obtained, permission to retire to America; the emperor purchasing his estate at Gros Bois, near Paris, and paying the expenses of his journey to Barcelona—where he embarked for the United States—out of the public treasury. The estate he conferred on Berthier. Early in July he received the copy of a protest, which Louis XVIII. had addressed, on the 6th of June, to the sovereigns of Europe, against his "usurpation" of the sovereignty of France. The only notice taken of this document was to publish it in the columns of the Moniteur. This protest had little effect, either upon the European powers or the French people, who seemed most heartily to rejoice at what they considered as the establishment of a permanent government, in lieu of the uncertain and changeable system which had prevailed since the revolution first broke out; and addresses and congratulations flowed in to the Tuileries from all quarters. The Paris people, too, liked the "pomp and ceremony" of royalty, which Napoleon re-established in all their splendour. On the 14th of July he delighted them with an imposing spectacle at the Invalides, where he made the first distribution of the crosses of the Legion of Honour. The second took place at Boulogne. On the 16th he left Paris for that town, where he had his tent pitched in the midst of a large plain, on which he assembled his troops, selected from them those who were to be admitted to the legion, and, after 2,000 drums had beat the charge, repeated to them the oath in a loud voice, which they took amidst the general and enthusiastic acclaim of the soldiers. On this occasion Napoleon remodelled the Polytechnic school, which he placed entirely under military regulations, and instituted nine decennial prizes for the scholars, of the value of 400 francs each, to be awarded for the best inventions, and the best works in science, literature, and art. It was expected, at Boulogne, from this visit, that the time for the threatened invasion was come, the preparations for which had never been intermitted. But though the small vessels still contrived to pass from other ports to Boulogne, by creeping along the shore, the English fleet in the channel was much too powerful to admit of ships of war being brought round from Toulon, and other ports, to cover the landing. The design, however, was not abandoned; and the state of alarm in which it kept England, answered the purposes of the new emperor of France in more ways than one.

When he left Boulogne, Napoleon met Josephine at the castle of Lacken, and they proceeded together to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he received the congratulations of the ambassadors of Austria, Spain, Portugal, and Naples—all those powers having recognised him as emperor; and several of the German princes paid their respects in person. While on his journey, he read madame de Staël's Delphine, which so displeased him, that he banished her from Paris. It is thought that this step was taken principally on account of her attacks on the Roman catholic religion, as he was most desirous, at that time, of conciliating the pope, to whom he dispatched an embassy from Mayence, on the 15th of September, with a request that his holiness would visit Paris to perform the ceremony of coronation. During his stay at Mayence, he laid the foundation for that change in Germany which was afterwards inaugurated as the Confederation of the Rhine; and he also issued a decree (on the 21st of September), organising the establishment of twelve colleges, in the principal cities of France, for the study of the law. He returned to Paris in October, after an absence of three months.

In November, Pius VII., having acceded to the request of Napoleon, left Rome for the French capital. On his arrival he was received by the emperor at a short distance from Fontainebleau. They drove together to that palace; but the pope proceeded alone to Paris, where he was welcomed with every demonstration of respect, and lodged sumptuously in the Tuileries. On the 1st of December, the senate and tribunate presented to Napoleon, with great pomp, the result of the appeal to the people on the hereditary succession; and, on the 2nd, the coronation took place in the cathedral of Nôtre-Dame. Nothing could exceed the splendour and magnificence of the ceremony, nor the brilliance of the assembly by whom the emperor and empress were accompanied and surrounded. After the crown had been placed on his own head, and that of Josephine, Napoleon took the following oath:—"I swear to maintain the integrity of the territory of the empire. To respect, and cause to be respected, the laws of the concordat, and the liberty of worship. To respect, and cause to be respected, equality of rights, political and civil liberty, and the irrevocability of the sale of the national domains. To impose no tax but by legal authority. To maintain the institution of the Legion of Honour; and to govern with no other views but the interest, the happiness, and the glory of the French people." Then the heralds proclaimed—"The most glorious and august emperor Napoleon, emperor of the French, is crowned and enthroned—long live the emperor!" This was followed by loud cries of,

"Long live the emperor! long live the empress!" and by the performance of the "Te Deum." By that time night had set in; and the cortège, led and surrounded by numberless torches, returned to the Tuileries.

The next day a grand military spectacle took place in the Champ-de-Mars. All the regiments in Paris and the neighbourhood were assembled; and the emperor, in the uniform of a colonel of the guard, delivered to the colonels the eagles, which were to be substituted for the old standards. The colonels having received them, he said—"Soldiers! there are your standards! These eagles will serve as your rallying-point. They will ever be seen where your emperor shall deem them necessary for the defence of his throne and of his people." These new ensigns were, shortly after, distributed to all the regiments of France.

The coronation of their emperor by the pope, diffused the greatest satisfaction throughout France; but it called forth another protest from Louis XVIII. It had not the slightest effect in damping the satisfaction either of the new emperor or of his subjects. The latter employed the last month of 1804 and the first of 1805 in a series of rejoicings, assemblies, and fêtes, which occasioned an enormous expenditure, and, by giving an impetus to trade, and increasing employment to the people, served still more to reconcile the masses to the change.

The war with England produced few events in 1804; but one of those events—the defeat of admiral Linois in the Indian ocean—occasioned great mortification in France. The admiral had escaped from Pondicherry with one ship of the line and three frigates; and, in February, 1804, was employed in watching for the home-bound English fleet of merchantmen from China. On the 14th of February, Linois descried this fleet; and, on the 15th, the two squadrons came to close quarters. The English were commanded by commodore Dance, who sent the weaker vessels to the rear, and, with the others, fought and defeated the men-of-war, putting them to flight, and pursuing them for two hours; thus gallantly maintaining the honour of the British flag, and preserving property to the value of £1,500,000.—In May (in which month Mr. Pitt again became prime minister of England), Surinam was taken possession of, by a combined land and sea force, under Sir Charles Green and commodore Hood. The event diffused great joy amongst the inhabitants.—During the year several attacks were made on the flotillas destined to convey the French troops across the Channel, but with little success. One by Sir Sidney Smith, on the 16th of May, was intended to prevent the junction of the flotillas of Flushing and Ostend: it failed, for want of gun-boats, as the large vessels could not approach near enough to produce any effect. On the 2nd of October, an attempt was made by lord Keith to destroy the flotilla in the harbour of Boulogne, by the explosion of combustibles, launched in copper vessels, which obtained the name of "catamarans." Twelve of these vessels were floated into the harbour; but the flotilla opened a passage for them, and they passed into the rear, where they blew up, doing no damage.—With Spain, the relations with England became disturbed during the year, when it was known that she had agreed to pay nearly £3,000,000 per annum to France—a sum which was applied to the fitting-out the armament intended to invade this country. The great partiality shown to French vessels over those of Britain, and the naval preparations in the Spanish ports, were other sources of disputes and jealousies, and the greater part of the year was spent in the interchange of notes of an angry nature. At length, in September, there was an accumulation of circumstances, any one of which afforded ground for serious remonstrance. About 1,500 French troops were received at Ferrol, where four French ships of the line were lying. The Spanish government, after promising to cease her naval preparations, had ordered the arming of three ships of the line, two frigates, and several small vessels at that port. Similar instructions had been sent to Carthagena and Cadiz: three ships of the line were ordered from Cadiz to Ferrol; the packet-ships were authorised to arm, as in time of war; and it was announced, that, within a month, eleven ships would be ready for sea at Ferrol; whilst the arrival of the treasure-ships from America was the only thing waited for, as it was generally reported, to induce the Spanish government to declare for France. In consequence of these numerous acts, which appeared to evince decided hostility on the part of that government, the English ambassador, Mr. Frere, addressed, on the 27th of September, a very strong note to the court of Spain; in which it was stated, that "the discontinuance of naval preparations was the principal condition insisted upon by England, and agreed to by Spain, as the price of the forbearance of the former;" and that the violation of that condition "could be considered in no other light than as a hostile demonstration, and a defiance given to England." The prince of Peace replied, that the king of Spain had never thought of violating his agreement with the British government, and that the cessation of all naval armaments against Great Britain would be observed. However, the British government was not satisfied with mere words—they desired acts: and instructions were sent to lord Nelson, in the Mediterranean; lord Cochrane, on the Ferrol; and lord Cornwallis, on the Brest stations, ordering them not only to prevent the sailing of the French or Spanish fleets, but to intercept the homeward-bound treasure-ships of Spain. On the 5th of October, captain Moore, in the Indefatigable, with three other frigates, fell-in with four Spanish frigates having treasure on board. As the commanders would not surrender without fighting, they were captured, with treasure amounting to above £2,000,000; but more than a hundred Spaniards were killed or wounded, and upwards of 240 lost in one of the frigates which exploded. This led to a declaration of war, by Spain, against England, which appeared on the 12th of December; and, at the same time, a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with France, was signed at Madrid. The conduct of the British government, in this instance, cannot be justified. No doubt Great Britain was fighting for her existence; and the overt acts of Spain were most unfriendly, and amply sufficient to have justified a declaration of war. In the absence of that declaration, however, the treasure-ships ought not to have been interrupted; and Napoleon was enabled to set-off this violation of international law against his arrest of the duke d'Enghien, at Ettenheim.

The foreign relations of France were not quite so favourable when the year 1804 closed, as they were when it commenced. Notwithstanding the affair of the duke d'Enghien, Austria and Prussia had not hesitated to acknowledge Napoleon Bonaparte as emperor; but several events had occurred subsequent to that period, to produce a coldness with both those powers, the most important being the development which was made, during the emperor's residence at Mayence, of his designs with respect to a fresh organisation of Germany, which could not be otherwise than detrimental to the interest of Austria in that quarter. In October, an outrage took place, of a similar character to the arrest of the duke d'Enghien, in which Prussia, as the protector of the circle of Lower Saxony, was peculiarly interested. In the night of the 25th of that month, in consequence of an order signed by the French minister of police, at Paris, Sir George Rumboldt, the British minister at Hamburg, was taken prisoner at his villa near that city, and conveyed, with all his papers, to Paris, where he was lodged in the Temple. The king himself, and his ambassador at Paris, remonstrated warmly with Napoleon upon this fresh violation of international law, which had not such a tragic termination as attended the violation of the territories of the elector of Baden.

There was nothing found in the papers of Sir George Rumboldt to implicate either him or his government in any improper transaction; and he was liberated, being sent to Cherbourg, and put on board the first British cruiser seen off that port. The event, however, strengthened the anti-Gallican party in Prussia, which was then making head, under Charles Auguste, baron Hardenberg, who had just become a minister of the Prussian crown.—With Russia, an interchange of notes, not in the most friendly tone, had been carried on during the year. M. d'Oubril enforced the demands which M. Markoff had made in the previous year; and the remonstrances of Russia after the execution of the duke d'Enghien, were more decided than those of any other power. The correspondence ended in Napoleon ordering his ambassador to quit St. Petersburg in forty-eight hours, leaving there only a chargé d'affaires. This step was followed by the appearance of Russian squadrons in the Black Sea and in the Mediterranean; and whilst troops were landed in the Ionian Islands, Italy was menaced. Under the influence of the czar, Turkey refused to recognise the emperor; and the French ambassador left Constantinople.—Another breach was with Sweden. The remonstrances of that power on the seizure, trial, and execution of the duke d'Enghien, were received in such a haughty manner, and answered in so rude a tone, that, on the 7th of September, Sweden terminated all confidential communications between the two governments; and, on the 3rd of December, concluded an alliance with England; by which, in consideration of a subsidy of £80,000 to enable Sweden to fortify Stralsund, Great Britain was allowed to establish a dépôt for her German legion at that city, or in the isle of Rügen; and to convert one or other of those places into an entrepôt for British produce and manufactures. To counterbalance these fallings-off in Germany and in the north, there was the active alliance with Spain, substituted for the passive assistance that country had hitherto afforded; and by a treaty with the Ligurian republic, concluded on the 20th of October, all the resources of Genoa were placed at the disposal of France; and Napoleon was permitted to make a naval station of the magnificent harbour—the finest in the Mediterranean.

CHAPTER VII.

NAPOLEON AGAIN ATTEMPTS TO CONCLUDE PEACE WITH ENGLAND; ALTERATION IN THE CONSTITUTION OF HOLLAND; NAPOLEON CROWNED KING OF ITALY; COALITION OF ENGLAND, RUSSIA, AUSTRIA, AND SWEDEN, AGAINST FRANCE; THE ARMAMENT AT BOULOGNE; DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH FLEET BY SIR R. CALDER; PLANS OF THE COALITION; PLAN OF NAPOLEON'S GERMAN CAMPAIGN; FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL STATE OF FRANCE; THE CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY; THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR; ALLIANCE BETWEEN RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA; OCCUPATION OF VIENNA BY THE FRENCH; CAMPAIGN IN ITALY AND THE TYROL; BATTLE OF AUSTERLITZ; TREATIES WITH BADEN, WURTEMBERG, BAVARIA, AND PRUSSIA; TREATY OF PRESEURG.

THE emperor closed the year 1804 by opening the session of the legislative body on the 25th of December. In this session a system of indirect taxation was organised, under the name of Droits Reunis, with a view to relieve the pressure upon the land, which was become almost unbearable: these droits soon formed an important part of the revenue. A civil-list was also granted to Napoleon, of 25,000,000 francs per annum, besides his domains and residences; and the entire expenses of the financial year (from September to September), were fixed at 684,000,000 francs, those of the previous year having amounted to 762,000,000 francs.

The year opened gloomily, as there were evident signs of another continental coalition being formed against France. From a sense of the difficulties which were gathering around him, or from a real desire for peace, Napoleon resolved, once more, to address the king of Great Britain, and express his wish that the hostilities between the two countries should be suspended, with a view to a treaty of alliance being entered into between them. The letter was dated on the 2nd of January; and was an autograph. He addressed the king as "Monsieur, mon frere;" and proceeded to say, that "France and England abused their prosperity. They might struggle for ages; but would their governments thus fulfil the most sacred of their duties? And so much blood, uselessly shed, would it not rise up in accusation against them? He attached no dishonour to taking the first step in this matter, as he had sufficiently, he thought, proved to the world, that he feared none of the chances of war:" and he concluded by declaring his hope, that "the king would believe in the sincerity of the sentiments he had expressed; and in his desire to give proofs of that sincerity." The then foreign secretary of England, the earl of Mulgrave, replied to this note by a despatch, addressed to M. Talleyrand, dated the 14th of January. This despatch acknowledged the receipt of the letter addressed to the king, by the "head of the French government;" and declared, that "there was nothing his majesty had more at heart, than to seize the first opportunity of restoring to his people the blessings of peace, provided that peace was founded on a basis not incompatible with the permanent interests and security of his dominions." But "the object of peace could only be secured by engagements calculated to provide for the future safety and tranquillity of Europe, and to prevent a renewal of the dangers and misfortunes in which it had been involved. His majesty, therefore, felt it impossible to reply more particularly to the overture which had been made to him, until he had time to communicate with the powers of the continent, to whom he was united in the most confidential manner; and particularly the emperor of Russia." This despatch was not answered; and the attempt to restore peace was not persisted in.

The early events of the year appeared to justify all the suspicions of those who thought that Napoleon was aiming at nothing so much as extending the power and the dominion of France. One of the first changes was in the government of Holland. Having assumed the dignity of emperor himself, Napoleon appears to have considered that republican institutions were not to be tolerated in any country which was under the control or the influence of France. A new constitution was therefore given to Holland, by which all the executive, and much of the legislative, power was vested in a chief magistrate, called the "grand pensionary." The office was conferred upon M. Schimmelpennick, who had returned to his ambassadorial post at Paris; and the new constitution, accepted by the legislative body on the 22nd of March, received, on the 30th of April following, the sanction of the great majority of the inhabitants.

Simultaneously with the changes in Holland, others were preparing in Italy. The pope had continued at Paris, after the ceremony of the coronation was performed, with the view of obtaining, through the intervention of the emperor, the restoration of the Legations, which had been detached, in the first Italian war, from the papal territory. Before he left the French capital, disappointed in his expectations, he performed, at St. Cloud, on the 24th of March, the ceremony of baptism upon the infant son of Louis Bonaparte, who received the name of Louis Napoleon, and is the present (1860) emperor of France. Instead of restoring any part of Italy to the pope, it was the aim of the emperor to centre the ruling power over the peninsula in himself, or in members of his family. As soon as he felt secure on the imperial throne of France, intrigue was actively employed in Italy, to induce the popular voice in that country to declare in favour of monarchy; the emperor's original intention being, to convert the republic into a kingdom, and to make his brother Joseph the first king. Joseph, however, refused to accept the sovereignty, as he apprehended it would interfere with his right of succession to the empire; and Napoleon then resolved to place the crown upon his own head, and to make Eugene Beauharnais, the son of Josephine, viceroy. To effect this change without any appearance of force, many agents were at work; and they were so far successful, that, on the 17th of March, Melzi, the vice-president of the Italian republic, with a deputation from the Italian consulta, or senate, appeared before the emperor, seated upon his throne, and conveyed to him the wish of the Italians to revive the kingdom of Italy; and that he who had been the founder of their republic, should be their first king. Of course he complied most graciously with the request; and, on the 18th, he appeared in the senate, when the members of the deputation took the oath of fidelity to him as king of Italy. On this occasion he addressed the senate, and said, that "it was necessary to maintain France in the rank among nations which she had always enjoyed. The partition of Poland, the provinces torn from Turkey, the conquest of India, and of almost all the European colonies, had, in a manner, turned the balance against her." Therefore he accepted the crown of Italy, whose permanent annexation to France would be a great addition to the wealth and resources of the French territory. But it was to be united to the empire only for a time; and its "ultimate separation from the crown of France would be only deferred till it could take place without danger to Italian independence." After this ceremony, Eugene Beauharnais immediately assumed the command of the Italian army; and, on the 31st, the establishment of the Italian kingdom was proclaimed at Milan.

On the 2nd of April—having placed his brother Joseph at the head of affairs during his absence—the emperor left Paris for Milan, accompanied by the empress, for the purpose of being invested with the iron crown. He took the road, by Lyons, over Mont Cenis—passing through Turin, Asti, and Alessandria; and joining, on the 5th of May, in a gorgeous pageant on the field of Marengo. His triumphal entry into Milan took place on the 8th of May; and, on the 26th, the ceremony of coronation was performed in the cathedral of that city, by the archbishop. Napoleon took the iron crown, and placed it on his own head, saying—"God has given it to me. Woe to him who shall attempt to lay hands upon it!" After the coronation, numerous congratulatory addresses were presented, not the least flattering of which came from the king of Naples, who, at the same time, was holding a correspondence with the courts of Vienna and St. Petersburg, inimical to the interests of France. A deputation from the senate of Genoa soon after arrived, to request that that republic might be added to France—"the changes which had taken place around it, having rendered its insulated situation a source of perpetual inquietude." On the 7th of June, Napoleon opened the first session of the Italian legislative body; which, before it separated, fixed the annual expenses of the kingdom at 100,000,000 francs; ordered the Code Napoleon (as the Code Civil des Français was then called) to be introduced; and instituted the order of the Iron Crown. On the 9th a decree appeared, formally uniting the Ligurian republic to France, and dividing it into the departments of Genoa, Montenotte, and the Apennines. Thus, having completed his objects, the emperor left Milan, and visited several other cities of Italy, arriving at Genoa on the 30th of June. There he issued a decree, creating signor Buciocchi and his wife (Eliza Bonaparte) prince and princess of Piombino, and investing them with the republic of Lucca. Parma and Placentia were, shortly after, incorporated with the French empire. After his progress through Italy, and having invested Eugene Beauharnais with the authority of viceroy, the emperor recrossed the Alps on the 12th of July, and proceeded to Paris, from whence he went to Boulogne.

The establishment of the Italian kingdom did not make the continental sovereigns less desirous of arresting the further progress of France. In January, England and Russia had agreed that no secure peace could be made with Napoleon, unless some limit could be placed to his apparent craving for more and more territory. After his acceptance of the crown of Italy, the negotiations between these powers were brought to a close, by the signing of a treaty on the 11th of April, by which the contracting parties, disclaiming all intention of controlling public opinion in France, or in any other country, with respect to the form of government it might be thought proper to adopt—engaged to "employ the most speedy and efficacious means to form a general league of the states of Europe," to effect the following objects:—1. The evacuation of Hanover and the north of Germany. 2. The establishment of the independence of the republics of Holland and Switzerland. 3. The re-establishment of the king of Sardinia in Piedmont. 4. The future security of Naples; and the evacuation of Italy and the island of Elba by the French forces. 5. The introduction of an order of things into Europe, which would effectually guarantee the security and independence of the several states, and present a solid barrier against future usurpations. Austria would not join the league at first; but the events in Italy, and particularly the union of Genoa with France, convinced her statesmen that the time was come when a barrier must be erected against French aggression; and in August that power acceded to the coalition; as did Sweden, a few days afterwards. Prussia still adhered to France; though the anti-Gallican party, which, as we have already stated, had been formed in that country, so far from dying away, was constantly increasing in numbers, being supported by the influence of the queen, and of the young prince Louis. At first the king endeavoured to mediate between France and Russia; but, as the czar insisted upon the abandonment of the late acquisitions of territory made by France—and Napoleon positively refused to give up a single foot of ground, maintaining, that what the empire had gained was necessary as a counterpoise to the acquisitions in the East made by Russia, and in India by England—the mediation failed. Prussia was then threatened by France on the one side, and by Russia on the other; till at last the king ordered a levy of 84,000 men, neither party knowing which he would join. This step led to an assurance from Alexander that he never intended to coerce the will of the king, and that his army had orders to halt on the Prussian frontier. In the meantime the French ambassador continued to push the interests of his imperial master; and the result was, that Prussia remained neutral, taking no active part in the struggle that ensued, though, as will be seen, she shared in the spoil.

All this time, the preparations at Boulogne, for the invasion of England, had not been interrupted. They had been continued with unremitting activity; and, during his absence from Paris, the emperor was in daily correspondence with the minister of marine on this important subject. Notwithstanding the constant occupation in which he was involved in Italy—the cares of business, and the temptations of pleasure with which he was there surrounded—it appears, from the published correspondence, that not the minutest detail connected with the great armament escaped him; and Sir A. Alison aptly remarks, that “nothing leaves so strong an impression of the vast ability and indefatigable activity of his mind, as the study of the numerous minute and lucid orders, which he addressed, during every day of this journey, to the minister of marine; and the admirable sagacity with which almost all the conceivable chances of those numerous squadrons,” which he was collecting in every harbour, from the Texel to Cadiz, and from Brest to Venice, “were calculated and provided for by his all-seeing intellect.”

When Napoleon arrived at Boulogne, he must have been surprised at the enormous military and naval armaments which were collected in that port. General Mathieu Dumas, in his narrative of the events of this period, has inserted a series of tables, from official documents, which give us some idea of the extent of the preparations. The army consisted of 76,798 infantry, 11,640 cavalry, 3,780 artillerymen, 3,780 waggoners, and 17,476 described as “non-combatants;” total, 113,474. Besides these men, there were 12,000 in the Texel and at Helvoetsluys; 10,000 on board the French and Spanish fleet, and 10,000 at Brest; making a grand total of about 145,500 men, with whom were 432 pieces of cannon. We extract from Dumas the various details of the stock in the arsenals and provision depôts; the whole of that historian’s tables being described as “one of the most curious records of the age of Napoleon.”

In the harbour, were 1,329 gun-boats; 954 transport vessels, which would carry 161,215 men, and 6,059 horses; about 3,500 guns were mounted on the armed vessels. This vast collection of men and matériel was organised in the most effective manner. Soldiers and sailors were incessantly drilled and practised in the various evolutions they would have to perform: and probably there never was collected together so many men, in every respect so well disciplined; and so well calculated to make that attempt on England, to secure the success of which, all the resources of the emperor’s intelligent and ever-active mind were directed.

Though Napoleon had built and armed so many praams and gun-boats, it was not his intention to employ them in protecting the transports. They were solely intended to divert the attention of England from what was his real object; which was, as we learn from published documents—one of them an autograph note on the subject, written at the time when he left the camp at Boulogne, in September, 1805—“to assemble forty or fifty ships of the line in the harbour of Martinique, by operations combined in the harbours of Toulon, Cadiz, Ferrol, and Brest; to bring them suddenly back to Boulogne; to find himself, in this way, during fifteen days, the master of the sea; to have 150,000 men encamped on the coast; 3,000 or 4,000 vessels in the flotilla; and to set sail the moment the signal was given of the arrival of the combined fleet.” Besides his own naval force, it is quite evident that Napoleon, all along, reckoned upon the assistance of Spain; because he had not half the number of ships he wanted. Towards the close of 1804, he had twenty-one ships of the line, and several frigates, at Brest; six ships of the line, and four frigates, at Rochefort; and eleven ships of the line, and eight frigates, at Toulon. In January, 1805, Spain agreed to furnish thirty ships of the line, to be stationed in the harbours of Ferrol, Cadiz, and Carthage, and to have 5,000 men ready to embark, to be provisioned for six months.

In January, Napoleon ordered the Toulon and Rochefort squadron to put to sea. The former was driven back by rough weather, four days after it had left the harbour. The latter sailed on the 11th of January, evaded the blockading squadron, and reached the West Indies, where it landed troops and ammunition at Martinique; made depredatory descents on Dominica, St. Kitt's, and Nevis; threw 1,000 men into St. Domingo; and, on the arrival of the British admiral, Cochrane, with six ships of the line, returned to France, and regained the harbour of Rochefort with little loss. The emperor was not at all satisfied with the result of this expedition, as he expected that admiral Missiessy, who commanded it, would have retaken the French and Dutch colonies, which the English had captured in the previous year, and also taken possession of St. Helena.—On the 25th of March, the Toulon squadron, under admiral Villeneuve, again put to sea; Nelson, who then commanded the British fleet in that quarter, having withdrawn, in order to entice the French ships from port. Villeneuve made first for Carthage, where he found the Spanish ships were not in a state to join him; and then to Cadiz, which port Sir John Orde blockaded with only five ships of the line. He retired before the force of Villeneuve, more than treble his number; and the French admiral, being joined by seven ships of the line and two frigates, making his whole force eighteen of the former and ten of the latter, sailed for the West Indies on the 10th of April. He was soon after pursued by Nelson, with only ten ships of the line and three frigates; but, misled by false information, the English admiral never came up with the enemy; who, notwithstanding his great force, effected nothing in the West Indies but the capture of the Diamond Rock, near Martinique; and having been reinforced at that island by admiral Magon, with two ships of the line, Villeneuve sailed for the north on the 28th of May. Admiral Magon had taken out the last instructions from Napoleon, sent from Pavia. They ordered the admiral to return to Europe, raise the blockade of Ferrol, where there were fifteen ships of the line, five French and ten Spanish; and, having effected a junction with them, to go to Rochefort, and join admiral Missiessy, with his five ships of the line: from thence he was to proceed to Brest, where admiral Gantheaume had twenty-one ships; and the combined fleets would then have amounted to sixty-three ships of the line and ten frigates—a force amply sufficient to effect what Napoleon described as “the grand object of the whole operation;” which was, to procure a superiority before Boulogne. “Masters of the Channel,” said he, “for a few days, 150,000 men will embark in the 2,000 vessels which are there assembled; and the expedition is concluded.”

Napoleon's scheme was admirably planned; but Providence willed that it should not be carried out: the continental coalition, we believe, interrupted it, though Napoleon attributed its failure to the conduct of Villeneuve. Nelson, who had been misled by erroneous, if not decidedly false, information, did not arrive at Antigua, after a cruise to the mouths of the Orinoco, in pursuit of the French, till the 13th of June. There he learnt that the combined fleet had returned to Europe; and, whilst the West India merchants were rejoicing at its departure, at the escape of the isles from pillage, and at the preservation of about 200 sail of valuably-laden merchantmen—all of which they ascribed to the magic of Nelson's name—he, more accurately, imagined that the sudden return of Villeneuve was in consequence of some ulterior object to be achieved nearer home. As soon as his lordship was informed of his having left the Caribbean sea, he dispatched two fast-sailing vessels, with an account of his unsuccessful cruise, and his apprehensions that the French fleet had returned to Europe with a view to some attack upon England. The admiral himself made all sail in the same direction, and reached Gibraltar on the 12th of July. His messengers had arrived in England some days earlier; and the British government had, on the receipt of his despatches, sent admiral Collingwood to Gibraltar, with five ships of the line; and ordered admiral Stirling to raise the blockade of Rochefort, to join Sir Robert Calder off Ferrol, and to cruise off Cape Finisterre, with a view to intercept the French fleet on its return. Admiral Stirling received his orders on the 13th of July; effected his junction with Sir Robert Calder on the 15th; and the latter, taking the command, commenced his cruise at the head of fifteen ships of the line, two frigates, one cutter, and one lugger. On the 22nd, about sixty leagues to the westward of Cape Finisterre, the two squadrons met—Villeneuve having under his orders twenty ships of the line, three 50-gun ships, five frigates, and two brigs. Notwithstanding the disparity of force, Sir R. Calder, in the action which ensued, captured two of the Spanish liners, the St. Raphael and the Firme; and so disheartened Villeneuve, that he dared not renew the engagement; but, after hovering about two days, and finding that Sir R. Calder (who knew that the Rochefort squadron had put to sea) had sailed with his prizes towards the north—in hope of falling-in either with the Channel fleet or lord Nelson's, he made for the coast of Spain, entering the harbour of Ferrol on the 2nd of August. To this movement Napoleon attributed the failure of the designs against England. In the autograph note, which we have already quoted, he said, after having detailed the plan he intended to have been carried out—"That project has failed. If admiral Villeneuve, instead of entering into the harbour of Ferrol, had contented himself with joining the Spanish squadron, and instantly made sail for Brest, and joined admiral Gantheaume, my army would have embarked, and it would have been all over with England." He might have embarked his troops for this island, had Villeneuve followed his instructions, and been enabled, for a short time, to ride triumphant in the Channel; but we are disposed to think that he gave up the intention after he knew of the coalition formed against him; and that he was not sorry to have this pretence for abandoning his much-vaunted plan of invasion, as enemies were threatening France on all sides; and there is every probability for imagining that the events of 1814 would have been anticipated, had the splendid "army of England" really left Boulogne for this country.*

Subsidised by England, Austria, Russia, and Sweden had lost no time in recruiting their armies; and, in August, preparations were in progress for commencing active operations in four different quarters. Sweden had armed to some extent at Stralsund, and in Pomerania; Russia at Revel—the czar having also a strong army in Poland, and another in Galicia; whilst Austria had 80,000 men in Bavaria, and 100,000 in Italy—the two armies being connected by one in the Tyrol, 25,000 or 30,000 in number. There was also a Russian force of 12,000 men at Corfu; a small English corps, 6,000 in number, at Malta; and an English naval armament in the Baltic. The attacks were to be made by English, Russians, and Swedes, from Pomerania, upon Hanover and Holland; by the Austrians and Russians united in the valley of the Danube; by the Austrians in Italy; and by the English, Russians, and Neapolitans in Naples. By their agreements with England, Austria had bound herself to embody a force of not less than 320,000 men; Russia, 180,000; and Sweden was to find 1,000 men for every £1,800 advanced monthly by England.

No doubt Napoleon, who had his spies everywhere, was informed of all these movements, which were alarming enough. Sir A. Alison imagines, that "it was to anticipate this danger, to dissolve the confederacy by a stroke at its heart, and conquer not only England, but Russia and Austria, on the British shores, that all his measures were calculated;" that the rage which count Daru (his private secretary) tells us he displayed, when he received the intelligence that Villeneuve had gone to Ferrol, was genuine; and that the plan of his German campaign, which he dictated to Daru the same night, was then spontaneously conceived and determined upon. We, on the contrary, imagine, that he determined to abandon the English expedition as soon as he knew what forces were collecting on the continent; and that though he would have been better pleased had Villeneuve sustained triumphantly the honour of the French flag, and cleared the Channel of the English fleet, yet that he never would have embarked his army for England, and left France nearly undefended. Villeneuve's disobedience of orders, gave the emperor the opportunity of saying, that it was through him "the project failed;" but in no event, we think, would it have been undertaken in the face of the continental coalition against him.

The emperor resolved to be the first in the field, and the plan of his German campaign was skilfully devised; the directions to his generals being most specific and minute. They were all drawn up at Boulogne; and, if improvised on hearing of Villeneuve's movements, they afford a most remarkable proof of the extraordinary—almost wonderful—strategic abilities of the emperor: but we think they had been previously arranged. There was a corps d'armée in Hanover, under Bernadotte; and another in Holland, under Marmont. With these exceptions, and two camps at Ambleteuse and Montreuil, the bulk of his army was at Boulogne. Bernadotte's corps was ordered to march through Hesse into Franconia, upon Würzburg and the Danube; that of Marmont to advance along the Rhine, and to unite at Mayence and Würzburg, with Bernadotte's. The "army of England" was to march to Strasburg, make a feint of debouching on the Black Forest—but, leaving that forest to the right, advance, by the left, through Würtemberg; and having joined the corps from Holland and Hanover in Franconia, take the Austrians in the rear, defeat them before the Russians could form a junction, and then march on Vienna to meet the latter. In Italy, the French had 50,000 men on the Adige; and the command

* Bourrienne was of opinion, that Bonaparte at no time seriously contemplated the invasion of England. The emperor himself, when at St. Helena, had conversations with Las Casas and O'Meara on the subject. He spoke of his plans as positively designed to be carried out; and professed his belief in the complete success of the expedition, if he had landed 100,000 men on the English shores. He intended to have proclaimed to the English, that the French came "as friends, to relieve them from an obnoxious and despotic aristocracy, whose object was, to keep the nation eternally at war, in order to enrich themselves and their families through the blood of the people." The establishment of a republic, the abolition of the monarchy and of the nobility, and the forfeiture of the property of such of the latter as should resist, would, he told O'Meara, "have gained him the support of the canaille, and of all the idle, profligate, and disaffected in the kingdom."

was given to Masséna, with orders to occupy the Austrians—who were in the neighbourhood of that river, in force, under the archduke Charles—as long as possible. General St. Cyr was in Calabria with 20,000 men; and he had, at first, orders to march upon Naples, and make himself master of that capital, on the earliest symptom of hostilities. But the king of Naples, on the 21st. of September, signed a treaty with France, and agreed to remain neutral; on which St. Cyr was ordered to co-operate with Masséna. At the same time that he signed this treaty, his majesty delivered a written paper to the Russian minister, stating, that his signature had been obtained by threats, and that he should not adhere to the engagement into which he had entered.

The days when the different corps were to take their departure, and when they were to arrive at their destinations, were fixed by the emperor; the close of September being the time when it was expected that all would be ready for action. The orders were kept secret, and the movements masked as much as possible, to keep the enemy in ignorance of the breaking-up of the camps at Boulogne, Ambleteuse, and Montreuil. To the elector of Bavaria, alone, the plan of the campaign was unfolded. The emperor could rely upon his secrecy, from his hatred to Austria; and he wished to secure the aid of the Bavarian army, consisting of 25,000 fine and well-appointed men. In this he was successful. On the 24th of August, M. Otto induced the elector to sign a treaty of alliance with France; though he was at the same time professing friendship for Austria. Having reason to think that he was trifling with him, the emperor of Austria ordered general Mack to cross the Inn, which induced the elector to withdraw first to Ratisbon and then to Würzburg, where his army was ordered to concentrate. Having thus got out of the hands of the Austrians (who occupied Munich and Ulm), his minister, M. Monteglan, applied to M. Otto, to have the date of the treaty altered to the 23rd of September. The application was granted, says M. Thiers (who describes it as “far from honourable to Bavaria”), “to enable the elector to say, that he had not given himself up to France till after the violence done him by Austria.”

Whilst engaged in dispatching these orders to his troops, and in arranging for the march of those encamped at Boulogne, the emperor took great precautions for securing the flotilla in that port from attack by the English. Three entire regiments, and twelve third battalions of those which were marched to Germany, were left at Boulogne. The sailors belonging to the flotilla were formed into fifteen battalions, of 1,000 men each, and armed with muskets, to do duty, alternately, on board the vessels and ashore; intrenchments being constructed round the harbour and coast, to protect the flotilla and the immense magazines. The entrances of the ports at Boulogne and Ambleteuse were also defended by netting, to impede the progress of fire-vessels. The command was given to marshal Brune; and the emperor, when these arrangements were concluded, called that officer and his subordinates around him, and explained the importance of the trust which he confided to their keeping. They were not to grieve, he said, at being left behind inactive; before long they would be employed in their turn; as, after punishing the continent, attention would be turned to England; and they would have the glory of joining in the expedition to that country, probably in the next spring.

The army from the Boulogne encampment commenced its march on the 29th of August. Napoleon saw all the divisions on their way, and then, on the 2nd of September, left the city, arriving at Malmaison on the 3rd. He found a decided change in the public opinion of the French capital. All his acts were not regarded with approbation; the placing the crown of Italy on his own head, the fusion of the Ligurian republic into the French empire, and the gift of Lucca to his sister and her husband, being especially censured. The people still appeared to admire the talents, the courage, and the great application to business of their emperor; but they condemned his fondness for war; and anticipated evil from the new coalition which it was now known was formed against France. Financial difficulties were also accumulating. It was found that the expenditure for the year had been 60,000,000 francs per month, making 720,000,000 for the twelve months, instead of the estimated 684,000,000 francs. To meet this outlay, the permanent revenue only produced about 600,000,000 francs, leaving 120,000,000 francs to be provided. The trade and commerce of France were also in a most depressed state; and bankruptcies were very numerous, causing general distress. Such was the change a few short months had produced, from that plenty and prosperity which appeared to prevail at the commencement of the empire. The deficit in the revenue was made up, partly by resorting to the issue of paper money, partly by taking back from the senate and the Legion of Honour the national domains bestowed upon them, allotting to them rentes instead, and disposing of the lands thus resumed to the highest bidder. What could not be made up in these ways, was taken from the sinking-fund, set apart for the payment of the debt; which it was a principle of Napoleon not to increase if it could be possibly avoided. The company of United Merchants, of which M. Ouvrard was the chief, and M. Desprez, formerly cashier to a banker, and M. Vanderbergh, who had been in the corn trade, were his principal associates, did something, at the time, to relieve the pressure on the government, by providing provisions, and discounting the government paper. Having, by these means, provided the financial sinews of war, at all events for present emergencies, Napoleon proceeded to recruit the military force. Some parts of the contingent for the years IX.—XIII. had not been called out. He resolved to incorporate these men, to raise the entire levy for the year XIV.; and to reorganise the national guards under the laws of 1790, 1791, and 1798. He did not, however, adhere to the minutiae of those laws, for he named the officers himself; as in his opinion, declared at the time, "every species of force ought to emanate from the supreme authority." By these measures, the emperor obtained a reserve of at least 150,000 men, to guard the frontiers and recruit the main army. The organisation of this reserve was committed to marshals Lefebvre and Kellermann, who assembled one corps d'armée at Mayence, and another at Strasburg; and three flying camps of grenadiers were established at Rennes, in the Vendée, and on the field of Marengo.

These arrangements completed, the legislative body should have been assembled to sanction them. But time would thus have been lost; and, therefore, the emperor resolved that the senate should issue a senatus consultum for the purpose. He called the senate together on the 23rd of September. The members met in the Luxembourg; and Napoleon, on his way to that palace from the Tuileries, received so few tokens of popular sympathy, that he was seriously mortified. The senate, also, though they assented to his demands, "in the bottom of their hearts," says Thiers, "attributed the new continental wars to the incorporation of states, which had been effected in Italy;" and did not approve of that part of Napoleon's policy.

Having obtained the required sanction of the senate, the emperor again, previous to setting out for the army, appointed the grand elector, Joseph, head of the government in his absence, he being also president of the senate. Cambacérès was president of the council of state; and to Louis Bonaparte, as constable of France, was entrusted the levying of troops, and the reorganisation of the national guards. In addition to the council of state, another council was composed of all the grand dignitaries of the empire, presided over by Joseph. All questions connected with the government were to come before this council; and couriers, with their report, and a special report from Cambacérès, giving his personal opinion on every subject, were ordered to be dispatched every day to the emperor. No steps were to be taken, in any matter, till the imperial decision was received, except in urgent cases; and then the minister in whose department it laid, was to issue orders upon his own responsibility. Thus, when with his army in the field, Napoleon still retained the direction of affairs of state in the council in his own hands.

Diplomatic notes had been interchanged between France and Austria during the time that the preparations for war were going on—almost up to the day that Napoleon left Paris to join the army. There had, however, been no intercourse with England since the abortive effort made in January, nor with Russia since the mediation of Prussia had failed. In his despatches to Vienna, Talleyrand urged, that it was not conformable to the real interest of Austria to reduce the power of France; and he denied that the latter menaced the liberties of Europe—they were in danger from another quarter. The time was not, perhaps, far distant, when France and Austria, united, would have to fight not only for their own independence, but for the liberties of the continent, and for civilisation itself. The inconstancy and caprice of Russia were alluded to: Austria, it was said, had experienced those qualities; and, when abandoned by her, she might expect to undergo the rudest strokes of fortune. It was asked—"What does France demand of Austria?" To which M. Talleyrand replied—"Neither efforts nor sacrifices. The emperor desired only the repose of the continent. He was ever ready to make a maritime peace, as soon as England would adhere to the treaty of Amiens. As that was impossible in the present temper of England, he desired to devote himself exclusively to the maritime war; and he demanded of Austria not to divert him from that great design, and to enter into no engagement that might disturb the harmony prevailing between the two nations." The minister of Austria, in reply, declared that the cabinet of Vienna was most anxious to put an end to the danger that threatened Europe; but, "to do that with any prospect of success, it was indispensable that the faith of treaties should be religiously observed." It was shown how the treaty of Luneville, which "carefully stipulated the independence of the Italian, Helvetic, and Batavian republics," had been violated: it was stated, that "Austria armed, not with a hostile intention, but solely with a design of maintaining the existing peace with France, and the equilibrium and repose of Europe:" and it was "solemnly declared," that, "should war become inevitable, Austria and Russia had bound themselves to interfere, in no respect, in the internal affairs of France; to make no change in the established possessions or relations of Germany; and to respect the integrity of the Ottoman empire. Great Britain had the same intentions, and was desirous to be regulated by the same moderate principles, in re-establishing her pacific relations with the French empire."

These protestations were of no avail; they could not avert from Europe the scourge of war.*

Napoleon never enjoyed so little popularity as when he left Paris, on the 24th of September, to join the army which, by rapid marches, had already concentrated in Germany, on the right bank of the Rhine. His remarkable victories soon sent public opinion back into its old channel. The empress accompanied him to Strasburg, where he arrived on the 26th; marshal Berthier was also one of his suite; and Talleyrand and a few clerks were ordered to follow the headquarters. The emperor found his troops ready for action, according to the plan he had laid down; but, in reaching their destination, the corps under Bernadotte and Marmont had to march through the Prussian province of Anspach; and this violation of his neutral territory greatly offended the Prussian king. Napoleon was quite aware that this route must be taken; and his instructions to Bernadotte were—"Avoid delay. Make many protestations in favour of Prussia; show as much respect and attachment for the country as possible; then march across the territory with rapidity, alleging the impossibility of doing otherwise; for, indeed, that impossibility is real."

The coalition had not been so active, and were not so well prepared as their opponents. The Austrian general, Chastelar, had been sent to the Tyrol to organise its warlike population; and two Austrian armies had concentrated on the Adige and the Inn. Their allies were not so forward. A Russian force, of 16,000 men, under general Tolstoy, collected at Revel, and a Swedish force of 12,000, from Stralsund, were to march through Mecklenburg to Hanover, where 15,000 English, who were to ascend the Elbe, and land at Cuxhaven, were to join them. One Russian army, 60,000 strong, under general Kutusoff, with the imperial guard, of 12,000 men, under the grand-duke Constantine, was advancing through Galicia; and a second, also numbering 60,000 men, under general Buxhowden, was marching through Poland. An army of reserve, under general Michelson, was forming at Wilna. The young emperor Alexander, and prince Peter Dolgorouki, were with the first army. Both, as Napoleon anticipated, were "too late." He was enabled to get between them and the Austrians, taking the allies in detail, instead of encountering their combined forces; and to that circumstance, and the incompetence of some of the Austrian generals, his triumphant success is to be mainly attributed.

The French army was divided into seven corps, commanded by Bernadotte, Marmont, Davoust, Soult, Lannes, Ney, and Augereau; with a reserve of cavalry under Murat: the guards were commanded by Mortier and Bessières. Napoleon took the command-in-chief; and the collective force received the name of the "Grand Army," which epithet was applied, from that time, to the force which the emperor commanded in person. The Rhine was crossed on the 1st of October; and, by the 6th, Bernadotte, who had been joined by the Bavarians, under general Wrede, occupied Weissemburg; Marmont was near Neuberg; Davoust at Oettingen; Soult at Donauwörth, eight leagues to the south of Oettingen; Ney at Kessingen, three leagues from Donauwörth; Lannes at Neeresheim, about the same distance from that town; and the cavalry were on the borders of the Danube. The main Austrian army was under general Mack, who had concentrated his forces at Ulm, Memmingen, and Stockach, with advanced posts in the defiles of the Black Forest; little supposing that the French would take the route they did,—thus placing themselves in his rear, and cutting off all communication with the Russians. On the 6th and 7th of October, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th corps of the French army, with the Bavarians, making a total of nearly 100,000 men, crossed the Danube. On the 8th, the first passage of arms took place at Wertengen, between a part of the French cavalry, under Murat, supported by the infantry, under Lannes—and an Austrian division, under general Auffenburg, which Mack had dispatched to support general Keinmayer, who was near Donauwörth. In this action the Austrians were repulsed, and many prisoners taken; though the victory was for some time doubtful, and was only won by a desperate charge of grenadiers, who came up, under Oudinot. Two days after, Napoleon assembled his victorious troops, and distributed crosses and decorations to those who had distinguished themselves. It was thus he excited the enthusiasm, and won the affections, of his soldiers. This action was followed by the retreat of Keinmayer into Bavaria, pursued by Bernadotte, who speedily succeeded in establishing himself in Munich. The corps of Marmont and Davoust moved in the same direction; and the only chance of safety for Mack was to fall back on the Tyrol. He, however, thought he could, by moving his troops en masse to the north-east, reach the Bohemian frontier. Leaving Jellachich at Ulm, he established his own headquarters at Burgau, a town lying between Ulm and Augsburg; and placed a strong corps, under the archduke Ferdinand, on the bridge of Günzburg. This corps was attacked and defeated by Ney on the 9th of October, the bridge being carried at the point of the bayonet. The same day Soult took possession of Augsburg. These checks induced general Mack, on the 10th, to again establish his head-quarters at Ulm.

The 6th corps d'armée, under Ney, was advancing on that town. On the 11th of October, his advanced guard, under general Dupont, about 10,000 strong, came unexpectedly upon 20,000 Austrians, most advantageously posted at Hasslach. The French were obliged to fight, and they made a most gallant attack upon the enemy. The battle lasted all day, and was very fierce at the village of Jungingen, which was repeatedly taken and retaken. The French made 2,000 prisoners in this village, with whom Dupont retired at nightfall; but he lost his cannon and baggage, which were carried off by the imperialist cuirassiers. The same day, Soult advanced from Augsburg to Memmingen, which place he had completely invested on the 13th, when the garrison surrendered, 4,000 men laying down their arms. On the 14th, Ney carried the bridge of Elchingen, two leagues to the north-east of Ulm; Soult, Marmont, and Lannes, taking up positions at Biberach, which closed the road to Upper Suabia; whilst Napoleon established his head-quarters at Burgau. The fate of the Austrians now appeared to be sealed, 50,000 of them being isolated and shut up in Ulm, which was invested by 100,000 men, flushed with victory. Mack had, on the 14th, detached a large part of his force, under the archduke Ferdinand, to Bohemia, which that imperial prince succeeded in reaching with only a few hundred followers—the rest being either cut to pieces or taken prisoners by the French, who encountered them at various points on their march, in overwhelming numbers. Had this part of his force remained at Ulm, the result would, in all probability, not have been different, as only a most desperate sortie, by which the imperialists could have cut their way through the enemy, could have saved them. No sortie, however, was made. By the 19th, Napoleon had established himself on the heights round Ulm; and on that day, having been summoned by general Ségur, Mack first demanded a truce of eight days; when he promised to surrender, if not relieved by the Russians. Napoleon did not refuse the truce; but prince Lichtenstein had an interview with Mack, in which the little chance of the arrival of their allies, and the consequences which would result to the garrison, should they continue obstinate, were pointed out. The Austrian general appears to have become so alarmed by these representations, that, on the 20th, he signed a capitulation. By these events, 50,000 prisoners, 200 pieces of cannon, several thousand horses, and eighty standards, fell into the hands of the French. The troops marched out on the 25th, when they defiled before Napoleon, in a state of the deepest dejection. He addressed the officers, telling them he did not know for what he was at war; and calling on them to advise the emperor to make peace. "I want," he said, "nothing on the continent. It is ships, colonies, and commerce which I desire; and their acquisition would be as advantageous to you as to me."

Napoleon, at this period, was ignorant of the terrible defeat which the combined fleets of France and Spain had sustained on the 21st of October—a defeat that scattered to the winds his hope of wresting from England the "ships, colonies, and commerce," the possession of which he so much envied her. In September, the command of a fleet destined to blockade Cadiz, had been given, by the British government, to lord Nelson. There were then forty ships of the line at Cadiz, thirty-three being ready for sea. Villeneuve commanded; and such was the terror of Nelson's name, that it was resolved, at a council of war held on board the admiral's ship, not to risk an engagement, except with a force at least one-third larger than that of England. There was no opportunity of ascertaining the exact strength of Nelson's fleet. He took his station off Cape St. Mary's, fifty or sixty miles to the west of Cadiz; but every vessel making for that port was seized; and as no magazines had been provided there, the want of provisions was sensibly felt in the French fleet, which, however, continued in Cadiz harbour till the 19th of October. Then, probably, it would not have put to sea, had not Villeneuve, who supposed Nelson's fleet not to be so powerful as it really was, resolved to try and recover his lost fame, before admiral Rosilly, who was appointed to supersede him, arrived. It was not till the 21st of October, however, that the two fleets met—Nelson having twenty-seven ships of the line and four frigates under his command; and Villeneuve thirty-three ships of the line and seven frigates—his superiority in the size of his vessels, and weight of metal in his guns, being even greater than that in the number of his ships. On that day the battle of Trafalgar was fought; and one of the greatest naval victories recorded in the history of the world, was gained by the English. Twenty ships of the combined squadron, including Villeneuve's flag-ship, and those of the two Spanish admirals, Alava, and Cisneros, struck their colours; but England lost one of her bravest, and most successful, and certainly her most popular admiral—Nelson receiving his death-wound shortly after the fighting commenced. A severe storm came on after the action, in which fifteen of the prizes were lost; and as one had blown up after she struck her colours, only four of the enemy's ships reached Gibraltar. On the 4th of November, Sir R. Strachan captured, off Cape Ortegal, four out of those which escaped; and Napoleon was never able to collect another fleet to replace that which was thus destroyed.* The battle of

* The action off Cape Trafalgar was followed by an interchange of courtesies between admiral Collingwood, who succeeded Nelson in command, and the authorities

Trafalgar closed Villeneuve's career. He was liberated early in the following year, but died soon after his return to France. His death was attributed to suicide.

Immediately after the surrender of Ulm, Napoleon issued one of his spirit-stirring proclamations to his army.—“Soldiers of the grand army!” said he, “in fifteen days we have concluded a campaign. We have kept our promise; we have chased the troops of Austria from the Bavarian territories, and re-established our ally in the possession of his states.” Having enumerated the successes and the spoils of the campaign, and the slight losses to the French with which they had been obtained, he added—“Soldiers! this astonishing success is owing to your boundless confidence in your emperor; to your patience in undergoing fatigue; to your rare intrepidity. But we will not rest here. Already I see you are burning to commence a second campaign. The gold of England has brought against us a Russian army from the extremities of the universe; we will make it undergo the same fate.” The events of the campaign were communicated in a message to the senate, couched much in the style of the proclamation; and having promulgated one document, and sent off a courier with the other, the army, with the exception of Ney's corps, to which was entrusted the conquest of the Tyrol, was put in motion, on the 21st of October, towards the Iser and the Inn. On the 24th the emperor entered Munich, where the inhabitants welcomed his presence by illuminating their city. On the 27th the Inn was crossed; the advanced guard of the Russians—which had only then approached the scene of the late short contest, and which had been joined by some of the remains of the archduke Ferdinand's and Keimayer's divisions—in vain endeavouring to stem the rapid advance of the victors. Napoleon having declined a proposal for an armistice, made at Lintz by general Giulay, on the part of the emperor of Austria, the Traun was crossed on the 31st of October; and the Ems on the 4th and 5th of November. Whilst the grand army was thus pressing on to Vienna, Napoleon received the intelligence of the destruction of his fleet at Trafalgar, and of the conclusion of a treaty between the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia at Potsdam. The former grieved him, but perhaps less than it would have done under other circumstances: for the latter he was not at all prepared. The king had never forgiven the violation of his territory by the French troops; and, after an interchange of messages, an interview between the two monarchs took place at Berlin, on the 25th of October. Alexander soon became popular with the Prussian court; and the amiable queen, as well as the minister, count Hardenberg, being both opposed to the extension of French influence in Germany, seconded his efforts to obtain some decided manifestation on the part of Frederick William on the side of the coalition. The result was, that, on the 3rd of November, a treaty was signed at Potsdam, by which Prussia agreed again to offer her mediation to Napoleon; and, if he did not accept of the terms proposed within one month, then to take the field with Russia and Austria. After the treaty was signed, the emperor and king visited the church at Potsdam, where the remains of the great Frederick are interred, and swore eternal friendship over his tomb.

The news from Potsdam did not arrest the march of Napoleon. Indeed, the inaction of Prussia made the treaty of no avail. Haugwitz, the Prussian minister, who was to open the negotiation with the emperor, did not leave Potsdam till the 14th of November. The Prussian army was kept quiet in quarters or cantonments; and the French pursued their march unmolested. Murat, pressing on to the capital, on a side where the Russians had advanced, received a check, which occasioned him to be reproved by the emperor, as it disconcerted his plans. A few days after, that general and Lannes, by an artful but not very honest manœuvre—detaining the Austrian officers in command, and the engineers, by talking of an armistice, till the French troops came up and surrounded them—prevented the bridges which crossed the Danube, and gave access to Vienna, from being blown up; and Murat's former mishap was forgotten. On the 14th of November, the emperor established his head-quarters at the imperial palace of Schönbrunn; and, next day, Vienna was occupied. Immense stores—100,000 muskets, 2,000 pieces of cannon, and corresponding quantities of ammunition—were found in the arsenal. All might have been conveyed away, had the emperor Francis possessed the least foresight; but everything was left to become the prize of the French. Vienna in his possession, Napoleon gave the command to general Clarke, and distributed his forces in such a manner as to guard the city, and to observe the roads from the Alps, from Hungary, and from Moravia; from the two former of which the Austrians, and from the latter the Russians, might arrive.

In Italy and the Tyrol, the French arms had also been attended with success. The advantages in the strength of the hostile forces were on the side of the Austrians; the archduke Charles of Cadiz, which deserve mention. The admiral offered to send all the wounded Spaniards on shore; and, in return, the marquis of Solano, governor of Cadiz, offered the use of the Spanish hospitals to the English; and when some prizes were driven on shore by the storm, he refused to treat the English sailors, who had charge of them, as prisoners of war.—The loss of the English in this battle, is stated, by Thiers, to have been more than 3,000 men: it really amounted to 1,587 killed and wounded; in addition to Nelson—himself a host.

having 100,000 men under him, on the Adige; whilst Masséna, even when joined by St. Cyr, had not more than 70,000. The French general commenced operations in the night between the 17th and 18th of October, on learning that the "grand army" in Germany was in motion. The city of Verona, divided in two parts by the Adige, was occupied, on one side of the river by the French, and on the other by the Austrians. The first attempt of Masséna was, to get possession of the entire city, in which he succeeded, after fighting all the 18th, and thus obtained the command of the river. The archduke Charles seems to have remained singularly inactive, for we do not find that he made any attempt to drive back the French; but, after the news of the surrender of Mack had been received, Masséna, on the 29th of October, with three of his divisions, crossed the Adige, defeated the Austrians, and established himself on the plain of St. Michael's, between the citadel of Verona and the archduke's intrenched camp of Caldiero. On the 30th, this camp was attacked. There was very severe fighting during the entire day; and the Austrians lost 3,000 killed and wounded, and 4,000 prisoners; the French, 3,000 killed, wounded, and missing. When darkness put an end to the conflict, the battle-field presented a curious scene: both armies bivouacked together in terrible confusion; and whilst the French and the greater part of the Austrians were taking some repose after the fatigues of the day, the archduke employed a division of his army to carry off his baggage and artillery; and, the next morning, commenced a retrograde movement. To attract the attention of the French, he dispatched general Hillingen, with a corps of 5,000 men, towards Verona, in their rear; and that officer having, it is supposed, pushed too far in his demonstration, fell, with all his men, into the hands of the enemy. The archduke took the direction of Vienna, pursued by the French, who compelled the Austrians to maintain a running fight for nearly the entire route. While Masséna was engaged in this pursuit, he ordered general St. Cyr to blockade Venice. That general arrived just in time to encounter the prince de Rohan, who had made his way through the Tyrol, and fell on the rear of Masséna, when the latter was engaged in pursuit of the archduke. General St. Cyr surprised this corps, and obliged the prince to surrender: 5,000 more Austrian troops were thus made prisoners.

In the Tyrol, Ney, with 9,000 or 10,000 men, had entered the country by the debouché of Scharnitz; and, having passed the confines, his troops scaled the highest peaks of the Alps, stormed Scharnitz, and entered Innsprück, from whence they drove the Austrians, some into the Italian Tyrol, and others into the Vorarlberg. General Jellachich and prince de Rohan were at that time together, having retreated into the Tyrol from Bavaria. The division of Jellachich was in advance, and first encountered the French; their march being arrested by a numerous corps under Augereau. The Austrian general, seeing no chance of escape either by fighting or flying, laid down his arms. The prince de Rohan, for that time, got off, only to fall into the hands of the enemy a little later. The archdukes Charles and John retreated on parallel lines—the one taking the route through Friule, and past the Julian Alps; the other, through Carinthia. They arranged to meet at Laybach, where they arrived on the 15th of November.

Napoleon wanted to beat the Russians before they could be joined by the archdukes. He had left Vienna, occupied Brunn, the capital of Moravia, and, on the 20th of November, established his head-quarters there. The Russians, in the meantime, were concentrating their forces in the same direction; and partial actions were of frequent occurrence; in one of which 8,000 Russians, under Bagrathion, maintained a most determined contest, near the little village of Grund, with 40,000 French, under Lannes, Oudinot, and Murat: 5,000 only effected a retreat, leaving 3,000 dead or prisoners. In another, the division of marshal Mortier received a severe check, and lost three eagles. In all the encounters, the Russians showed no want of courage or determination; but, generally, victory settled upon the banners of the French. On the 19th of November, the two Russian armies which had been advancing towards Moravia, under the emperor Alexander and Kutusoff, united at Wischau, where a small detachment of French, left by Soult, was surprised. These two armies, after their junction, formed a fine corps of 75,000 able-bodied men, commanded by the emperor Alexander in person. At this moment, the situation of the French army appeared to be one of great hazard; for the archdukes, with their united force, were advancing upon them from the south; the irruption of a body of Hungarians was apprehended from the east; in front were the Russians; 80,000 Prussians were in Silesia; Hanover was occupied by Russian and Swedish troops, and a body of the latter were in full march towards the Elbe. Napoleon was aware of what he had to contend with, and took his measures accordingly. Strong corps, under Marmont, Davoust, and Bernadotte, were placed to intercept the roads by which the Austrians and Hungarians must advance; the defence of Vienna was entrusted to Mortier; and the corps of Soult and Lannes, the imperial guard, and the cavalry, were marched on the road to Brunn, to meet the Russians, who, notwithstanding all the watchfulness and activity of the French, were joined by twenty Austrian battalions before the close of November; and the arrival of a division of the imperial guard, under the archduke Constantine, soon after, rendered the allied force still more formidable. The emperor Francis had joined the czar at Wischau; and the two emperors were surrounded by officers eager to meet the enemy, and sanguine of success.

At this time, the financial difficulties of France had not lessened, but increased. The company of United Merchants, involved by its connection with the court of Spain, which could not keep up its engagements, had to seek assistance from the bank of France to enable them to maintain their connection with the government; and this led to such extensive advances by the bank, that that establishment was compelled to stop payment. This was followed by the failure of bankers, merchants, and traders in considerable numbers. Great distress prevailed; but the rapid successes of the "grand army" in Germany had dissipated the gloom of disapprobation and distrust that hovered round Napoleon when he left Paris; and the people appeared implicitly to rely upon him; expecting that he would, as soon as he knew the state of affairs, devise some grand project for the re-establishment of public credit. He did nothing at that time, but neither did he draw upon the resources of France to pay his army. He levied very heavy contributions on Austria, amounting to upwards of £4,000,000 sterling—a sum exceeding £8,000,000 in this country; and commenced the plan which he followed during the remainder of his career, of making the country they occupied maintain his troops.

The tactics of the allies ought to have been those of Fabian; for delay must have been ruinous to the French. But the young and ardent members of the Russian and Austrian nobility, who surrounded the two emperors, urged them to immediate action; and they resolved to fight the invaders without delay. When reconnoitring the country round Brunn, soon after he had established his head-quarters there, Napoleon had been struck with the strategic advantages which the plain and village of Austerlitz, about two leagues to the southward of Brunn, displayed; and he said to his staff—"Gentlemen, observe well your ground here; within a few days it will be your field of battle." He understood the allies intended to attack him; and he determined that there he would take his stand. But before the event, which he felt would be decisive one way or the other, came off, he thought it advisable to see if matters could be arranged without fighting. For this purpose, he sent Savary to the emperor Alexander to propose an armistice. They could not agree upon terms—the Russian emperor demanding a return to the state of things corresponding to that produced by the treaty of Lausanne, which Napoleon would not consent to. He also contended, that the allies wanted to deprive him of his crown, and restore it to the Bourbons; which was strenuously denied.

As the allies were found to be advancing on the last days of November, Napoleon concentrated his army, and took up his ground, in a position between Brunn and Austerlitz; which is thus described by Thiers:—"The high-road of Moravia, running from Vienna to Brunn, rises, in a direct line, to the northward; then, in passing from Brunn to Olmütz, it descends abruptly to the east; forming a right angle with its first direction. In this angle is situated the position in question. It commences on the left, towards the Olmütz road, with heights studded with firs; it then runs off to the right, in an oblique direction, towards the Vienna road; and, after subsiding generally, terminates in ponds, often full of deep water in winter. Along this position, and in front of it, runs a rivulet, which has no name known in geography, but which, in part of its course, is called Goldbach by the people of the country. It runs through the little villages of Girzikowitz, Puntowitz, Kobelnitz, Sokolnitz, and Telnitz; and, sometimes forming marshes, sometimes confined in channels, terminates in the ponds above-mentioned, which are called the ponds of Satschan and Menitz." Here, on the 1st of December, the French army was drawn up—the centre being under Bernadotte; the left, under marshal Lannes and general Suchet; the right, under marshal Soult. The cavalry, and twenty-four pieces of light artillery, under Murat, supported the right wing. There was a reserve of ten battalions of grenadiers, under Oudinot, and ten battalions of imperial guards, under Junot; and a corps, under marshal Davoust, observed the left of the allies. The total force was about 80,000 men. The allies were much more numerous—the Russians alone being nearly equal to the French; and the Austrians amounting to 25,000. They arrived in the vicinity of Austerlitz on the evening of the 1st of December; and the two emperors took up their head-quarters at that village. The head-quarters of general Kutusoff were at Kresnowitz; and there the general officers were assembled, at one o'clock on the morning of the 2nd, to hear the plan of the battle of the next day read over and explained to them.

The French army bivouacked on the field of battle. Before they were dismissed for the day, a proclamation from Bonaparte was read to them, in which victory was confidently anticipated. During the night he visited the bivouacs; and, as soon as he was discerned by the men, they made torches from the straw on which they were to sleep, and lighted him through the cantonment—many, at the close of his inspection, making the combustibles around them into bonfires, to inaugurate the anniversary of his coronation. Those who did, after all, sink into repose, were aroused, some hours before daybreak, by the discharge of cannon. As early as four o'clock the emperor was on horseback; and then the murmur of an advancing host was heard from the Russian camp. These men had been on the move for two hours; and, not long after, a brisk firing was heard. The Austrians had presented themselves before the village of Telnitz—the last post occupied on the right of the French line; and had attacked it with infantry and artillery. The “grand army” was soon up, and formed; the different corps marched from the positions occupied during the night, to the rivulet already mentioned, which separated them from the Russians; and there, enveloped in a fog, they remained, till they received the order to attack.

The plan of the allies was, to turn the right flank of the French, cut them off from Vienna, and throw them back upon the Bohemian mountains. They were divided into five columns: the first, under general Doctoroff; the second under general Langeron, a French emigrant; general Prybyszewski was at the head of the third; count Milaradovitch at that of the fourth; and prince Lichtenstein conducted the fifth. These columns formed two wings and a main body; the right wing being commanded by prince Bagrathion; the left, by general Buxhowden; the main body by Kutusoff. They occupied the fir-covered heights that commanded the French position; and the grand-duke Constantine, with the reserve, was posted on the high ground in front of Austerlitz. This position was impregnable; but the Russian commanders had an idea that Napoleon had not more than 40,000 men with him; they therefore considered their task easy, and resolved not to wait to be attacked, but to become the assailants. In pursuance of this resolution, the left wing descended from the heights to outflank the French, and prevent their escape. Their first attack was on the village of Telnitz, which, with the other four, was occupied by the French; and all were the scene of severe encounters in the early part of the day. Whilst the left wing was engaged in this direction, and making its way towards the rear of the French, Napoleon was gradually edging his men between that wing and the main body; and the latter was preparing to descend the heights, to follow and support general Buxhowden. When this body was fairly in motion, at a signal previously agreed upon, Lannes, Bernadotte, Vandamme, Tiebault, and St. Hilaire, each at the head of a column of infantry, dashed upon the enemy. One part of the force was directed upon the left wing; and the other rushed up the heights, and drove the Austrians and Russians before them, into the low grounds. Kutusoff sent for the reserve under the archduke Constantine; which advanced to the heights of Pratzen, in order that the main body might rally behind it. The imperial guard was joined by that general and the emperor Alexander; when, before they were aware of the vicinity of an enemy, they were charged by a body of French light infantry, supported by the cavalry, and thrown into great confusion. Rallied by the emperor and Kutusoff, the guards made a desperate charge on the French, drove them back, broke through several squares formed to oppose them, and were sabring the men right and left. At that moment, general Rapp, who had been dispatched to the spot by Napoleon, at the head of the grenadiers of the imperial guard, came up, and changed the fortune of the day, which, in that part of the field, was decidedly against the French. In their turn, the Russian guard was broken and dispersed; prince Repnin, who commanded one of its regiments, was made prisoner; and the swiftness of his horse alone saved the archduke Constantine from the same fate. The defeat was complete; and the two emperors witnessed it from the heights of Austerlitz, where the emperor of Russia had joined Francis, after he had assisted Kutusoff in rallying the reserve.

The main body of the allies did not submit tamely, when they found they were out-generalled, to see the heights they had left occupied by the enemy. Several times was the attempt made to retake them, but in vain; and, at the time the Russian imperial guard was broken up and dispersed, the main body was driven back a mile from the field of battle. Then the left wing was attacked in rear by Soult, in front by Davoust. One division, 6,000 strong, was quickly broken up, and nearly half the men were made prisoners. Langeron's division shared the same fate: Langeron himself joined Buxhowden, and they succeeded in rallying what was left of this wing—the remains of the various corps constituting about 14,000 men. They debouched, with a view to gain a road between the ponds and the heights, which might have enabled them to come up with the relics of the main body. They were, however, met by the French, flushed with victory, who made a vigorous attack upon the retreating mass, and separated it into two bodies—one under Buxhowden, of only a few battalions, which appears to have got off; the other, comprising twenty-eight battalions, was assailed on all sides: not fewer than 7,000 men are said to have been taken and destroyed on the spot; and the remainder, upwards of 2,000, rushed forward to cross a frozen lake or morass, which soon began to yield to their pressure. But, whilst the ice was cracking around them, shells, thrown from the French batteries, directed by Napoleon himself, fell amongst the fugitives, and exploded. An awful shriek was heard, piercing the ears of all who were within reach of its sound. It proceeded from those unfortunate men who were engulfed by the immediate bursting of the ice! The right wing was equally brave, and equally unfortunate with the left and centre. For five hours they defended the heights they occupied against the attacks of Lannes, Bernadotte, and Murat. At noon they began to give way; and, soon after, were collected in one column by prince Bagrathion, and commenced a retreat upon Austerlitz. This column was attacked by Suchet and Murat; all the baggage captured, numbers slain, and only a remnant reached the village, where thousands of the wounded and the flying had already taken refuge. The other survivors were in full retreat by the road to Hungary. The wounded were necessarily abandoned; but Kutusoff, in the hurry of flight, left written papers, in French, in various places, imploring compassion for his unfortunate countrymen. The same evening after the battle, the wounded French received all the attention it was possible to bestow upon them; and it is due to the conquerors to say, that they did not neglect the conquered, but extended to them the same assistance which was given to their own men.

Thus ended the battle of Austerlitz, which has been termed "the most glorious of all the victories of Napoleon." The allies lost at least 30,000 men, in killed, wounded, or prisoners; 180 guns; 500 caissons, and 45 standards; and the fine army which, on the previous day, covered the heights of Austerlitz and Pratzen, was utterly disorganised. The French lost 12,000, killed and wounded; and their situation, notwithstanding the complete victory they had gained, was not one to inspire confidence. Though the first and second Russian armies, and the remains of Mack's army which had joined them, were completely hors de combat, a third corps had arrived in Silesia; the inhabitants of Bohemia and Hungary were rising en masse; the archdukes Charles and John, at the head of not less than 80,000 men, collected on their march, were advancing on Vienna, and had already summoned Mortier to surrender; there were Russians and Swedes in Hanover; the number of Prussians, Saxons, and Hessians in arms, was estimated at 160,000; and Napoleon, with his "grand army" reduced in numbers from the events of the campaign, was far from his magazines and his resources. These facts were, however, unknown to, or unheeded by, the vanquished; and the emperors, who had great difficulty in securing their own safety, bivouacked near a mill, about three leagues from Austerlitz. There a council was held of such general officers as could be collected; and the altered position of affairs from the previous day—the effect of the most signal defeat either Russians or Austrians had ever experienced—being considered, it was resolved, by a large majority, that it was useless to prolong hostilities; and that prince Lichtenstein should proceed to the head-quarters of the French emperor, to propose an armistice, and to express the wish of the emperor Francis for a personal interview with the conqueror. The next day the two emperors went to Holitsch.

Napoleon refused to grant the armistice till after an interview with his brother-emperor, which he fixed to take place on the 4th. They met near the mill where the two emperors had passed the night of the 2nd; and they had a private interview, which lasted two hours. Thiers professes to give some particulars of what passed between them, but it is apocryphal. All that is really known is, that an armistice was agreed to, both for Austria and Russia; that the Russian troops were to be withdrawn from Germany by regulated marches; and that a separate peace was to be negotiated between Austria and France. At separating, according to Savary, "the parties appeared to be in excellent humour. They laughed," he says (notwithstanding the lives that had been sacrificed, the families that had been made wretched, and the property that had been wasted in their quarrels); "which seemed to us all to be a good omen." They parted with a mutual embrace; and, as they separated, Savary heard the emperor Napoleon say—"I agree to it; but your majesty must promise not to make war upon me again." To which the emperor of Austria replied—"No; I promise you I will not; and I will keep my word." So they separated. The emperor of Austria soon after returned to Holitsch, where Alexander remained while the interview between Francis and Napoleon took place. That sovereign having accepted the armistice, the troops were removed into winter quarters to wait the event.

Napoleon took up his head-quarters at Brunn, till the negotiations were fairly commenced. They were conducted by M. Talleyrand on the part of France; and prince Lichtenstein and general Giulay on the part of Austria. The terms which Napoleon authorised M. Talleyrand to propose to Austria were sufficiently humiliating, as no inconsiderable part of her territory was demanded. And, after he had communicated his instructions to Talleyrand, he proceeded to conclude three treaties, with Baden, Würtemberg, and Bavaria, which were signed on the 10th, 12th, and 20th of December, by which part of that territory was disposed of before the emperor Francis had agreed to give it up. Napoleon gave to Baden—the Ortenau, and part of the Brisgau: to Würtemberg—the rest of the Brisgau, and part of Suabia: to Bavaria—the Tyrol, the Vorarlberg, the bishoprics of Eichstädt, Passau, and Augsburg; the city of Augsburg, and all Austrian Suabia. The title of king was offered to the three electors: the elector of Baden refused to take a dignity

he considered inconsistent with his state and his revenues; those of Würtemberg and Bavaria accepted it. As one condition of the liberality (with other people's property) which Napoleon evinced to Bavaria, the hand of the young princess of Bavaria, though engaged to the heir of Baden, was claimed for Eugene Beauharnais. The court of Baden was induced to forego the fulfilment of the engagement on the part of the elector of Bavaria; and the marriage of Augusta and Eugene, much to the dissatisfaction of the electress, who disliked the French alliance, was finally arranged.

Napoleon, having seen that all care was taken of his wounded, and given the necessary directions respecting his army, left Brunn for Vienna, leaving Talleyrand to carry on the negotiations with the Austrian plenipotentiaries. He wanted to see M. Haugwitz, who had presented himself at his head-quarters just before the battle of Austerlitz, to propose that mediation which Prussia had undertaken to offer by the treaty of Potsdam. He then advised the Prussian minister to go to the Austrian capital, to confer with Talleyrand, and there he remained. It was the 13th of December, when Napoleon arrived at Vienna. He took up his residence at Schönbrunn, and sent, the same evening, for M. Haugwitz; to whom, after some conversation, he made certain propositions, to which that minister assented, opposed as they were to the treaty of Potsdam. The next day they were incorporated in a treaty, which was signed on the 15th. By this treaty, France considering Hanover her own by conquest, assigned it to Prussia, as its "protector;" that power, in return, ceded Anspach to Bavaria; Neufchâtel and the duchy of Cleves to France. The two powers mutually guaranteed each other's possessions from all attack. This treaty was never ratified. As soon as it was made known in Prussia, it became unpopular with all classes; for honourable men were sorry to see their sovereign availing himself of circumstances to secure the territory of a friendly power; the merchants dreaded the reprisals of England on Prussian commerce; the Prussians generally regretted the intimate alliance contracted with a sovereign who had just triumphed over the German armies; and the king, though he dreaded war with France, hesitated at thus putting himself in antagonism to England. Negotiations were, however, resumed at Paris, where M. Haugwitz repaired after Napoleon had returned to that capital; and they ended in a second treaty being drawn up, more explicit and stringent than the first. By the second document, which was signed on the 15th of February, 1806, and ratified on the 24th, Hanover was to be held and occupied by Prussia "in right of sovereignty;" and that power agreed to close the Weser and the Elbe against the English. When the terms of the treaty were promulgated, England declared war against Prussia, and ordered all vessels under the Prussian flag to be seized.

The negotiations with Austria were concluded before the year closed. Napoleon demanded that his late enemy should cede the Tyrol, Suabia, the Vorarlberg, and all she held in Italy; and great opposition was made to these demands, though the emperor Francis was willing to concede part of what was asked, provided Hanover—the property of a friend and ally—was given to an archduke. Thus Austrian morality was shown to be about on a par with that of Prussia. When the first treaty was signed with the latter power, Napoleon became more importunate, Austria more yielding; and at length, on the 26th of December, a treaty was signed at Presburg (the negotiations having been removed to that city), by which Austria agreed to cede Venice and Venetia to the kingdom of Italy. Dalmatia and Albania, the principality of Eichstadt, part of the archbishopric of Passau, the city of Augsburg, the Tyrol, Austrian Suabia, the Brisgau, and the Ortenau, were also given up; and the emperor engaged "not to throw any obstacles in the way, either as chief of the empire, or as co-sovereign of any acts which, in their character as sovereigns, the elector of Baden, and the kings of Würtemberg and Bavaria, might think proper to adopt." The treaty guaranteed the independence of the Helvetic confederacy and Batavian republic. By secret articles, Austria was bound, besides her cessions of territory, to pay to France a contribution of 40,000,000 francs; whilst she gave up all the military stores, &c., which had fallen into the hands of France, reserving to herself the right of repurchasing what she pleased of them; a right of which she availed herself to a large extent.—The same day that this treaty was signed, Napoleon issued a proclamation seriously affecting the kingdom of Naples. The king, subsequent to the treaty entered into with France, which led to the withdrawal of St. Cyr to support Masséna, had concluded an alliance with Russia and England, and permitted their ships to enter his ports, and Russian and English troops to occupy his capital. This act of bad faith would have justified a declaration of war, but certainly not the unprecedented step the emperor took; which was to declare, by the proclamation alluded to, that, having pardoned the infatuated king three times, he would not pardon him a fourth; and "that the dynasty of Naples had ceased to reign—its existence being incompatible with the repose of Europe, and the honour of his [Napoleon's] crown." He made his brother Joseph king of Naples, whose accession to the throne we shall notice in the next chapter.

Napoleon left Vienna for Munich on the 29th of December. There he witnessed the wedding of Eugene Beauharnais and the princess Augusta; on which occasion, he declared Eugene to be his adopted son; and, should he die childless, the future king of Italy. The emperor had joined him at Munich, to be present at the marriage; and shortly after the ceremony was performed they set out for Paris, where they arrived on the 26th of January, 1806.

CHAPTER VIII.

FRANCE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF 1806; AFFAIRS OF NAPLES; NAPOLEON'S CREATION OF KINGS AND DUKES; SESSION OF THE LEGISLATIVE BODY; CONFEDERATION OF THE RHINE; RUPTURE WITH RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA; BATTLE OF MAIDA; NAVAL EVENTS OF THE YEAR; INSURRECTION IN NAPLES; WAR WITH PRUSSIA; BATTLES OF AUERSTADT AND JENA; BERLIN DECREE; WAR WITH RUSSIA; BATTLE OF PULTUSK; NAPOLEON AT WARSAW.

ON the 1st of January, 1806, another step was made towards a return to the old order of things, and the abolition of those innovations introduced by revolution. The public had long abandoned the marking time by décades; but the custom still existed in all the official departments. The new year was inaugurated by the appearance of a decree entirely abolishing the republican calendar, and re-establishing the common one, and the Gregorian style. About the same time, the Pantheon was restored to its original destination, of a Christian church; and the services and ancient ordinances at the royal cemetery of St. Denis, were revived. These changes gave great satisfaction; and there was, throughout the country, a much more joyous feeling than at the opening of 1805. The merchants and traders anticipated a revival of trade and commerce from the return of peace; the masses looked for more employment and better times; and all classes, with the natural pride of Frenchmen, were elated at recent events, which had humbled three great powers—Austria, Prussia, and Russia; and placed France, for the time, in the foremost rank of the continental states. This feeling was especially displayed at Paris on the 15th of January, when the colours and trophies taken in the late campaigns, were borne triumphantly through the streets of that capital, to be placed in the halls of the legislative bodies, the church of Notre-Dame, and other places. The windows of all the houses, and the streets, were crowded; and even Cambacérès, cool and unimpassioned as he is said to have been, was carried away by the enthusiasm of the moment; and he tells us, that “the joy of the people resembled intoxication.”

In the midst of the triumphs of France, and the consequent joy of the people, the government found itself called upon to struggle with the financial crisis, which had by no means passed away. It brought Napoleon back to Paris sooner than he was expected, and before the preparations making for his reception by the Parisians were completed. He arrived in the night of the 26th of January, and immediately sent for the minister of the treasury, M. de Marbois, with whom he remained in consultation all the night. The next day, the council of finance assembled, and M. Marbois was dismissed; being replaced by M. Molliou, director of the sinking-fund. The financial embarrassments were ascribed to the dismissed minister, and to his transactions with the company of United Merchants, who appeared to be indebted to the state 141,000,000 francs. They had to surrender everything they possessed to the government; and to put the French treasury in their own place with respect to Spain—by an agreement with whom, M. Ouvrard received all the bullion from the Mexican mines. For immediate demands, fifty millions of the war contributions were on their way to Paris, partly in gold and silver, partly in bills of exchange on the Hanse Towns. This sum restored credit; and the capitalists, who had required eighteen per cent. from the United Merchants to discount their bills, soon reduced their rate to the treasury to three-quarters, and half per cent. The emperor ordered that, from that time forth, the strictest regularity should be observed in the financial department; and that the expenditure should not be suffered to exceed the revenue, even if new taxes were imposed. Economy was indeed necessary; for it was the vicious system the extravagance of the imperial government had imposed upon the treasury, that had been the main cause of the crisis. To relieve the treasury to some extent, Napoleon introduced the system of only sending half their pay to the French troops which still remained in Germany and other countries; and he required those countries to supply them with food. “If the provisions had been paid for,” naïvely remarks M. Thiers, “the presence of our troops, instead of becoming a burden, would have been an advantage.” But they were not paid for; and the inhabitants of the countries they occupied, feeling the grinding oppression,

The financial arrangements concluded for the time, Napoleon proceeded to carry out those plans of self and family aggrandisement which, though not suggested by his recent successes and the humiliation to which he had subjected the northern powers, were undoubtedly strengthened by those events. He planned kingdoms and principalities for the members of his family; honours and rewards for his officers; and, for himself, he desired the title of "emperor of the west," which had been extinct for a thousand years. The first step taken was to establish Joseph Bonaparte on the throne of Naples. To carry out the proclamation of the 26th of December—alone sufficient to have justified a coalition of all the European powers against Napoleon—Joseph, as lieutenant-general of Naples, had been sent to join Masséna, with the nominal title of commander-in-chief of the army of Italy—the duties of that office being executed by the marshal. Masséna was at the head of 41,000 men; and, on the 8th of February, this force entered Naples in three columns, under Regnier, Masséna, and St. Cyr, at Gaëta, Capri, and Itri. The Russian and English forces immediately withdrew—the former to Corfu, and the latter to Sicily, where king Ferdinand also retired; and, as far as he was personally concerned, Naples might rejoice at being free from the infliction of his sovereignty. The queen, Caroline, endeavoured to inspire the troops and people with a spirit of resistance; but she was not seconded by the nobles, amongst whom she was unpopular; and her majesty, whom Sir H. Banbury describes as a "bold, bad woman, profligate and cruel," was also obliged to take refuge in Sicily. On the 15th of February, Joseph Bonaparte entered Naples, and assumed the sovereignty, though not with the title of king. The continental portion of the kingdom, with the exception of Gaëta, which the prince of Hesse-Philpsthall held, at the head of 8,000 men, was, in that short space of time, subdued; and another Bourbon dynasty was supposed to be at an end.

When Joseph Bonaparte went to Naples, Eugene Beauharnais was sent to take possession of Venice and the Venetian states. The administration of those provinces was placed in his hands, and, for a time, was kept separate from that of the kingdom of Italy. General Molitor, at the same time, entered Dalmatia, and advanced to Zara, the capital; general Marmont being ready to aid him if any opposition was made to the surrender of the territory, in conformity with the treaty of Presburg. No difficulty occurred, except at the forts at the mouth of the Cattaro, which were given up to the Russians; the Austrian officer in command, and the Austrian commissioners who were sent to deliver them to the French, asserting that they were constrained by a superior force. It is stated, that Siniavin, the Russian admiral, who took possession of the forts, did so without orders; but it would appear, that Russian agents had instigated the inhabitants of the town of Cattaro—Montenegrins, of the Greek church—to rise in a tumultuous manner, and protest against being put under the sovereignty of France. As a Russian force had obtained possession of the forts, the emperor Alexander evinced no disposition to give them up again; and Napoleon, in retaliation, ordered Berthier to retain possession of the fortress of Brenau; countermanded the march of the French troops from the Rhine; and sent a corps, under Lauriston, to take possession of Ragusa, which, though a part of Dalmatia, had never been subject to Austria, having maintained its independence, as a republic, from the seventh century, under the successive protection of the Greeks, Venetians, and Turks. The emperor of Austria complained of the occupation of Cattaro by the Russians; fearing the vengeance of France. To allay his apprehensions, Alexander sent M. d'Oubril, who had, before the late war, resided for some time at Paris as chargé d'affaires, to the French capital, to endeavour to effect a general settlement of the questions which again divided the two empires. He was instructed to obtain something, no matter what, for Russia's protégés—the kings of Naples and Piedmont; "to delay, as long as possible, the restitution of the mouths of the Cattaro; to give them up, nevertheless, if there were no other means of preventing hostilities against Austria; and to endeavour, above all, to re-establish an honourable peace between Russia and France." At the same time, negotiations were going on between France and England. The death of Mr. Pitt, on the 23rd of January, 1806, had led to the accession of Mr. Fox to power. He was personally known to, and respected by, Napoleon; and the offer of a scoundrel, soon after he had taken office, to assassinate the French emperor, led to a communication to M. Talleyrand, which caused a diplomatic intercourse to be opened, extending over several months. Though it was abortive as to its object—restoring peace—it had one good effect. The English government sent home many French officers, who were prisoners of war; and Napoleon liberated the English families whom he had detained in France at the commencement of hostilities.

Napoleon seized the period of comparative quiet allowed him, while the negotiations with Russia and England were in progress, to carry out more of those projects for the aggrandisement of himself and friends, to which we have already alluded. His first creation was that of Murat, the husband of his sister Caroline; who, by a decree of the 15th of March, was declared grand-duke of Cleves and Berg. On the 30th of March, Joseph Bonaparte was proclaimed king of Naples and Sicily, the island being yet to be conquered. As lieutenant-general of Naples, Joseph had commenced his administration in a spirit which demanded admiration, although it could not cause Europe to forget the means by which he attained power. He planned and commenced several great public works, including canals and roads; and seemed never tired of acts of mercy and beneficence. An insurrection had broken out in Calabria, but it was speedily suppressed by general Regnier; and when, on the 13th of April, he received his brother's decree, raising him to the royal dignity, his authority was acknowledged throughout the kingdom, Gaëta alone continuing to oppose resistance to the French force. By accepting the crown of Naples, it was understood that Joseph did not forfeit his right to the throne of France, should Napoleon die without heirs; but it was provided that the two crowns should never be united on one head.

Another decree, also, issued on the 30th of March, annexed the Venetian states to the kingdom of Italy; and provided, that the capital of the peninsula, Rome, should confer a title on the eldest son of the sovereign. At the same time, the emperor made his eldest sister, Pauline Borghese (she having married again, after the death of her first husband, general Le Clerc), duchess of Guastalla; and Berthier was created prince of Neufchâtel. The emperor also resolved to convert the Batavian republic into a monarchy. There, as in Italy, a simulated assent of the authorities and people was obtained through French agency; and, on the 6th of June, decrees appeared, creating his brother Louis king of Holland; M. de Talleyrand, prince of Benevento; and Bernadotte, prince of Pontecorvo. Both the principalities had been taken from the domains of the pope, on the pretence that they belonged to the kingdom of Naples. By other decrees, Massa and Carrara were added to Parma and Placenza: Cambacérès was declared duke of the former provinces; and Lebrun, duke of the latter; Savary, duke of Rovigo; Junot, duke of Abrantes; and Lannes, duke of Montebello. These titles conferred no power; the provinces from which they were derived were made grand fiefs of the empire, and one-fifteenth of their revenues was assigned to the newly-created nobles. These family and personal arrangements were concluded by the marriage of mademoiselle Stephanie Beauharnais, niece of the empress, to the hereditary prince of Baden.

On the 2nd of March, the session of the legislative body had been opened, and it passed the measures laid before it without discussion: the tribunate was equally dumb. Some of those measures were attended with very beneficial results. One of them was the establishment of the conseils des prud'hommes, for the purpose of adjusting disputes between workmen and their employers. These councils, consisting of three masters and three workmen, elected by the aggregate bodies of each, and a president, were to arbitrate between the two, and get them to come to an amicable agreement, if possible. If they failed, then, in matters where a sum of sixty francs was sufficient for fine or damage, they decided summarily, and without appeal. A Code de Procedure was also appended to the Code Napoleon; and an institution, under the name of the Imperial University, was ordered to be organised, for the purpose of superintending the system of instruction and education throughout the empire. In this session, with a view of making the revenue more equal to the expenditure, the tax on salt, abolished a few years previous, was renewed; a heavy duty was laid on cotton yarn; and the emperor announced his financial policy to be, "to introduce a great number of indirect taxes, susceptible of augmentation, when the public necessities called for their increase." At the same time, to encourage French, and injure British manufactures, the importation of muslin, and all cotton manufactures, was prohibited.

The emperor's intimate connection with Germany was, whilst he was attending to the various matters we have thus briefly enumerated, quietly tending to bring about a change in the constitution of that country, which was humiliating to Austria and Prussia, whilst it showered additional honours on the head of the emperor of the French. The kings of Bavaria and Würtemberg, and the elector of Baden, Napoleon's especial friends and allies, were the most active agents in producing this change. They were joined by the elector of Mayence, the landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt; the princes of Nassau-Usingen, Nassau-Weilburg, Hohenzollern-Hechingen, Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, Salm-Salm, Salm-Kyrburg, Isenburg, Birstein, and Lichtenstein; the duke of Neuenburg, and the count of Meyen. On the 12th of July, the plenipotentiaries of these members of the Germanic empire, signed, at Paris, a treaty, by which they agreed to separate from the other members of the Germanic body, and to form a new confederacy, called the Confederation of the Rhine. The object of this federative alliance—the idea of which originated with Napoleon—was stated to be, in the act of federation, "the maintenance of internal and external peace," by an alliance between each other, and of all with France; the obligation of that alliance to be mutual assistance, for defence, if any one of the states was attacked. The common interests of the federal states were to be discussed in a diet, to assemble at Frankfort. This diet was to be composed of two colleges—a college of kings and a college of princes; the kings and grand-dukes taking their seats in the first; the princes in the second. The federal army was to consist of 263,000 men—France furnishing 200,000, the states the rest; and Napoleon added to his titles of emperor of the French and king of Italy, that of protector of the Confederation of the Rhine. This treaty was not promulgated till the 1st of August, when the federate princes announced to the diet sitting at Ratisbon, their separation from the Germanic empire. Five days after, on the 6th of August, the emperor Francis renounced the title of emperor of Germany, assuming that of emperor of Austria. At the same time he released all the members of the Germanic confederation from those obligations which, as the head of the empire, they owed to him.

This change was not popular amongst the people of Germany. They considered the protectorate of France a violation of their national independence; and the entire proceeding was severely reprobated through the press. Numerous pamphlets were published upon the subject; and Napoleon, much exasperated—as he said they were written to rouse the Germans to hostilities against the French, and excite the French soldiers to insubordination to his authority—ordered Berthier, who was in command of the troops stationed in Germany, to suppress these manifestations of public opinion. Several booksellers were arrested, and sent before courts-martial; though the offence, if it were one, should have been tried before a civil tribunal. One of these pamphlets, written by M. Gentz, was published by Julius Joseph Palm, a citizen and bookseller of Nuremberg. It was entitled, Germany in her deepest Humiliation; and, the author condemning the Confederation of the Rhine, and the alliance with France, which he considered humiliating and degrading—strongly urged his countrymen to throw off the yoke that was imposed upon them; but reminded them that they must not look to either England or Russia for deliverance, but rely upon themselves. For publishing this pamphlet Palm was arrested, though Nuremberg was a free city, and he was not a subject of Bonaparte, or of the confederation. Shortly after, he was removed to Brennau, where he was tried before a court-martial, found guilty of the offence Napoleon laid to his charge, and condemned to be shot. The sentence was carried into execution on the 25th of August. This was an act entirely indefensible; it was everywhere denounced as one of the greatest tyranny; and subscriptions were opened throughout Germany, and in England, for the widow and children of the murdered man, for whom the greatest sympathy was expressed.

The negotiations between M. Talleyrand and M. d'Oubril, on the part of France and Russia, ended in the signing of a treaty at Paris, on the 20th of July. In agreeing to the terms, which Talleyrand dictated, there is no doubt but that M. d'Oubril was deceived by that wily negotiator. Lord Yarmouth was, at the same time, carrying on negotiations at Paris, on the part of England; and the Russian chargé d'affaires was induced to believe, not only that a separate peace with that power had been agreed to; but that, if hostilities were resumed, no terms whatever would be held with Austria, who was, just then, quite unable to contend against her recent conqueror. These representations induced M. d'Oubril to agree to a treaty which made Russia break faith with England, besides being otherwise humiliating to herself. The news of the alliance thus concluded was very ill received at St. Petersburg; and, before Alexander had signed the ratification, the news of what had transpired at the diet of Ratisbon, on the 1st of August, was received. If the emperor had hesitated before, he now became decided, and the treaty was rejected, on the ground that M. d'Oubril had exceeded his instructions. This rejection did not produce an immediate interruption of that pacific intercourse between the two countries, the result of the armistice, which preceded the treaty of Presburg—France being just then occupied with fresh differences with Prussia.

Many causes contributed to make the king of Prussia at last withdraw from the truly humiliating position in which French diplomacy had placed him. The Confederation of the Rhine was one of these causes. It was alike obnoxious to Austria and to Prussia, though the emperor of the former yielded, for the time, to a power he could not resist. But to Francis the confederation produced little beyond a loss of dignity; to Frederick William it was full of danger, as, in case of war with France, it brought an enemy close to his frontiers. Then Murat, who was declared, by the 24th article of the treaty of confederation, to be the head of all the German territories formerly belonging to the house of Orange, claimed domains which Napoleon himself had awarded to Prussia as a compensation for its cessions in Franconia; and great indignities were offered to the prince of Latour and Taxis, brother-in-law to the queen. It was also discovered, that M. Talleyrand, in the negotiations with England, had offered to restore Hanover to the king of that country; Prussia being told to seek for an indemnity in Pomerania; whilst, in the treaty signed with M. d'Oubril, France had agreed to guarantee all his possessions to the king of Sweden; and it had been suggested to Russia, in the course of the negotiations, that Poland should be re-established as a kingdom, including the part united to Prussia, with the grand-duke Constantine as king. These proofs of bad faith and duplicity were too much for even M. Haugwitz to contend against; and the rest of the cabinet, with the nobles and the people, were equally eager that the honour of Prussia should be maintained. On the 9th of August, therefore, the king issued orders for his army to be put on a war footing; he opened the navigation of the Elbe and the Weser; came to a friendly understanding with Sweden, and sent M. Krusemark to St. Petersburg, and M. Jacobi to London, to endeavour to bring about a similar result with Russia and England.

The negotiations between France and England were continued for some time longer; lord Lauderdale succeeding lord Yarmouth as plenipotentiary. They failed; Napoleon demanding that Sicily should be given up to his brother Joseph; and England insisting, as a sine qua non, that it should be an appanage for the late king of Naples. Russia has been blamed for occupying the mouths of the Cattaro; and England for refusing to give up Sicily—thus causing another war. But, as Sir A. Alison remarks, following M. Bignon, who had taken the same view of the question, “it was not merely as an appanage of the crown of Naples that Napoleon so obstinately insisted on Sicily for his brother; it was as the greatest island in the Mediterranean, as opening the way to the command of that inland sea, and clearing the route to Egypt and the Indies, that it became a paramount object of desire.” Nor was it “an obscure harbour on the coasts of the Adriatic which brought the colossal empires of Russia and France into collision—it was a settlement on the coast of Turkey—it was the establishment of a French military station within sight of the Crescent, which was the secret matter of ambition to one party, and of jealousy to the other.” Sicily and Cattaro were only ostensible causes of difference: “the negotiations broke off upon those eternal subjects of contention between England, France, and Russia—the empire of the seas, and the dominion of continental Europe.”—The rupture of the negotiations with England was followed by the death of Mr. Fox, who expired of dropsy on the 13th of September.

While Napoleon was striving to gain Sicily, ostensibly for his brother Joseph, really for his own purposes—the latter had to fight for his continental dominions. The rightful, though unworthy, sovereign being established in Sicily, and no other object of attack presenting itself to the British arms, the government instructed their military and naval commanders to make descents on Naples, with a view to ascertain whether the people were inclined to rise and join them in an attempt to drive out the usurper, and reinstate Ferdinand. At the end of June, Sir Sidney

Smith took possession of the island of Capri; and an expedition sailed from Palermo, under Sir John Stuart, which landed, on the 30th, in the gulf of St. Euphemia, on the west coast of Calabria. Sir John, who had not 5,000 men under his command, immediately on landing, issued a proclamation, calling upon the Calabrians to rally round the standard of their rightful sovereign, and to expel the intruder. There was no response—or next to none; and the English would have re-embarked, and returned to Palermo, if they had not heard that Regnier, with a French force, was encamped at Maida, a small town of Calabria Ultra, about five miles from the coast. Sir John Stuart did not like the idea of retiring in face of a hostile force, and he resolved to advance, and attack the French in their encampment. On the 5th of July, the outposts of the two armies were in front of each other. Regnier, with a force of 5,000 infantry, 600 cavalry, and a battery of horse artillery, had encamped on a range of wooded heights, offering many difficulties to an assailant. He had been reinforced during the night; and his army, on the 5th, consisted of 7,500 men. The British bivouacked, on the night of the 4th, in a marshy, unhealthy plain, on the banks of the Amato, which divided them from the enemy; and the next morning, confident in the superiority of his numbers, the French general resolved to “attack the presumptuous islanders, and drive them into the sea.” However, he found those islanders were not so easily beaten. The attack was gallantly made; and, after a few volleys had been discharged, the French left wing rushed upon the British right, with their bayonets levelled to the charge. Instead of retiring, however, the British—chiefly light companies of the different regiments engaged—as soon as they saw the movements of the French, levelled their muskets, and dashed forward. The bayonets of the two armies crossed; and then French enthusiasm gave way before British nerve. Their battalions broke and fled, pursued by the “islanders;” and of that wing, 700 were killed, and 1,000 made prisoners. The British centre, under brigadier-general Auckland, was equally successful against that of the French. The cavalry of the latter then endeavoured to turn the British left; and, for a very short time, this movement appeared to be more successful than those of the left and centre. But the 28th regiment had landed that morning, and came up as the cavalry were making their charge. They immediately sent a volley into the French ranks, which so disconcerted them, that they turned and fled; and the remains of the army recrossed the Amato with little more than one-third of the number which had set out in the morning, assured of victory. Sir John Stuart, in his despatch, gives the loss of the British at 44 killed, and 284 wounded. The loss of the French was much greater.

This victory was most important, as proving that there was at least one nation whose soldiers could cope with the French in the field; and Napoleon received the news of the defeat with an anguish which he in vain endeavoured to conceal. It also arrested an intended expedition to Sicily; all the stores, ammunition, and artillery, collected for a descent on that island, falling into the hands of the victors. Its effects in Calabria seemed at first likely to be fatal to the authority of king Joseph. Regnier, and the remains of his force, retreated to the north; the people of the south rose almost en masse against the French; and the British took possession of all the towns and forts on the coast. The aspect of things, however, soon changed. The British had no troops near to reinforce Sir John Stuart; whilst Masséna was liberated from his long siege of Gaëta, by the surrender of that fortress on the 18th of July—a few days after the prince of Hesse-Philipsthal had been mortally wounded, and removed to Sicily. The French marshal had 18,000 men under his orders; and he advanced directly into Calabria. The British force was not equal to one-fourth of the enemy, when Masséna's army, and the remains of Regnier's, had united. It therefore retreated slowly to the straits of Messina, and re-embarked for Sicily on the 15th of September. The French advance was bravely resisted, but they were everywhere triumphant; and great cruelties were committed on both sides—for which the peasantry set the example by massacring a number of French soldiers, chiefly wounded, at Crotona; when general Stuart in vain attempted to repress their ferocity. The French ultimately re-established their authority; but with the total loss of near 15,000 men: and an amnesty, published by the humane Joseph, put an end to the contest.

The English have been blamed for sending an army to Calabria, and thus causing the peasantry to rise in insurrection, when they had not a sufficient force to support them against the French troops. It was an injudicious step; and, though ignorant of it at the time, they were playing the game of Napoleon, in taking it. Writing to Joseph on the 17th of August, he said—"I should like very much to see a revolt of the Neapolitan populace. You will never be their master till you have made an example of them. All conquered people have need of a revolt. I should regard one at Naples in the same way as the father of a family sees the small-pox among his children: the crisis is salutary, provided it do not too much weaken their constitutions." In previous letters, the emperor had blamed the lenity of his brother, and recommended more severity. Writing to him, after the suppression of the insurrection in Calabria, Joseph told him, that there were more victims "in that province than he [Napoleon] could desire; but that it was inevitable; and he had no compassion for the sufferers."

Before we notice those important events in Germany and Poland with which the year closed, a brief résumé of the naval events of 1806 will not be out of place. They were unfortunate to France. After the destruction of the combined Toulon and Cadiz fleets, Napoleon determined to employ the Rochefort and Brest squadrons, if they could get out of port, in attacks upon the remote and ill-defended British colonies, and in attempts to drive the British merchantmen from the seas. On the 13th of December, 1805, when the blockading squadron was blown off the coast by contrary winds, eleven line-of-battle ships and four frigates, victualled for six months, got out of Brest harbour; and, dividing into two squadrons—one of five ships and two frigates, under admiral Leissegues, and the other of six ships and two frigates, under admiral Villamez—the former proceeded, with troops and stores, to St. Domingo; the latter to the Cape of Good Hope. Leissegues succeeded in disembarking his men and provisions at St. Domingo; but, on his return, he was encountered, on the 6th of February, by admiral Duckworth, who had been sent from the Cadiz blockading squadron, with seven ships of the line and four frigates, in pursuit of the French. This time, the superiority of force was greatly on the side of the English. The French fought most bravely; but three ships were taken, two driven on shore and burnt, and the frigates escaped. Admiral Villamez had little better fortune. When he arrived off the Cape, he found that that Dutch colony had been captured by the British; and he directed his course to Brazil, hoping to fall-in with British merchant vessels in that direction. For some time this squadron eluded the pursuit of three British divisions, under admirals Warren, Strachan, and Louis; but, ultimately, Jerome Bonaparte, in the Veteran, left for Europe. On his way, he took a valuable English vessel, which he was afterwards obliged to abandon; and, to avoid some British cruisers, he had to run his vessel on shore in the Bay of Biscay. The guns and crew were landed; but the vessel was lost. The Cassard succeeded in getting to Brest about the middle of October; but the other vessels of this squadron were all destroyed by the English. Such was the end of the Brest squadron.—That from Rochefort, under admiral Lallemande, eluded the blockading fleet, got to sea, and was so fortunate in escaping from the British, who thought, repeatedly, they were on its track, that the sailors gave it the name of the "invisible squadron." In the course of its cruise, this squadron took several merchant vessels, and the Calcutta, 50-gun frigate, which maintained a most unequal fight, for some time, with four of Lallemande's line-of-battle ships; and all the vessels reached

Rochefort again in safety, to the great joy of the French.—There was one other French squadron—that of admiral Linois, in the Indian Ocean; which, after having inflicted much damage on English commerce, was returning to Europe in March, when it fell-in with Sir J. B. Warren's fleet; and the Marengo, with admiral Linois on board, and the Belle Poule frigate, were taken.—The next day (the 14th), Sir Samuel Wood encountered five frigates, with troops on board, bound for the West Indies, and captured four of them.—The combined result of these events was, that the fleets of France and Spain were driven from the ocean; that the British flag floated triumphantly in every sea; and that Napoleon found himself obliged to adopt other measures for the destruction of British commerce, than those he had originally devised.

We will now return to the continent, where important events—all tending to the honour of the French arms, and, for the time, to the further aggrandisement of Napoleon—took place in the last months of the year.

Just after the king of Prussia had taken those steps we have previously mentioned, the refusal of the emperor of Russia to ratify the treaty of the 20th of July, and the failure of the negotiations with England, became known at Berlin. The spirits of the war-party were roused to the highest pitch by this intelligence; and throughout the kingdom the popular cry was raised in favour of hostilities with France. In August, M. Lucchesini, the Prussian ambassador at Paris, had sent off despatches anything but complimentary to the French government. Napoleon's system of espionage embraced the post-office; and these documents fell into his hands. Combined with the measures of the Prussian government, the tone assumed by the ambassador was sufficient to convince the French emperor that war could not be avoided. He demanded the recall of Lucchesini, who left Paris early in September; and, at the same time, he ordered the French troops to move from Brenau (which had not been evacuated), the Inn, and the Neckar, to the banks of the Elbe. The Prussian government—the war-spirit having been greatly instigated by the queen and the young prince Louis—had sent troops into the dominions of the electors of Saxony and of Hesse, in order to compel those princes to join the north of Germany against France. At the same time, M. Knobelsdorf was dispatched to Paris, at first with instructions to endeavour to prolong the negotiations, in order that Prussia might have time to complete her preparations. Napoleon, however, was not disposed to give the king, now his enemy, this advantage; and, on the 26th of September, he left Paris for the army, taking the road by Mayence and Würzburg to Bamberg. He had been gone four days, and was very near the end of his journey, when, on the 1st of October, M. Knobelsdorf delivered to M. Talleyrand the Prussian ultimatum. The king demanded—1st. That the French troops should forthwith evacuate Germany. 2nd. That the emperor should give up the districts on the Weser, improperly attached to the French empire. 3rd. That neither the emperor nor the Confederation of the Rhine, should oppose any obstacles to the formation of a counter-confederation in Northern Germany. These conditions were all perfectly just; but it appears to have been the height of folly to demand them in the face of the large and fine army of Napoleon, flushed with victory, and eager to recommence hostilities; when Prussia had to stand alone, not having had time to secure the aid of England or Russia; and when Austria was unprepared to take any part in the war. No reply was given to this ultimatum; but the French troops continued to advance. Napoleon joined the army on the 6th of October; on the 7th, he dispatched a message to the senate, informing them of the near approach of another contest; and, on the 9th, Prussia issued a formal declaration of war. In this document, ample reason was shown, why Prussia should go to war; but, as most of the facts adduced belonged to the past, and few were of recent occurrence, the wonder was that the king did not commence hostilities earlier, when he might have done so with a better prospect of success, and would, in all probability, have averted the surrender of Ulm, and the catastrophe of Austerlitz.

The contest was short and decisive. The king of Prussia had placed the duke of Brunswick at the head of his armies, who was quite incompetent to cope with Bonaparte. The duke of Weimar commanded the left wing, which was chiefly composed of the forces of the elector of Saxony, who had, very unwillingly, joined Prussia at the last moment. The Prussian army had marched through Saxony; and was scattered from Erfurth and Eisenach to Weimar—magazines being established, in a north-east direction, from that town to Leipsic. The main army was stationed at Weimar; and Napoleon, instead of attacking this force, as most commanders so superior in physical strength would have done, determined to throw his army between the enemy's communications and their magazines, and thus cut off their retreat. Fighting commenced on the 10th of October, the day after the Prussian declaration of war was issued. The French had crossed the Oder and the Elbe, no attempt being made to dispute their passage; and debouched on Saalfeld. There the division of Suchet, attached to the corps of Lannes, encountered the advanced guard of the corps Hohenlohe, commanded by the young prince Louis of Prussia. There was a fierce, but a brief encounter. The Prussians, outnumbered, were defeated; 1,000 were taken prisoners; and thirty pieces of cannon were also captured. The prince fought most gallantly, at the head of the corps; but at length he found himself hand-to-hand with a French hussar, who summoned him to surrender. A slash across the face with the prince's sabre was the reply; and his royal highness was instantly run through the body. Thus one of the most ardent instigators of the war, was one of its first victims.

The French continued to march by the valley of the Maine; the centre, consisting of the divisions of Bernadotte and Ney, being commanded by the emperor: the right wing was composed of the divisions of Soult and Davoust; the left, of those of Lannes and Lefebvre. The centre passed the Saale at Saalburg, and reached Schleitz, where the extreme left of the Prussian army was stationed, which was soon put to flight. Soult captured Hoff; and the right wing, with the cavalry, under Murat, advanced by the banks of the Elster. Thus the French cut off the Prussians from Germany, and isolated them in the positions which they had selected. Napoleon, with Ney's corps, then crossed the Saale at Jena, a town in Saxe-Weimar; the interval between Jena and Naumberg was occupied by the division of Bernadotte; and Davoust and Soult were posted between Naumberg and Doernberg, on the right bank of the Saale, near Auerstadt, a village of Saxony. The king of Prussia resolved to drive the enemy from these positions; and his majesty and the duke of Brunswick advanced, with the main body of the Prussian army, against Davoust; the Hohenlohe division, under the prince of Hohenlohe, being detached to Jena. When on the march, before these positions were taken up, Napoleon had sent a letter to the king of Prussia, offering him peace. Having expressed his readiness to cease hostilities, and again leave the differences between the two powers to be settled by negotiations, the emperor said—"If I were only beginning my military career, if I could fear the chance of battle, the language which I hold to your majesty would be altogether out of place. But your majesty will be conquered; and, without the shadow of a pretext, will have compromised the repose of your days, and the existence of your subjects." The French writers think that this letter was dispatched in perfect sincerity: it was the opinion of the Prussian authorities, that it was only meant to produce delay; and it was not answered.

The battles of Jena and Auerstadt were both fought on the 14th of October. Davoust had not more than 30,000 men; the king and the duke of Brunswick had 70,000. Bernadotte was to have supported Davoust; but he wanted to press, with his division, to the front—a movement which, he was told, would be highly imprudent, and expose the whole force to a danger of defeat. Unconvinced, this general refused to act, and stood aloof during the day. The French commenced the engagement early in the morning; and, though the Prussians had so greatly the advantage in numbers, they were defeated. The French had to rely entirely on their infantry and artillery. The Prussian army, on the contrary, was strong in cavalry, which, after the action commenced, under the command of the duke of Brunswick, prince William of Prussia, and general Blucher, made repeated charges on the French, who formed in squares to receive them, and constantly compelled the assailants to retire. At length, observing a favourable moment, Davoust gave the word—the French became the assailants; and, advancing at double-quick step, they succeeded in breaking through the centre of the enemy. Defeat then was certain. The duke of Brunswick was mortally wounded, and conveyed from the field. The next in command, general Schmettau and marshal Moellendorf, were also wounded; and then marshal Kalkreuth and general Blucher, with great heroism, endeavoured to rally the troops. It was in vain. They could not stand against the impetuosity of the French; and, after fighting fiercely for five hours, the king was obliged to withdraw the remains of that fine army with which he had taken the field in the morning. He retreated on Weimar; and he would not have reached that town, if Bernadotte had not retained the cavalry with his division.

The battle of Jena was equally fierce for the time, but it did not continue so long as that of Auerstadt. Lannes and Lefebvre supported Ney's division in this battle, which was at first admirably fought by the Prussians, whose cavalry, as at Auerstadt, made repeated charges on the squares of the French infantry. At length Lannes attacked the centre of the Prussian line, and compelled the enemy to change their front. The French had to do the same, and the action raged along the entire line. The issue, for a short time, was doubtful; but the arrival of Augereau, with several regiments from Mayence, decided it in favour of the French. Just as the fighting had commenced in the new position, this corps advanced by a fir-wood, in the rear of the Prussians, whom the new-comers immediately attacked. Thus assailed in front and rear, they wavered: Napoleon saw the movement, and ordered the imperial guard and the cavalry to charge. Just then, Murat's cavalry, inactive at Auerstadt, arrived in the field, and, rushing upon the Prussians, the rout was complete. The débris of this army also fled to Weimar; and the remains of the two defeated corps mingled in that town. In these two battles the Prussians lost, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, more than 45,000 men; and 160 pieces of cannon, with immense magazines of ammunition and provisions, fell into the hands of the victors. The loss of the latter, in the two engagements, was about 12,000 men.

The French, on the 15th, advanced to Weimar, which they occupied, and partially sacked. The grand-duchess (who had removed her daughter and the mother of the duke) remained in the palace, which was respected by the French; and, in an interview with Napoleon, she nobly defended the cause of her husband, and vindicated that loyalty which had induced him to enter the field with the king of Prussia. Napoleon was struck with admiration at her heroic fortitude. "Here," said he to general Rapp, "is a woman, whom, with our 200 guns, we have not been able to make tremble." He expressed a very different opinion of the heroic queen of Prussia, who was, in every respect, as amiable and estimable a woman as the duchess of Weimar. Her unfortunate husband—who wanted her daring and independent spirit—had quitted Weimar upon the advance of the French, and retired behind the Oder. He then sent to demand an armistice, which Napoleon refused, and pushed on for Berlin, where he arrived on the 26th of October.

After the events of the 14th, a panic appears to have seized the Prussian army. On the 15th, Kalkreuth surrendered to Soult, with all his troops. On the 17th, Bernadotte defeated the prince Eugene of Würtemberg, whom he encountered at Halle, with 16,000 men of the reserve. On the 18th, Erfurth surrendered to Murat, with 14,000 men (among whom were marshal Moellendorf and the prince of Orange), 120 pieces of cannon, and numerous magazines. Spandau, a strongly-fortified town; Magdeburg, termed "the bulwark of the kingdom;" and Glogau, a town on the Oder, considered impregnable—all fell, one after the other, having sustained very short sieges; and, in other parts of Prussia, fortress after fortress fell into the hands of the French. On the 28th of October, prince Hohenlohe—who, in his retreat, had sustained repeated conflicts with the enemy, which reduced his army from near 50,000 to 20,000 men—found himself on the heights of Prentzlow, without provisions, forage, or ammunition, and was under the necessity of capitulating to Murat. The rear-guard retreated under Blücher, who effected a junction with the dukes of Weimar and Brunswick-Oels. This officer, afterwards so distinguished, fought his way through masses of the French; and when at last he reached Lübeck, his men made a desperate resistance. The French stormed the place on the 6th of November, and carried it, but not without immense loss. Blücher, 518 officers, and 20,000 men, were, however, obliged to surrender prisoners of war. The king, before the end of October, had reached Königsberg, and the queen arrived at Cüstrin: but the numerous and well-appointed army was broken up, killed, wounded, or prisoners; and the Prussians were greatly discouraged and disheartened at the successes of their enemy.

At Berlin, Napoleon turned his attention to two objects—strengthening the Confederation of the Rhine, and humbling the power of Britain. The small states of Germany were compelled to join the confederation; and the elector of Saxony, whose troops, taken prisoners at Auerstadt, Napoleon liberated, agreed to return to his former policy of amicable relations with France. Very rigorous measures were taken with Brunswick and Hesse-Cassel, upon which states large contributions were levied. Prussia itself was divided into four departments, in which the native authorities—local, judiciary, and administrative—were maintained; but they were obliged to take an oath to perform their duties, especially with a view to preserve the alliance with France, and to hold no communication whatever with her enemies. A French corps occupied Hanover; and, on the 19th of November, Mortier took possession of Hamburg. As soon as he had established himself in the town, the French general ordered the inhabitants to give up all funds and merchandise belonging to the English. On the 21st of November, Napoleon issued that notorious document, known as the Berlin decree, by which he expected to annihilate British trade, and completely to isolate the British isles from the continent. This decree contained eight articles, of which the following is a correct abstract:—The 1st declared the British islands to be in a state of blockade.—The 2nd prohibited all intercourse with those islands, and ordered all packets or letters, addressed to England, or written in the English language, to be seized.—The 3rd declared every native of England, whatever his rank or condition, found in the countries occupied by French troops, or by those of their allies, to be prisoners of war.—By the 4th, all English merchandise, or property of any description, was declared to be good prize, &c.—The 5th prohibited trade in English merchandise.—The 6th appropriated one-half of the merchandise, or property seized as prize, to the indemnification of the merchants whose vessels might be captured by English cruisers.—The 7th decreed, that vessels coming from England, or her colonies, should not be received in any ports.—And the 8th provided, that any vessel contravening the last article by a false declaration, should be seized and confiscated. The decree was sent to the senate at Paris, who expressed their approbation of it; and, in obedience to its mandates, all Englishmen were seized and imprisoned, and all English merchandise and other property confiscated, at Hamburg, Bremen, Lübeck, Travemünde, and other places. The decree was also communicated to the kings of Spain, Naples, Etruria, and

Holland, who were ordered to carry out its provisions, which the latter did very reluctantly.*

Such was the commencement of what has been called the "Continental System" of the French emperor—a system quite as much opposed to the interests and prosperity of his own, and all other countries influenced by it, as it was to the laws of nations; and which was productive of more mischief and loss to those countries than to the British isles against which it was directed, though they suffered, no doubt, considerably; and much of the carrying trade, which had been pursued by their merchant vessels, fell into the hands of the merchants of the United States. Ultimately, Napoleon himself was the greatest sufferer from the system; for, when it got fairly into operation, it was found so oppressive, and so many severities were practised under it, that it tended, as much as any other act of his career, to destroy the confidence of his allies, and alienate the loyalty of his subjects; nor, with all his power, could he fully carry it out. He found it evaded by his allies; and, at one period, when his army in Germany were almost destitute of clothing, Bourrienne could only procure great-coats for them by authorising the use of British cloth.

Alarmed at the progress of the French, the emperor of Russia, at the close of November, declared war against the emperor. However, having subdued Prussia, the latter cared little for the renewed hostility of Alexander, especially as, about the same time, Sebastiani, his minister at the Porte, succeeded in persuading the Turkish government to forget the unprovoked invasion of Egypt, to conclude an alliance with his imperial master, to declare war against Russia, and to employ French engineers to repair the ports of the Dardanelles, and French officers to train their troops. Almost simultaneously with the rupture with Russia, the emperor received an application for peace from the king of Prussia; and a deputation of Poles waited upon him to request that he would proclaim the independence of their country. In reply to Frederick William, he required, as the price of peace, the cession of the entire country between the Rhine and the Elbe; which the king—having learnt that Russia was again about to try her strength with the hitherto invincible conqueror, and hoping that the success which had fled from him might settle upon the northern eagle—refused to give up. To the Poles, Napoleon returned the following answer:—"France never recognised the different partitions of Poland: nevertheless, I cannot proclaim your independence, unless you be determined to defend your rights with arms in your hands, and by every species of sacrifice, even of life. You are reproached with having, in your constant civil dissensions, lost sight of the true interest of your country. Instructed by misfortune, be now united, and prove to the world that one spirit animates the whole Polish nation." With this answer the deputies were obliged to be content for the present; but the Poles evinced a predilection for France during the following campaign. Napoleon, for his part, would have gladly seen them in open insurrection; and he sent for Kosciusko from Paris, expecting that his presence would excite them to rise. Kosciusko, however, doubting his sincerity, declined to obey the mandate.

Before November closed, Napoleon had his army again in motion upon Warsaw, Thorn, and Dirschau. He fixed his head-quarters at Posen, the capital of that part of Poland ceded to Prussia, on the 1st of December. On the 2nd, he issued one of his spirited proclamations to his soldiers, reminding them, that it was exactly one year since they "were on the field of battle of Austerlitz." There, "the Russian battalions, broken and overwhelmed, fled in disorder, or were surrounded, and laid down their arms." The Russians had then spoken words of peace; but they were deceitful. The ally on whom they relied, however, existed no longer. "His strong places, his capitals, his magazines, 280 stand of colours, 700 pieces of cannon, were in their power." Now, the season of the year had not been able to stop them. "They had braved all, surmounted all;" and would not "lay down their arms until a general peace assured the power of their allies, and restored their colonies for the advantage of commerce." His soldiers, who had evinced signs of discontent at a winter campaign, murmured no more after this proclamation appeared.

At Posen, on the 11th of December, the emperor concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the elector of Saxony, who assumed the title of king, and became a member of the Rhenish confederation. At this period, when he was on the eve of commencing another campaign, all Northern Germany, except Königsberg and the fortresses of Stralsund and Colberg, was, directly or indirectly, under the power and influence of Napoleon. He had, in a campaign of about one-and-twenty days, completely broken up the Prussian army, and, in fact, overthrown the monarchy. This has been described as "one of those events, the reality of which will be hardly credited by posterity." At the distance of little more than half a century merchandise; for, "if the wives of his chief officers did not set the example, whom could he expect to follow it?" It was "a contest for life or death between England and France;" and he "must look for the most cordial support from all those by whom he was surrounded."

* Napoleon endeavoured, in every way, to enforce his measures. He wrote to Junot, on the 23rd of November, enjoining him to take especial care that the ladies of his establishment used Swiss tea, and chicory coffee; and that no part of their dress was composed of English

we can scarcely bring ourselves to believe it. Yet so it was; and in less than two months after the campaign recommenced, he had made all the arrangements his fresh acquisition of territory required, completely reorganised his army, and was marching northwards, to contend with a power supposed to be at least equal to his own. If he had paused in his career, and taken measures to secure his conquests before he embarked in fresh wars, his fate might have been different. In undertaking this fresh campaign, so far north, he was under great disadvantages. He had to encounter a force composed of men, the true descendants of those whom Frederick the Great had said, he "could kill, but could not defeat." They were strong in constitution, inured to the climate, and decidedly hostile to the French. However, he and his soldiers bravely met, and encountered the great odds apparently against them; and, at the time, met with the usual reward of a daring conduct—success.

The French army was in motion on the 16th of December, and crossed the Vistula, opposed only by a Prussian corps, which there was no trouble in beating. The Russians were not encountered till the 23rd. On that day, a division of the corps of Davoust, commanded by general Morand, found the enemy strongly intrenched at Czarnovo, a Polish village on the Orz, near its confluence with the Bug. They were numerous, and the position was difficult of access; but the French assailed it with their usual ardour; and the Russians, after contesting the palm of victory with an earnest bravery, were compelled to give way. Napoleon then suspended his march; and the army was preparing to go into winter cantonments on the Vistula. The Russian commander-in-chief (marshal Kamenskoi), during this operation, resolved to attempt to cut off the left wing. Bernadotte had been ordered, with his division, to Little Strasburg, seven or eight miles from Thorn; but having received information of the Russian advance in the direction of the French left, instead of executing his orders, he halted his men, and bivouacked them on the plain of Mohrunen, sixteen leagues south of Elbing, in the night of the 24th of December. The next day, about noon, the Russian column of attack debouched on the plain, not expecting to meet with an enemy. The French commenced the fight, which continued for some time; but the Russians were defeated, and compelled to retire behind the Passarge. It is thought that this victory saved the head-quarters of Napoleon, and the division of Ney, if not the entire French army. The movement determined Napoleon to clear his front before he withdrew his army into winter quarters: and the corps of Lannes being reinforced by a division of that of Davoust, was ordered to attack the enemy, on the 26th, in their position at Pultusk, a small town, standing on an island formed by the Narew. They were commanded by general Benningsen, and fought desperately; their artillery, which was admirably served, doing great execution. There was a terrible slaughter on both sides, and the battle was a drawn one; but the Russians retired during the night, crossing the Rugel, and marching away into the country. The same day, a numerous Russian division, under general Buxhowden, was encountered at Golymin (eight leagues north-east of Warsaw), by the corps of Augereau, part of Davoust's, and the cavalry under Murat. Again the Russians fought with the most obstinate bravery; and though the French at last obliged them to retire, they had little to boast of, as their loss quite equalled, if it did not exceed, that of the enemy. This was the last fighting for the year; and Napoleon, after seeing his men as comfortably disposed of as they possibly could be under the circumstances, established his winter quarters at Warsaw, on the 1st of January, 1807: thus taking possession of another capital of his enemies.

CHAPTER IX.

NAPOLEON AT WARSAW; RENEWAL OF THE CAMPAIGN; BATTLE OF EYLAU; SIEGE OF DANTZIC; BATTLE OF FRIEDLAND; PEACE OF TILSIT; BRITISH ATTACK ON COPENHAGEN; SUPPRESSION OF THE TRIBUNATE; AFFAIRS OF PORTUGAL; ACCESSION OF RUSSIA AND AUSTRIA TO THE CONTINENTAL SYSTEM; THE ORDERS IN COUNCIL; THE MILAN DECREES.

THE emperor of the French remained at Warsaw during the month of January, 1807; and whilst he occupied himself in making every preparation for a renewal of the campaign, especially in collecting provisions and stores, he sent for Talleyrand, that he might, at the same time, digest with that minister the terms of a treaty, in order to be prepared, should Russia or Prussia express a desire for peace. Warsaw was, before the month closed, amply supplied with all the matériel of war; and it is due to Napoleon to say, that the comfort of the wounded received his especial attention. No military hospitals were ever better arranged or supplied than were those of Warsaw. Savary details the entire organisation of these hospitals with great minuteness; and, careless of human life and suffering as the emperor, not unfrequently, undoubtedly proved himself to be, the supply of every requisite in these establishments—"bedding, medicine, attendance, food, and the presence of a priest," shows that he was not inattentive to the wants, or indifferent to the comfort, of those who fought for him. Soon after his headquarters were established at Warsaw, that city began to assume the appearance both of business and gaiety. The foreign ambassadors left Paris, and repaired to the old Polish capital; and couriers constantly arrived with reports on the affairs of France, to which Napoleon attended with the utmost regularity. He also introduced many of the customs and manners of the Tuileries; and, except that the theatres were closed, Warsaw, according to Savary, "presented all the gaieties of Paris." The emperor gave two concerts every week; holding a levée at their conclusion, which led to numerous meetings in private parties. The beauty and grace of the Polish ladies were conspicuous on these occasions; and there was one whose fascinations deeply impressed his majesty. He conceived, writes our authority, "an ardent affection for her, which she as ardently returned; receiving, with pride, the homage of a conquest which appeared to consummate her happiness. It is not requisite to give her name. Her attachment remained unshaken in the midst of danger; and when he endured reverses, she still remained his faithful friend."

The French army continued to be very comfortable in their cantonments, camps, or quarters, during the month of January. The king of Prussia was still at Königsberg. Of his remaining fortresses, Dantzic was invested; and the others were threatened with assaults as soon as the season permitted. Austria had collected 40,000 men, as an "army of observation," in Bohemia; and Russia was employed in recruiting and reorganising her forces. Benningsen, who had succeeded marshal Kamenskoi in the command of the Russian army, had retired to the north after the battle of Pultusk. He immediately began to concentrate his various corps, determined to resume offensive operations as soon as possible. He succeeded in rallying the remains of the Prussian army under Lestocq; and having formed a junction between them and his own troops, he conceived the design of surprising Napoleon in his winter quarters, by penetrating between the left wing and the main body of the army; raising the siege of Dantzic; and thus turning the positions of the enemy.

Napoleon appears to have been aware of the intentions of Benningsen; and he also marched northwards, with a view of anticipating them, and cutting off the Russian general from his communications. The sentinels at the outposts of Benningsen intercepted a courier with despatches for Bernadotte, containing instructions, which revealed the strategy of the emperor; and the Russian general immediately withdrew the troops that had advanced upon the French positions. Napoleon continued his advance to the north; but Bernadotte, deprived of his despatches, did not bring up his troops. Both armies continued their movements in the first weeks of February—the march being diversified with actions between the French advanced guards and the Cossacks, in which many men were lost on both sides. On the 7th of February, the Russians passed through Eylau—a town of East Prussia, on the Pasma, 22 miles S.S.E. of Königsberg, and established themselves on the heights which command it. The French were not far in the rear. Napoleon himself, with Augereau's division, reached the town in the evening, and entered, with a view of taking up quarters for the night. Benningsen sent a strong detachment, under prince Bagrathion and general Barclay de Tolly, to drive him out; and there was a very severe engagement, particularly near a cemetery, where the French had intrenched themselves. They maintained their ground, and the Russians had to retire. In the morning of the 8th, Napoleon found that he was in front of the whole Russian army, intrenched in a most commanding position; and, soon after daybreak, they opened a tremendous fire of artillery from the heights, under cover of which they attacked the French in Eylau with the utmost fury. The attack was received by the imperial guard, and the fire of the Russian artillery was replied to, by that of forty pieces of cannon, directed by Napoleon himself. The entire corps of Augereau was engaged; and as those of Davoust, Soult, and Ney came up during the morning, they took part in the desperate affray. The right and left of both armies were at first more especially engaged, each general attempting to turn and defeat his enemy's left. When the contest was at its height, Napoleon dispatched a strong corps, under Augereau, to attack the Russian centre. A heavy fall of snow had just commenced; and it fell so thick and fast, as quite to obscure the atmosphere. It occasioned Augereau to lose his way. Instead of reaching the centre of the Russians, he penetrated between that position and the right; and was, in consequence, attacked on both flanks, whilst the Russian reserve charged his division in front. The carnage was terrible. The French 24th regiment, 3,600 strong, was annihilated; and Augereau was carried from the field desperately wounded. Napoleon, who had taken his station on the top of a church, where the grapeshot and musket-balls fell like hail around him (and yet he escaped unhurt), saw, at last, the strife between Augereau's corps and the enemy, and that the former was near being overwhelmed. He immediately ordered Murat and Bessières, with the cavalry, to the rescue; and their impetuous charge beat back the Russian cavalry, dispersed the infantry, and caused the artillery-men to abandon their guns. But the Russians were found hard to defeat. They rallied, and again advanced to attack the French positions: like Augereau's corps, however, they were lost in the snow-storm, and found themselves entangled in the churchyard of Eylau. There they were charged by the imperial guard in front, and by Murat's cavalry in the rear: another scene of slaughter ensued, 4,000 of the Russians falling beneath the bayonets and sabres of the French. This did not end the battle. Davoust, having made a considerable detour, debouched on the left flank of the Russians, just as they were joined by the Prussians under Lestocq. The fighting continued here, and in other quarters, till night separated the combatants. If either had the advantage when day went down, it was the Russians, and Napoleon had intended to retire the next day. When the morning of the 9th broke, however, the heights were found to be evacuated by the enemy, who had retired during the night. Then Napoleon changed his tactics: he halted his men, resolved to make Eylau his head-quarters for a few days; and sent home a bulletin to Paris, claiming the victory. The bulletin attributed the triumph of the French arms to the cavalry of Murat, who did not come up till some time after the action had begun. This caused great discontent amongst the marshals; and Augereau and Lannes were disgraced for denying to the brother-in-law of the emperor the credit Napoleon attributed to him, but to which he does not appear to have been entitled.

The slaughter in this battle was great on both sides. The Russian general, who had 70,000 men, exclusive of the Prussians, in the morning, returned the number of his killed at 7,900; of his wounded, at 12,000. Napoleon very much underrated his loss: he gave the number of killed at 1,900; of wounded, 5,700. Impartial and disinterested writers think, from the accounts given by several of his officers, that he must have had quite as many men as the Russians put hors de combat. It is certain that sixteen generals were killed, and twelve imperial eagles taken. The night after the battle was a dreadful one—its silence was broken by the screams of the carrion-birds; and it would be difficult to conceive—they cannot be exaggerated—the sufferings of the wounded, who were exposed to the inclemency of the season, not only for that night, but for some days afterwards. Two days subsequently, we are told that “5,000 wounded Russians still lay on the ground. Bread and spirits were carried to them from time to time; and all that survived were transported to the hospitals, where every provision that had been so elaborately made was brought into requisition. The burial of the dead was a long and arduous task.” All this waste of human life was to obtain power and influence in a country, “all of which,” marshal Lannes told the emperor, “was not worth the loss of the humblest corporal in the army.”

The Russian general retreated upon Königsberg. Napoleon remained eight days at Eylau, and then removed his head-quarters to Osterode, fifty miles to the southward of the scene of the last battle. His friends thought he had better return to Paris, where the true result of the battle of Eylau had become known, notwithstanding the colouring given to it in the bulletins, and had caused a decline in the opinion, and shaken the confidence of the public in Napoleon's “star.” Austria showed symptoms of rejoicing at the event; and Talleyrand had great difficulty in preserving the then existing amicable relations between the two countries. The emperor's officers, also, including those who were always his unhesitating supporters, Murat and Berthier, urged him to abandon the campaign, and recross the Vistula. He was deaf to all remonstrances, and determined to maintain his position. In the crisis, the Poles showed a zeal in his cause, which proved that they were not disposed to abandon one whom they deemed a friend, in his adversity. They were not destitute of alarm at what appeared to be his doubtful position; but they formed and organised a Polish legion, to join his army, which did him good service in all his subsequent vicissitudes. For himself, we are told by his biographers, that “he lived at Osterode, much in the same style as in bivouac; eating, sleeping, and transacting business, all in one apartment. In this small space he had all things under his eye, and completed in one month the business which would have ordinarily occupied three.”

Napoleon remained at Osterode till May; and in that time he did much to put the army in a position to retrieve that prestige of which it might be supposed the drawn battle of Eylau had deprived it. He ordered the conscription of 1808 to be called out, and made great exertions to raise fresh troops in every quarter; while he concentrated those who were already under arms. Mortier was recalled from Pomerania, where he had been carrying on hostilities against the Swedes, whose army he had driven into Stralsund. The troops in Silesia and Holland were ordered to join him; so were those in Italy. A new levy was made in Switzerland; and auxiliaries were demanded from Spain, which were very unwillingly granted. They were sent into Holland and Italy, to replace the troops which had been withdrawn from those countries. By these measures, the emperor had collected, before the end of April, 200,000 men between the Vistula and the Memel. Ere that month closed, he increased the force before Dantzic, by sending there the Saxon troops; and he gave the command to marshal Lefebvre, ordering him to change the investment into a regular siege. The town was vigorously defended by general Kalkreuth, and the Russians sent a corps by sea to make an effort to relieve it. This force attacked the French on the 15th of May, but without effect. After fighting earnestly and with great vigour for some time, it was repulsed; and on the 21st, Kalkreuth capitulated, 800 pieces of cannon, with immense stores, being given up. Thus the great military port of the Baltic was acquired by the French.

As Napoleon did not feel himself sufficiently strong, in May, to recommence hostilities with an assurance of success, he opened negotiations for peace; which were continued as long as it suited him, and then suspended. In June both French and Russians again took the field; the first movement being made by the latter, who attempted the passage of the Passarge, on the 5th, at Spandau, forty-six miles south-west of Königsberg. They were defeated by Bernadotte's corps, that general being severely wounded. The Russians were again defeated on the 10th, at Heilsberg, on the Alle; the main part of their army being opposed to the corps of Soult and Lannes, and Murat's cavalry. The French were the assailants. They attacked the Russians in their intrenchments, who disputed the ground inch by inch, their artillery doing great execution amongst the French; and did not finally retire till the 12th, when both armies marched northwards, in the direction of Königsberg; the French being on the west, and the Russians on the east side of the Alle. The object of the latter was to cover Königsberg; and they made for the bridge across the river at Friedland, on the direct road to the city, from which it is distant twenty-nine miles, in a south-east direction. Marshal Lannes' division, with Nansouty's division of cuirassiers, reached Friedland, which stands on the west side of the Alle, on the night of the 13th of June. When day broke, they found that the whole Russian army had arrived at the opposite side of the river, and were beginning to cross by the wooden bridge. Napoleon was in the rear of Lannes, with Ney's, Mortier's, and Bernadotte's corps, and the horse and foot-guards. Lannes immediately dispatched a courier to inform him of the vicinity of the Russians, and ordered his men not so much to resist the enemy in crossing the river, as to impede their progress when they reached the west bank. Benningsen, supposing that he had only one division of the French army to contend with, had defiled through the town as soon as one portion of his army had crossed the bridge, and brought on an action. The emperor, however, on the arrival of the courier sent by Lannes, pushed his troops rapidly forward, their advance being concealed by a thick wood at the back of the town. He did not suppose that Benningsen would bring his whole army to the west side of the river, and expose them to the chance of a doubtful conflict, with no means of retreat but the narrow wooden bridge: nor would the Russian general have adopted a course so full of hazard, but in his belief in the weakness of the enemy. Napoleon sent Savary to observe the motions of the Russians; with orders to return instantly, and inform him of their position. When the latter presented himself, with the intelligence that the entire Russian army, with the exception of one small division, had passed the Alle, and were forming in front of the town, Napoleon exclaimed—"Well, I am ready now. I have an hour's advantage of them, and will give them battle since they wish it. This is the anniversary of Marengo; and to-day fortune is with me."

The battle that ensued has been vividly described by Savary. Benningsen did not discover the error he had committed till it was too late to retreat. Whilst a part of his troops were bravely fighting with Lannes' division, the main army of the emperor moved from the wood towards the plain, in immense columns, which advanced with rapidity, but with the precision of parade. To receive them, Benningsen formed his men into squares, which mutually flanked and protected each other; but this deprived him of the use of his artillery; and he awaited the destruction which had now become inevitable. Ney made for the bridge, to cut off the Russian retreat; but he was met by a determined resistance—the head of his column was broken; and but for the support of Davoust, he must have retreated. The cannon of the French opened, however, about 5 P.M., upon the squares of the Russians, which "were demolished one after the other. About six, the emperor assailed them with a fire of musketry, which was the finishing blow." Broken, and completely deranged, the routed troops made for the bridge; but this was so completely raked by the French artillery, that it was impossible to cross by that means. "Then they threw themselves pell-mell into the river, without ascertaining whether it was fordable. Numbers, encumbered with all the accoutrements of the Russian soldiers, perished; others discovered a ford to the left. Nothing could now check their flight; and they hurried towards the point of escape in utter disorder, like a flock of sheep." Their loss was immense; nearly 17,000 men were killed, drowned, or wounded; nearly as many were made prisoners; and seventy stand of colours, and eighty pieces of cannon, were taken. The loss of the French was also very great; many generals being killed or wounded.

When the fugitive Russians crossed the river, they joined the division left there in the morning, and which had remained all day spectators of the battle, that had ended so disastrously to their comrades. Having set fire to the bridge, this remnant of the fine army which Benningsen had under his orders in the morning, retreated on Tilsit, a town on the left bank of the Niemen, sixty miles to the north-east of Königsberg. The French bivouacked on the field of battle. "Next morning," says Savary, "the emperor was on his horse, inspecting his troops. The men were sleeping, having suffered immense fatigue; and he would not suffer them to be disturbed." Having taken a cursory inspection of his own bivouac, he "proceeded to the Russian field. There a frightful spectacle presented itself. The order of the Russian squares could be traced by a line of the heaps of slain: and the position of their artillery might be guessed by the dead horses." The sight made even the stern soldier sick of war. "A sovereign," he writes, "ought to have great interests of his subjects at stake to justify such dreadful sacrifices." Seldom, however, have the interests of subjects much connection with war, which is oftener undertaken to advance the ambition, or gratify the passions, of the ruler, than to avert danger from, or to procure benefits for, the ruled. The French army moved in the route of the Russians on the 15th; and, on the 16th, marshal Soult took possession of Königsberg. Frederick William and Alexander were both on their way to Tilsit, where they arrived in safety, and, without stopping, passed over to the right bank of the Niemen—the bridge by which they crossed being burned. Napoleon followed, and, on the 20th of June, the French army reached Tilsit: he himself pushed on before his troops; spurred his horse across the plains that lie between the town and the Niemen; and, when he reached the bank, he paused, to gaze upon that country in which he, some years after, met with such a terrible reverse. What were his thoughts at that moment? On his way to Tilsit, some noble Poles, who had heard of the Russian defeat, met him, and urged upon him the policy, as well as the justice, of proclaiming the independence of their country. Had he done so, his fiat could not have been resisted; but he hesitated; and the next day, a messenger arrived from the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, to propose an armistice. He agreed to grant one; and, on its being intimated to him that Alexander wished for an interview, he also assented to that; and it was arranged that they should meet on a raft, upon the Niemen, on the 25th. The raft was constructed by order of Napoleon. In the centre was a room, decorated with great elegance. It was entered by a door on each side; over which, and on the roof, the eagles of France and Russia were displayed. Napoleon was accompanied by Murat, Berthier, Bessières, Duroc, and Caulaincourt; Alexander by his brother, the grand-duke Constantine, generals Benningsen and Ouvaroff, and the count de Lieven. The interview continued a considerable time; and we are told, that Alexander conciliated Napoleon at the outset, by expressing his resentment against England. He had demanded a larger subsidy than the British government was ready to grant; hence his displeasure.

The result of the interview was an apparently sincere friendship between the two emperors. Alexander, on the 26th, took up his residence at Tilsit. The king of Prussia arrived on the 28th. Napoleon kept Frederick William at a distance; intimating to him, that, if peace were concluded, he would receive nothing except what the intercession of his imperial ally procured for him. The queen of Prussia had several interviews with the emperor, who had sent a gay cortège to conduct her to Tilsit; but he was deaf to all her entreaties to grant liberal terms to her husband; and especially refused to restore Magdeburg, which, as an important point d'appui, and the key of the Elbe, the king was very anxious to recover. Subsequent to the arrival of the sovereigns at Tilsit, festivity and gaiety prevailed amongst their followers, and were shared by the inhabitants of the town. The negotiations for peace were carried on during an interchange of the most friendly demonstrations; and the treaties were signed amidst the acclamations of those who were connected with the proceedings—for all rejoiced at the peace. If Frederick William had consulted his dignity, however, he would rather have abandoned his kingdom than have accepted the terms which were granted to him; and which appeared to be concessions made to the emperor of Russia, and not conditions agreed upon by two independent sovereigns.

The treaty between France and Russia was signed on the 7th; that between France and Prussia on the 9th, of June. The last was the most important. Frederick William gave up all his territories between the Rhine and the Elbe. He agreed that Westphalia (situated between the Rhine and the Weser), Lower Saxony and the Netherlands, should be formed into a kingdom for Jerome Bonaparte; that nearly the whole of Prussian Poland, made a duchy, and called the duchy of Warsaw, should be ceded to the king of Saxony; that military roads should be formed through Prussia, to afford the means of communication between Saxony and the newly-created duchy; and that the territory still remaining to Prussia, should be closed against the commerce and navigation of England. The emperor of France, on his part, agreed to evacuate those provinces by the 1st of October, provided Prussia had paid all the contributions levied upon her; the total of which was 513,744,410 francs, or £20,551,776.

The treaty with Russia provided, that out of consideration to the emperor, Old Prussia, Pomerania, Brandenburg, and Upper and Lower Silesia, should be restored to Prussia. That Russian Poland should continue under the rule of the czar—a portion of Prussian Poland, not included in the duchy of Warsaw, being added. That Dantzic, and a territory around it of two miles' radius, should be independent, under the protection of Prussia and Saxony; but that a French garrison should occupy the town. The emperor recognised the right of France to Hanover; acknowledged Joseph, Louis, and Jerome Bonaparte, as kings of Naples, Holland, and Westphalia; recognised the Confederation of the Rhine; and agreed to surrender Corfu to France. Napoleon agreed that the dukes of Saxe-Cobourg, Oldenburg, and Mecklenburg-Schwerin, all allied to the royal family of Russia, should retain possession of their territories; and Alexander undertook to mediate between France and England; and if the mediation were unsuccessful, to enforce the "continental system" of Napoleon throughout his empire. Napoleon, on his part, undertook the office of mediator between Russia and Turkey. There were secret articles to this treaty, of much greater importance than those which were published. They were directed to the extension of the power of Russia and France upon the continent; to the exclusion of Great Britain from all communication with the continental powers; to the restriction of her commerce; and to the suppression of her maritime supremacy. To accomplish these objects, Russia was to extend her dominion in the East; whilst France was not merely to subject Portugal and Spain to her influence, but to bring them under her rule; and, as was stated in the speech of George III., at the opening of parliament on the 21st of January, 1808, to combine all the powers of the continent "in one general confederacy, to be directed either to the entire subjugation of England, or to the imposing upon his majesty an ignominious peace. For this purpose, it was determined to force into hostility against England, states which had hitherto been allowed by France to maintain or to purchase their neutrality; and to bring to bear upon different points of his majesty's dominions, the whole naval force of Europe, and specifically the fleets of Denmark and Portugal." These articles were made known to the British government by the agency of the count d'Antraigues; and they induced that government to take steps which, at the time, exposed them to great obloquy, because they could not give up their authority for ascribing such intentions to Bonaparte and his ally; and many persons disbelieved that they had ever been entertained.

Neither of the emperors who signed the treaty of Tilsit had faith in the other. Napoleon wanted to put an end to the war, because he found it absolutely necessary that he should return to France; but he had no confidence in the honesty of Alexander. "He is fair and false as a Greek," was his description of him, after the treaty had been signed. If the Russian colonel Bouterlin is to be believed, that character was not very misapprehensive. That officer says, in his Military History of the Campaign in Russia—"The emperor Alexander was fully aware of the spirit and tendency of the clauses of the treaty of Tilsit; but the unhappy circumstances in which Europe was placed at the period of his signing it, had imposed upon him the necessity of averting the war upon any terms. Above all, it was an object of paramount importance to gain the requisite time for preparing to engage, with adequate means, in the struggle which, it was clear, must be resumed at a future day." Napoleon's ambition, his own disregard of treaties, and violations of international law—his absorption of territories into the empire of France, to which he had not the slightest claim—do not entitle him to any commiseration when he was made the victim of bad faith; but that does not render the want of honour less censurable in others who practised it.

As soon as possible after the treaty of Tilsit was signed, Alexander departed for St. Petersburg, where Savary was sent, temporarily, as the French minister, with instructions to do all in his power to conciliate both emperor and people: he was "never to speak of war, but studiously to avoid everything which could give offence." Napoleon took leave of the king of Prussia shortly after Alexander had left Tilsit, and departed for Paris. He arrived there on the 16th of August, and was received by the people and the senate with enthusiastic demonstrations; and a bronze column in the Place Vendôme, formed of cannon taken from the enemy, was soon after inaugurated to commemorate his victories. On his arrival in Paris he opened the session of the legislative body, with a speech, in which he depicted the events of the war, and the then condition of France. The empire, at that time, certainly presented the appearance of great prosperity. The public finances were in a better state than at any time since the accession of Napoleon to supreme power. Manufactures were improving, trade was brisk, and the contributions levied on Prussia made money plentiful. Neither amongst the French people nor their legislators, was there any disposition, therefore, to offer opposition to the emperor. The principal measure of the session was the adoption of the commercial code, in which all the provisions of mercantile law were embodied; and the sittings were closed on the 18th of September. On that day the members of the legislative body and the tribunate were informed, that, by a senatus consulte, passed on the 14th of August, but then heard of for the first time, the latter body was abolished; and it was ordered, that three committees—of administration, of legislation, and of finance, taken from the legislative body—should, for the future, discuss the projects of law instead of the tribunate. This was an arbitrary act; but Napoleon, when at St. Helena, justified it by saying, that the “tribunate was absolutely useless, while it costs nearly half a million; he therefore suppressed it. He was well aware that an outcry would be raised against the violation of the law; but he was strong; he possessed the full confidence of the people; and he did everything for the best.” Before the year closed, he displayed some additional traits of his domestic policy, in regulations for the press and the courts of judicature. On the 27th of September an imperial decree appeared, enacting, that no book should be published without having received the sanction of the censors of the press. Another decree, of the 12th of October, ordained that the judges’ commissions for life should not be delivered to them till after five years’ service, to the satisfaction of the emperor.

Whilst the legislature was in session, constitutions, of anything but a democratic character, framed by Napoleon and Talleyrand, were given to the duchy of Warsaw and the kingdom of Westphalia; the former of which was declared to be hereditary in the family of the king of Saxony, the latter in that of Jerome Bonaparte. Fresh troops were sent into the territories of the Rhenish confederation and the Hanse Towns, where military contributions were exacted, and the French “continental system” was enforced. The same system was also introduced into Prussia, whose king was compelled to declare war against Great Britain: but his majesty directed himself to pursuits calculated to improve the fortunes of his country; and, under the ministry of baron Stein—a member of an old noble family of the empire—those measures were originated, which ultimately enabled Prussia to take her former place among the monarchies of Europe, and contributed, in no small degree, to the downfall of the oppressor. Though the influence of Napoleon soon procured the exile of Stein, he still continued to direct the Prussian councils; and to him, under Providence, must much of the subsequent good fortunes of that country be attributed.*

The treaty of Tilsit left only two powers on the continent that did not fully enter into the views of Napoleon—Sweden and Portugal. The former refused to accede to the treaty, and attempted to defend Pomerania. The king found it impossible, however, to withstand the power of France; and having succeeded, on the 19th and 20th of August, in withdrawing his troops from Stralsund, he retired into Sweden, leaving Swedish Pomerania in the hands of the French. The neighbouring power, Denmark, though nominally neutral, was really doing all she could to promote French interests, and to exclude England from the Baltic, unless the government would adopt the French views with respect to neutral commerce. There was a large fleet in the harbour of Copenhagen; which, in pursuance of the secret articles of Tilsit, would inevitably come into the hands of France, to be employed against England. This the English government determined to prevent. A fleet of twenty-seven ships of the line, and a land force of 20,000 men, were dispatched to Copenhagen, under the command of admiral Gambier and lord Cathcart. On the arrival of this armament off the Danish capital, a demand was made on the government, to send their fleet to British ports till the conclusion of the war with France, when it should be restored, in good condition; and, during the war, England would protect the neutrality of Denmark. The proposal was refused; and Copenhagen was, in consequence, bombarded on the 7th, 8th, and 9th of September. On the 10th, the fleet was given up, and taken to England; and on the 16th of October, a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, was concluded between Denmark and France: the latter, at the same time, declared war against England, and gave her open adhesion to the “continental system.”

The total number of vessels surrendered by this capitulation was sixty-nine; viz., twenty ships of the line, eighteen frigates, six brigs, and twenty-five gun-boats; of which two ships of the line and three frigates were destroyed, as not being worth the removal. The number of cannon taken was 3,500. At the period, this act of spoliation was universally condemned; everywhere the words of Napoleon, that “blood and fire had made the English masters of Copenhagen,” were re-echoed; and the only defenders of the expedition were the members of the British government; for they only knew the causes which led to, and, in their eyes, justified it. It is now known, that, at the same time, the demands which, as we shall soon notice, were made on Portugal, similar ones were sent to Copenhagen; and Napoleon had no doubt that they would have been complied with. It is certain that the Danish fleet must have fallen into the hands of the emperor, or into those of England: the act of the latter was undoubtedly one of self-defence, and self-defence solely; but it is to be regretted that the government did not wait for overt acts on the part of Denmark, and then declare war, before the fleet had been seized. If that fleet remained at Copenhagen, it could not have injured English commerce; and the English fleet could have made lawful prize of it, had it left the harbour. Its seizure, however, was a terrible annoyance to the French emperor. Fouché says,* that the success of this attack "was the first derangement of the secret articles of the treaty of Tilsit, in virtue of which the navy of Denmark was to have been put at the disposal of France. Since the catastrophe of Paul," he adds, "I had never seen Napoleon in such a transport of rage. That which struck him most in this vigorous coup-de-main, was the promptitude and resolution of the English minister."

* At this time, those secret societies were established in Germany, known as the Tugendbund, which contributed so much to rouse, throughout the whole of that country, a spirit of resistance against France.

As very various opinions have been expressed as to the views of Napoleon with respect to England, we may be excused for endeavouring to show what those views really were. General Jomini, who had the best means for acquiring a knowledge of his designs and policy, in his Vie de Napoleon, represents him as thus developing what were his plans for the future, after the treaty of Tilsit had been signed. "After Russia had joined my alliance," the general reports him as saying, "Prussia, as a matter of course, followed her example. Portugal, Sweden, and the pope alone required to be gained over; for we were well aware that Denmark would hasten to throw herself into our arms. If England refused the proffered mediation of Russia, the whole maritime forces of the continent were to be employed against her, and they could muster 180 ships of the line.† In a few years, this force could be raised to 250. With the aid of such a fleet, and my immense flotilla, it was by no means impossible to lead a European army to London. One hundred ships of the line, employed against her colonies in the two hemispheres, would have sufficed to draw off a large portion of the British navy; while eighty more, assembled in the Channel, would have sufficed to assure the passage of the flotilla, and avenge the outraged rights of nations. Such was, at bottom, my plan, which only failed of success from the faults committed in the Spanish war;" and the failure of the attempts to get possession of the fleets of Denmark and Portugal.

Russia made its offer of mediation to the court of England early in August. Mr. Canning, in reply, declared that his sovereign was perfectly ready to treat on equitable terms; but he required, as a preliminary, a frank communication of the secret articles agreed upon at Tilsit. After the expedition to Zealand became known, and the Russian ambassador, baron Budberg, earnestly remonstrated against that step, as a violation of the law of nations, Mr. Canning justified it by the knowledge which the British government possessed of those secret articles; and again called upon Russia to disclose them. The demand was evaded; and when the surrender of the Danish fleet was known, the negotiations were broken off. Russia was, however, willing to remain neutral herself, and to secure the neutrality of Denmark, on an engagement, from the British government, to restore the captured fleet at the conclusion of the war. A peremptory demand from Napoleon, for the closing of the Russian ports against British ships, in pursuance of the secret articles, caused Alexander to waver in his policy; but only for a short time. Unable to resist the French emperor, he broke off all relations with the British ambassador, required his immediate departure from St. Petersburg, and reasserted the principles of the armed neutrality, annulling all conventions inconsistent with its spirit. The manifesto against England was dated the 31st of October; and the emperor made the attack on Copenhagen one of his reasons for taking a decided part against that country. Mr. Canning, by a manifesto of the 18th of December, justified the conduct of Great Britain, which was the result of the "secret conditions imposed upon Russia in the conferences of Tilsit." And that those conditions were to be carried out against neutral powers, Russia herself soon made abundantly manifest. A summons was sent to Sweden to join the league of France and Russia; and, on the refusal of the king, Alexander ordered an army into Finland, which took possession of that country in the winter of 1807—war not being declared till the following spring. This was as flagrant a violation of international law, as the seizure of the fleet at Copenhagen would have been had there been no extenuating circumstances connected with the latter.

Napoleon, on his part, lost no time in acting upon the secret articles of the treaty. As early as the 12th of August, a note was delivered to the prince-regent of Portugal, by the French chargé d'affaires at Lisbon, in which the following demands were made upon his royal highness. 1st. That the English ambassador should be dismissed, and the Portuguese ambassador recalled from London. 2nd. That all the English residing in Portugal should be detained. 3rd. That all English merchandise in Portuguese ports or warehouses, should be confiscated. 4th. That those ports should be closed against English vessels. 5th. That his fleet should be united to those of France and the other continental powers, to act against England. If these demands were not complied with by the 1st of September, his royal highness was informed that it would be considered as a refusal to withdraw from the influence of England, and embrace the continental system: as a consequence, the chargé d'affaires would demand his passports and leave Lisbon; and war would be declared on the part of France. At the same time, a similar note was delivered by the Spanish ambassador; and these diplomatic missives were supported by the assembling of 25,000 French troops at Bayonne; to which Napoleon gave the name of "The Army of Observation of the Gironde."

The court of Lisbon had some difficulty in determining how to meet this insolent demand, as there were three parties in the country: one for refusing the French demands, and sending the chargé d'affaires his passports; another for submission; and a third, for shutting the ports to English vessels, if necessary, but to rouse the people to defend their country—to assert the national independence; and to be neither English nor French, but Portuguese. The regent, after consulting with the English minister, resolved, with the court, to retire to Brazil; and, to gain time, he returned for answer, that "to gratify his powerful allies—the emperor of France, and the king of Spain—he was ready to exclude the ships of Great Britain from his ports; but that the moderation of his government, and his religious principles, would not suffer him to seize upon the persons and property of British residents in Portugal." Neither France nor Spain were satisfied with this half measure; but some time was lost in the interchange of messages, and the ambassadors of those powers did not leave Lisbon till the 30th of September.

On the 18th of October, the French army crossed the Bidassoa; and, on the 22nd, the prince-regent issued a decree, shutting his ports against the ships and commerce of Britain; but this further compliance with the demands of the emperor, had no effect in arresting the measures Napoleon had determined upon. On the 27th, a secret treaty was concluded at Fontainebleau, between France and Spain; by which Portugal was divided into three portions: one, to be called Northern Lusitania, was to be given to the young king of Etruria, in exchange for his Italian dominions, which Napoleon conceived ought to be united to the kingdom of Italy. The second was to be appropriated to Godoy, the prince of Peace, with the title of the duke of Algarves. The commander-in-chief of the French troops was to hold the third, as a deposit, till a general peace was concluded. On the 8th of November, the prince-regent, of course quite ignorant of this division of his territory, went a step further than he had done on the 22nd of October; for he signed an order for the sequestration of all British property, and the detention of all British subjects—of whom, by that time, there were not many in Portugal. Still the French advanced. On the 19th of November, Junot, at the head of his troops, chiefly raw recruits, crossed the frontiers of Portugal, and marched into the interior. They encountered bad weather on their route: having few stores, they plundered every cottage that fell in their way; discipline was lost; and before they reached Abrantes, they were so demoralised that they might easily have been destroyed. They entered that town on the 24th; and from thence Junot dispatched a courier to Lisbon, to announce his approach to the capital, where, he said, he should be in four days. Immediately all was preparation at the palace for the departure of the court. The prince-regent (having nominated a council of regency to administer the government) and the royal family, with their treasures, were embarked, together with their suite, members of the nobility, and others—in all, about 15,000 persons, who conveyed with them great wealth, taking, it was computed, about half the current coin of the realm. The embarkation took place under the protection of an English squadron, which, at the request of the prince-regent, had been sent for that purpose, notwithstanding his humiliating concessions to France. One part of the squadron escorted the royal family to the Brazils; the other blockaded the Tagus. The emigrants were conveyed across the Atlantic in eight large vessels of war, three frigates, and a great many merchant ships. This fleet left the river on the 29th of November; and, on the 30th, Junot, with his advanced guard of 1,500 men, entered Lisbon. He had been joined, on his march, by several Spanish corps; and Portugal was occupied by the troops of the two nations. The Moniteur then announced, that the "house of Braganza had ceased to reign."

Whilst these demonstrations against the independence of Portugal were taking place, Austria, by a treaty signed at Fontainebleau on the 7th of October, acceded to the "continental system," and pledged herself to support the policy of France. The manifesto of Russia issued shortly after, and the steps taken against Portugal, left England without one friend on the continent; from which, by the system inaugurated by Napoleon, both her people and her manufactures were excluded. This state of things, in the opinion of the government at London, rendered it necessary that some more decided measures should be adopted against the powers which had acceded to the "continental system," than had hitherto been devised. An order of council had been issued, on the 7th of January, 1807, prohibiting the vessels of neutral powers from trading between ports from which the British flag was excluded; and decreeing, that vessels persisting in such traffic after being warned, should be declared good prize. After the further accessions to the "continental system," on the 11th of November, another order in council was issued, declaring France, and all the countries under her influence, or in alliance with her, in a state of blockade.

All ships and vessels trading between neutral and hostile ports were declared liable to seizure; and all her majesty's cruisers were instructed to carry out this order in its fullest sense, without respect to persons. When this order in council appeared, Napoleon was in Italy; and he met it by the "Milan decree" of the 17th of December. The "right of search," for the purpose of ascertaining whether belligerent property or contraband of war was on board neutral ships, had never been departed from by England. The Milan decree condemned the exercise of this right; and declared, that every vessel, whatever nation it belonged to, which had been searched by an English cruiser, or had performed a voyage to England, or paid a duty to the English government, was thereby denationalised, lost the protection of its flag, and was to be considered as English property; that all such vessels were good and lawful prizes; that the British islands were in a state of blockade by sea and land; and that any vessel clearing out from, or attempting to enter, the ports of England, might be lawfully captured. This decree was to be in force while England maintained the right of search.

Napoleon's visit to Italy was connected in part with public, and in part with his own personal, affairs. Before he left Paris, he had carried out those clauses of the treaty of Tilsit, by which a kingdom was created, for his brother Jerome. Besides Westphalia, part of Hesse-Cassel, of Brunswick, and of Hanover, were included in the new regality; and, on the 1st of December, Jerome, then a mere youth, took possession of the throne, when the new constitution was promulgated. When in Italy, the emperor endeavoured to induce his brother Lucien to abandon his wife; the reward offered being the crown of that part of Portugal which was to be left in the hands of the French commander-in-chief. Lucien had, early in life, married a very amiable person, who died while Napoleon held the consular dignity. Subsequently, he married the widow of an agent de change, named Joubert—to the great displeasure of his brother, who would never acknowledge the lady as his sister-in-law. It was from her that the emperor wished Lucien to be divorced; and he proposed to him, not only that he should himself be raised to the royal dignity, but that his eldest daughter, by his first wife, should be married to Ferdinand, prince of the Asturias, heir to the crown of Spain; who had already applied to him for protection against his father, Charles IV. Lucien was very anxious to be reconciled to his brother; but to his honour be it recorded, neither the prospect of a crown for himself, nor that of one for his daughter, could induce him to abandon his wife.*

While in Italy, the emperor visited not only Milan, but Naples (where he held long conferences with his brother Joseph), Mantua, and Venice. At Milan, besides the famous decree, he published a constitutional statute, by which he adopted Eugene Beauharnais as a son, and declared him his successor in the kingdom of Italy, in default of a son from his own loins. He also induced the queen-regent of Etruria to announce to the Etrurians, that her son was called upon to govern the people of Portugal; and that they were to transfer their allegiance to the emperor Napoleon, now their sovereign. Thus the emperor obtained Etruria, which was added to his kingdom of Italy; but "Northern Lusitania" never came into the possession of the youthful sovereign, who was despoiled of one crown before another was prepared for him. When the emperor arrived at Venice, the Venetians received him cordially; and were especially pleased with a decree converting their port into a great naval arsenal. Another decree, ordering a canal to be cut to unite the Po with the Mediterranean, was also well received. Having arranged all his Italian affairs, Napoleon returned to Paris on the 1st of January, 1808, meditating designs against Spain, which he shortly began to carry into execution.

* A letter addressed to Lucien about this time, by his sister Eliza, shows how the relatives of Napoleon thought themselves bound to obey him. "Proposals are made to you," she said, "which you should have accepted a year ago, for the sake of your children and your wife, but which now you reject. Don't you see, my dear brother, that the only way to prevent adoptions, is to provide his majesty with relations of his own, of whom he can dispose. In remaining near Napoleon, or accepting a throne at his hands, you will make yourself useful to him." * * * "We cannot deal with the master of the world as if we were his equals. Nature made us all the children of the same father; but his prodigious exploits have made us his subjects. Sovereigns as we are, we owe everything to him. There is a noble pride in this confession; and I think our sole glory ought to be, to prove by the manner in which we govern, that we are worthy of him, and of our race."—Mémoires et Correspondance du Roi Joseph.

CHAPTER X.

CREATION OF TITLES OF HONOUR; THE IMPERIAL CATECHISM; ANNEXATION OF THE TERRITORY OF THE POPE TO FRANCE; JUNOT'S PROGRESS IN PORTUGAL; INVASION OF SPAIN; THE SPANISH ROYAL FAMILY AND THE PRINCE OF PEACE; ARREST OF FERDINAND; ABDICATION OF CHARLES IV.; THE ROYAL FAMILY OF SPAIN, AND NAPOLEON AT BAYONNE; SURRENDER OF THE CROWN OF SPAIN TO THE EMPEROR; JOSEPH BONAPARTE DECLARED KING OF SPAIN, AND MURAT KING OF NAPLES; INSURRECTION IN SPAIN; BRITISH EXPEDITION TO PORTUGAL; BATTLE OF VIMIERA, AND CONVENTION OF CINTRA; NAPOLEON AT PARIS; HIS INTERVIEW WITH THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER AT ERFURTH; HIS CAMPAIGN IN SPAIN; THE BATTLE OF CORUNNA.

NAPOLEON'S return to France was the signal for renewed demonstrations of attachment on the part of the senate and of the people. He had scarcely arrived in Paris, ere he sent a message to the former, requiring the levy of 80,000 conscripts, from those who would become liable in 1809; and, in the budget for the year, out of an estimated expenditure of 730,000,000 francs, no less than 453,729,000 francs were appropriated to the army and marine. The legislative measures, this year, were not of much importance; but, in the midst of the complications arising out of the Spanish and Portuguese questions, Napoleon turned his attention to a measure he had in view from his first accession to power as consul—namely, the re-establishment of an hereditary aristocracy. He was vehemently opposed in his efforts to carry this measure into effect, by his more democratic adherents; and it was only by great perseverance that he succeeded in establishing the Legion of Honour, which, although it conferred no hereditary rank, was still a step towards the revival of nobility. The next advance was, the bestowing the titles of prince and duke upon his great officers, civil and military; upon one of whom, Lefebvre, he conferred, on May 28th, 1807, the title of duke of Dantzic, to descend to his son. At length, on the 1st of March, 1808, he issued a senatus consulte, creating the hereditary titles of prince, duke, count, baron, and chevalier. The emperor was to have the power of bestowing these titles upon those whom he thought worthy; and the persons thus ennobled were authorised to entail a certain part of their income, under the term of a majorat, upon the successors to their honours. The titles formerly created were declared hereditary; and many were found eager to accept the new ones. Sir James Macintosh says—"Napoleon's nobility was composed of a revolutionary aristocracy, with some of the ancient noblesse, compelled to lend lustre to it by accepting titles inferior to their own; with many lawyers, men of letters, merchants, &c., whom the ancient system of the French monarchy had formerly excluded from such distinction." A large proportion of his new nobles were soldiers of fortune; and, as most of them were destitute of property, rich endowments were attached to the titles, drawn from the revenues of those countries which had been conquered by French arms, and were occupied by French troops. No fewer than sixty-six of his officers were quartered upon Hanover. Their endowments, varying from 140,000 francs to 10,000, amounted, in the whole, to 2,259,000 francs, or £91,000 per annum. The ardent republicans who remained (and they were not very numerous), were still hostile to these violations of their creed; but their murmurings were very little heeded in the general satisfaction, which the victories of the armies, and the revived prosperity of the country, produced. Though external commerce was suspended, we are told that "there was an extraordinary degree of vigour in domestic industry." The internal trade of the empire was brisk; the manufacturing cities were full of active employment; and the emperor set on foot, and encouraged, many works of internal improvement. The contributions levied on foreign countries, great part of which were brought to, and expended in, France, contributed to this improvement and prosperity, and caused the burthens of war, for a time, to be little felt by the great bulk of the people.

One striking feature in French society at this period, was the eagerness with which all classes—even the old noblesse, with a few honourable exceptions—sought for public employment. From the emperor down to the humblest prefect, every one who had offices to bestow, was inundated with applications. All seemed to think it the highest object of ambition to serve the imperial government; and some of the most furious of the Jacobins became its supporters through the press. We again quote Sir James Macintosh, who remarks, that "all the terrorists took refuge under Bonaparte's authority. The more base accepted clandestine pensions or insignificant places. Barrère wrote slavish paragraphs at Paris; Tallien was provided for by an obscure consulship in Spain; Fouché, one of the most atrocious of the terrorists, had been gradually formed into a good administrator under a civilised despotism." When the old democrats set the example, no wonder, as Sir A. Alison observes, that "the young men, who had grown up to manhood amid the blaze of Napoleon's glory—the immense mass who looked to advancement in life, and saw no hope of attaining it but in the favour of government—rushed into the same career.” Napoleon himself—in whose hands every superior appointment, naval, military, legal, or civil, was vested, and who, therefore, well knew how general was the desire to hold them—excused that mania for becoming government employés, which possessed all classes, from “the misfortunes and convulsions of the revolution. Every one,” he said to Las Casas, “was displaced; every one felt himself under the necessity of seating himself again; and it was in order to aid that feeling, and give way to that universal necessity, that I felt the propriety of endowing all the principal offices with so much riches, power, and consideration.”

At this time Napoleon issued an “imperial catechism,” in which the duties of Christians to their governors were inculcated. The following questions and answers are a specimen of the lessons taught, by this catechism, to the rising generation of Frenchmen:—“Q. Are there not particular reasons which ought to attach us more strongly to Napoleon I., our emperor?—A. Yes; for it is he whom God has raised up, in the most difficult circumstances, to re-establish the public worship of the holy religion of our fathers, and to be the protector of it: he has restored and preserved public order by his profound and active wisdom: he defends the state by his potent arm: he is become the anointed of the Lord, by the consecration which he has received from the sovereign pontiff, the head of the universal church.—Q. What ought we to think of those who should fail in their duty towards our emperor?—A. According to the apostle St. Paul, they would be resisting the order established by God himself, and would render themselves worthy of eternal damnation.” Whilst the archbishops and bishops were employed in introducing this catechism into all schools and families, and praising and recommending it in their mandatory letters, the emperor was treating the pope with great harshness, because he would not declare war against England. The reply of the pope to Napoleon’s demand, that he should join France against the “detested islanders,” was, that being a sovereign of peace, he could not declare war against any christian power. Napoleon rejoined, that he was, as successor of Charlemagne, emperor of the west, king of Italy, and suzerain of the pope: that the grants of Charlemagne to the holy see had been made in order that the church might defend itself against heretics, which the English were; and that if the pope would not comply with the provisions of the grants, he (Napoleon) would resume them. At the commencement of the negotiations in February, a French force, under general Miollis, entered Rome, and occupied the castle of St. Angelo. The general took the papal troops under his command; and the pope, in fact, was deprived of all temporal power. But, as his holiness remained firm against all the arguments and threats (for both were employed) which were used to induce him to declare war against England, the emperor, on the 2nd of April, issued a decree by which the provinces of Ancona, Urbino, Macerata, and Camerino, appendages of the papacy since the days of Charlemagne, were declared no longer to be under the authority of the pontiff, but to be part and parcel of the kingdom of Italy. The pope protested against this spoliation in vain; and it was followed by a decree of the senate, issued on the 8th of May, formally carrying out the arrangements previously made in Italy, and uniting Parma, Placentia, and Tuscany to the French empire. In another quarter, Flushing, at the mouth of the Scheldt; with Kehl, Wesel, and Cassel, all on the right bank of the Rhine, were, about the same time, in a similar manner, declared to be integral portions of the dominions of Napoleon.

Contemporaneously with the measures he was adopting at home and in Italy, the emperor, through his diplomatists and his army, was carrying out his views with respect to the Iberian peninsula. Junot, as we have already stated, on the 30th of November, 1807—the 167th anniversary of the day on which the Portuguese overthrew the tyranny of the Spaniards—with a few enfeebled troops, took possession of Lisbon; some Spanish troops having, at the same time, entered Montejo, whilst other detached corps established themselves at Elvas and Oporto. The regency left in Lisbon, though they could easily have annihilated the troops who came with Junot, offered no resistance, as they knew more were on the march; and, on the 14th of December, 6,000 arrived. The same day, whilst a salute was fired from the Moorish fort, the inhabitants saw the flag of Portugal torn down, and replaced by the tricolour of France. Then the cry of “Portugal for ever!—death to the French!” was raised, but in vain. The people had neither arms nor leaders, and were constrained to submit. The first steps taken were to introduce two or three Frenchmen into the regency; then a forced loan of about £200,000 was exacted of the merchants; next, all English goods were confiscated; and Junot occupied himself in fitting-out a small squadron in the harbour, to be directed, it was understood, against the English. Fresh troops continued to arrive during the month of January, 1808; and the Spanish officers in Oporto and the Alentejo, acting upon the treaty of Fontainebleau, began to levy the revenues of those districts in the name of the king of Spain. By the 1st of February, however, Junot had taken all his measures, and arranged his plans, so that he apprehended no danger from any resistance which either Portugal or Spain could offer. On that day the real designs of the French were made apparent. The French general went in state to the palace of the Inquisition, where the regency were assembled; and, having first read it to that body, he issued a proclamation to the people, couched in the following terms:—

“Inhabitants of Portugal! your interests have engaged the attention of the emperor: it is time that all uncertainty as to your fate should cease. The fate of Portugal is fixed, and its future prosperity secured, by its being taken under the all-powerful protection of Napoleon the great. The prince of Brazil, by abandoning Portugal, has renounced all his rights to the sovereignty of that kingdom. The house of Braganza has ceased to reign in Portugal. The emperor Napoleon has determined that that beautiful country, governed over the whole extent in his name, shall be administered by the general-in-chief of his army.”

This proclamation was followed by the issue of orders for a large body of the Portuguese troops to be marched out of the Peninsula; by the imposition of a contribution of 100,000,000 francs upon the Portuguese, for the support of the French army of occupation; by the substitution of the arms of France for those of Portugal, on all public offices and buildings; and of the Code Napoleon for the Portuguese laws; and the administration of justice in the name of the emperor, instead of that of the king; by the collection of the revenue by French authorities; and by the division of the kingdom into four departments, under French officials. These measures filled the country with sorrow and despair. The peasants neglected their customary occupations: the soldiers, where not prevented by a superior force of French troops, disbanded themselves and returned to their homes, or took to the mountains and became robbers. The higher classes fled from Lisbon; and very soon the entire country presented a scene of anarchy and confusion. The Portuguese were everywhere insubordinate, and the French soldiers little more than common plunderers. Junot set them the example. He collected from the royal palaces and the churches, their most valuable articles of plate and furniture, and any specimens of vertu or the fine arts which were displayed in those edifices, and appropriated them to himself. Of the portion of the Portuguese army which was ordered to France, 9,000 strong, 5,000 deserted: the other 4,000 were drafted into a Portuguese battalion; and having taken an oath to the emperor, they observed it with fidelity to the end of the war—never being called upon to serve in their own country or in Spain. The remains of the army were soon entirely dispersed.

While Junot was advancing upon Lisbon, in November, 1807, a strong force, under Dupont, crossed the Pyrenees, and occupied, as friends, Salamanca and Valladolid: the general established his head-quarters at the latter place, early in January, 1808. Another army, comprising 25,000 foot, 3,000 cavalry, and forty pieces of cannon, under Moncey, followed, defiling towards the Ebro. A third, consisting of 12,000 infantry, 2,000 cavalry, and twenty cannon, commanded by Duhesme, crossed the Pyrenees at their eastern extremity, entered Catalonia, and took the road to Barcelona. These different armies occupied, before the commencement of March, San Sebastian, Pampeluna, Figueras, and Barcelona. All those important places were in the hands of governors quite incompetent to contend against the clever officers the emperor sent against them; and the garrisons are said to have been composed chiefly of invalids. Thus no resistance was made to the supposed “friends” of Spain; who obtained possession, without any difficulty, of the entire line of defence which the Spaniards had raised along the Pyrenees purposely to prevent a French invasion. The usual pretence was put forward for these aggressive movements—the necessity of guarding against the ambitious policy of England. “There is a necessity for having considerable forces on all points exposed to attack,” said M. Champagny (who had succeeded Talleyrand as minister of war, on the appointment of the latter to be vice grand elector), in a report, dated January 20th, 1808. “It is not enough to have an army in Portugal; Spain is in alarm for Cadiz; Ceuta is menaced; the English have disembarked many troops in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar; they have directed to that quarter those which have been recalled from the Levant, or withdrawn from Sicily. The vigilance of their cruisers on the Spanish coast is hourly increasing; they seem disposed to revenge themselves on that kingdom for the reverses they have experienced in the colonies. The whole Peninsula, therefore, in an especial manner, calls for the attention of his majesty.” How his majesty did attend to it, will shortly be seen.

The dissensions which prevailed in the royal family of Spain, aided the designs of Napoleon. The king, Charles IV., possessed of talents, which, if united to an energetic disposition, and properly directed, would have made him an excellent sovereign, was so indolent, so fond of that tranquillity which kings are seldom fated to enjoy, and so averse to assume the cares and responsibilities of his high position, that the government had fallen entirely into the hands of the queen, and her chief adviser, Don Manuel Godoy. This minister—descended from a family formerly noble, but which had sunk into obscurity—was born at Badajoz, in 1767. He entered the army, and, when a private in the body-guard of the king, he first attracted, about 1793, the attention of the queen by his performance on the lute. He became an especial favourite with her majesty, and was rapidly promoted from office to office. The king was no less partial to him than her majesty: by the express wish of Charles, he married the daughter of his brother, Don Louis; and at the conclusion of the treaty of Bâle, in 1795, he obtained that title by which he is best known, of prince of Peace. Objectionable as were the means by which he rose to power, and although, as might be expected under such a minister, corruption prevailed in every branch of the administration, it is due to him to say, that his ministry was stained by no acts of cruelty, and that he did much to develop the resources, promote the prosperity, and stimulate the progress of education in Spain.

As might be expected, there was no great friendship between Ferdinand, prince of Asturias, the heir-apparent to the Spanish crown, and the prince of Peace. The friends of the former—of whom the principal were the canon Escóiquiz and the duke del Infantado—were anxious to emancipate him from the control of the minister; and to do this, they opened a communication with Napoleon, who, in July, 1807, sent M. Beauharnais, a relation of the empress, as his ambassador to Madrid, to concert measures with those eminent persons for that purpose. After some interviews between them, it was proposed that Ferdinand (whose wife, a member of the Neapolitan house of Bourbon, died in May, 1806) should marry a member of the house of Bonaparte. At first, this was thrown out merely as a suggestion by the canon or the duke; but as Beauharnais required a specific guarantee on the subject, prince Ferdinand, on the 11th of October, addressed an extraordinary letter to the emperor. In this document, Napoleon was styled “a hero who eclipsed all who had preceded him; and who had been sent by Providence, to save Europe from the total subversion which threatened her.” Ferdinand, who described his heart as “overflowing with admiration and the most sincere friendship” for the emperor, in “the hope of finding the most powerful protection in his magnanimous generosity,” said, he had determined to pour his heartfelt sentiments into the imperial bosom, and regretted the “great misfortune which compelled him to conceal, as a crime, an action so just and praiseworthy.” He alluded to his royal father as the victim of deception. If he only knew the character of his imperial majesty, “with what ardour would he not wish to strengthen the ties that should unite the two houses. And what means were more proper for that, than” the writer’s “seeking the honour of allying himself to a princess of Napoleon’s august family?” His “imperial majesty would always find in him a son the most devoted and grateful.” He implored his majesty, therefore, “not only to confer on him the honour of an alliance with his family, but to smooth all the difficulties, and remove all the obstacles, which might be opposed to the object of his wishes.” The effort, on the part of the emperor, was said to be “the more necessary, as the prince was incapable of making the smallest exertion on his own part, as it would, perhaps, be represented as an insult to the royal authority of his father. All that he could do was, to refuse, as he engaged to do with invincible constancy, any proposal for an alliance which had not the consent of the emperor, to whom the prince looked, exclusively, for the choice of his future queen.”

No answer was returned to this letter; but it appears, as we have already stated, that the emperor contemplated the union of the prince of Asturias with the daughter of his brother Lucien. Communications, however, received from Signor Isquierdo, an agent at Paris of the prince of Peace, to the effect that some important negotiation was going on between the prince of Asturias and the emperor, caused the former to be narrowly watched, and ultimately led to his arrest, and the seizure of all his papers. Except one document, bestowing on the duke del Infantado the office of governor-general of New Castile, in the event of the king’s death, there was nothing in these papers to show that the prince at all contemplated that event, or that he had arranged any measures to follow it, should it take place; much less that he was engaged in any designs against his father and his government. But there was much censure of that government, and of the principal parties composing it. Those parties were not very scrupulous in the construction put upon the papers; and, on the 30th of October, the king issued a proclamation, charging the prince with being engaged in a conspiracy against the authority and the life of his father, and ordering the immediate prosecution of his advisers. The same day, the king wrote to Napoleon, telling him that he had discovered that his son had “formed a design, not only to dethrone, but even to attempt the life of himself and his mother. Such an atrocious attempt,” continued Charles, “merits the most exemplary punishment. The law which calls him to the succession should be repealed: one of my brothers will be more worthy to replace him in my heart and on the throne. I pray your majesty to aid me by your wisdom and your counsel.” Napoleon was not inclined to comply with this request. On the contrary, as the king of Spain and his son were envenomed against each other, he saw that it would further his purpose to increase the dissension between them. He told O’Meara, that he then “conceived the design of deriving advantage to himself from their differences, and of dispossessing both the king and prince.” There can be no doubt, however, that he had formed designs upon the crown of Spain before these events, which facilitated their execution. Still, he deemed concealment necessary; and when he learnt that the prince of Asturias, who possessed little firmness or moral courage, had communicated to the king what had passed between him and Napoleon, and placed in his father's hand the letter of the 11th of October, he ordered Champagny to write to the prince of Peace, "insisting, that on no account should anything be published respecting the affair, involving him or his ambassador." The emperor had done nothing, he declared, "which could justify the suspicion, that either he himself or his ministers had known of, or encouraged, any domestic intrigues of Spain. He positively never had, and never would, intermeddle with them. He never intended that the prince of Asturias should marry a princess of France; and his ambassador, Beauharnais, had instructions not to interfere in the affairs of Spain."

The proofs that the emperor did mix himself up with the domestic intrigues of Spain, and that he did contemplate a marriage between Ferdinand and a member of his own family, are found in the Mémoires et Correspondence, Politique et Militaire, du Roi Joseph, published at Paris in 1853. The belief that he was more or less connected with prince Ferdinand also prevailed at Madrid; and doubts as to how far he might be inclined to protect the prince, operated to procure lenient treatment for his royal highness. The king, by a decree of the 5th of November, in which he said his son had solicited pardon, and "disclosed the authors of the horrid plan which some wretches had put into his head," declared that he forgave him, and would receive him again into favour, when he had given proper proofs of amendment. The prince's confidants—Escoiquiz, the duke del Infantado, and others, who had been imprisoned at the time of his arrest—were brought to trial; and, on the 20th of January, 1808, were acquitted.

When the prince of Peace heard of Junot's proclamation of the 1st of February, he wrote to his agent Isquierdo at Paris, complaining of the uncertainty in which he lived. The treaty of Fontainebleau, he said, was already a dead letter. Junot governed the whole of Portugal; and the Spanish government had just received a demand for the remainder of their fleet to co-operate with that of France, which must be complied with; while the French troops in Spain lived at free quarters upon the country, and the people were exhausted with their requisitions. He complained, that neither his agent's nor the ambassador's presence in Paris had been of any use; and he said—"If you know anything, for God's sake let me know it; anything is better than this uncertainty." Isquierdo had been, before the letter arrived, ordered to quit Paris, and he could not, therefore, relieve his employer's uncertainty; but the additional exercises of supreme authority in Portugal, which we have enumerated, came to the knowledge of Godoy, and sufficiently enlightened him as to the end and aim of the emperor. Soon after Isquierdo arrived at Madrid, bringing with him a demand from Napoleon, that, in exchange for Portugal, now belonging to France, all Spain, north of the Ebro, should be ceded to the emperor. Godoy's agent had acquired, before leaving Paris, more knowledge of the designs of Napoleon than the latter supposed he possessed; and he informed the prince of Peace, that the entire possession of Spain was the object of the emperor; it being necessary, as he asserted, for the tranquillity of France. Then, on the 11th of March, the queen of Etruria, who had (as stated in a former page) been induced to abandon her son's kingdom in Italy for a promised one in Portugal, reached Madrid; and, on the 13th, Murat arrived at Burgos, with the title of "lieutenant of the emperor." He was accompanied by an immense civil and military staff; and his assumption of authority left no doubt as to the intentions of Napoleon, especially as the French army in Catalonia was ordered to be increased to 15,000 men; an entire new corps of 19,000 men, under marshal Bessières, was directed to be formed in Biscay; and the passage of the Bidassoa was effected by 6,000 of the imperial guard.

The prince of Peace, now finding that there was no reliance on treaties or any other agreements with Napoleon, advised the king and the prince of Asturias to follow the example of the prince-regent of Portugal, and, abandoning their European dominions, seek to establish an empire in America. His advice was accepted by the king; but Ferdinand very unwillingly acquiesced in it. All was prepared, however, for the departure of the court to Gibraltar, where an asylum had been besought for the king; and the horses, on the 17th of March, were harnessed to the carriages to convey the monarch and his suite from Aranjuez, where the court was then residing. An insurrection of the populace, that broke out at Aranjuez, and spread to Madrid, prevented their departure. The people wanted to keep Ferdinand, who at that time was their favourite, in Spain; and their principal vengeance was directed against the prince of Peace, to whom they rightly attributed the contemplated departure of the royal family. Godoy, however, escaped for the time, but was subsequently seized and imprisoned at Madrid. On the 19th, Charles IV. abdicated in favour of the prince of Asturias; and, on the 20th, that prince assumed the reins of government, and was proclaimed king. Murat, who had arrived at the Spanish capital with a considerable military force (having proceeded there without orders, on hearing of the insurrection at Aranjuez), refused to acknowledge the new sovereign; and sent a messenger to Charles at Aranjuez, to learn what was the real disposition of his majesty in this crisis. Charles gave this messenger a letter to the emperor, in which he protested against the validity of his abdication, as it had been forced from him by violence and terror. The French general then took military possession of the capital, of which he made general Grouchy governor. He also extended his protection to the king and queen, giving them a French guard; and Ferdinand, seeing the difficulty of his position, sent his brother Don Carlos to Paris, to explain what had taken place to the emperor, and to solicit his countenance and protection. Napoleon received intelligence of the events at Aranjuez on the 26th of March, and immediately made up his mind as to his future measures. On the 27th he wrote to his brother Louis, telling him what had taken place. He then added—"The people demand me, with loud cries, to fix their destinies. Being convinced that I shall never be able to conclude a solid peace with England till I have made a great movement on the continent, I have resolved to put a French prince on the throne of Spain. In this state of affairs I have turned my eyes on you for that throne. Say at once what is your opinion on that subject." * * * "Answer categorically—if I declare you king of Spain, can I rely on you?" This letter dispatched, the emperor, on the 29th of March, wrote to Murat, blaming him for taking possession of Madrid so precipitately as he had done; declared that the events of the 19th of March had exceedingly complicated affairs; warning that general that he must not suppose he had only to show himself to insure the submission of Spain; expressing his opinion that England would not let slip this opportunity of multiplying his embarrassments: and he cautioned Murat "not to commit him to meet Ferdinand in Spain, unless he was to recognise him as king." Not a word was said of his offer of the crown of Spain to Louis three days before—a proof of the habitual dissimulation of Napoleon.

Savary was the bearer of this letter; for, having no confidence in the political genius of Murat, however highly he estimated his military talents and bravery—and not thinking Beauharnais a sufficiently apt agent for his plans—Napoleon sent that general to Madrid, to endeavour to get both father and son into his power, and he himself repaired to Bayonne to await the event. Arrived at Madrid, Savary professed to treat Ferdinand as king, and said, no doubt the emperor, who would not, in the smallest particular, intermeddle in the internal affairs of Spain, would recognise him; but he advised him, as a mark of respect, to go to Burgos to meet his imperial majesty, who was on his way to visit him at Madrid. Ferdinand took the plausible advice of Savary; and, having appointed a junta of government, with his uncle, Don Antonio, at its head, he left Madrid on the 10th of April, Savary accompanying him. On arriving at Burgos, and not finding the emperor there, he was persuaded by Savary, against the advice of Don Pedro Cevallos, and other Spaniards who were with him, to go to Vittoria. There the people, doubting the intentions of the emperor, rose in crowds to prevent his majesty proceeding any further. Savary, however, who had gone forward to Bayonne, rejoined him, with a letter from Napoleon, to the effect, that the abdication of Charles IV. having taken place when his armies covered Spain, it would appear that he sent those troops there merely to precipitate his friend and ally from the throne. He was called upon to inquire into, before he recognised, that abdication. But, if he found it was voluntary, and not occasioned by the revolt at Aranjuez, then he would, without hesitation, and immediately, recognise Ferdinand as king. He concluded by calling on that prince to rely on his desire to reconcile everything, and on his wish to find occasion to give him proofs of his affection and perfect esteem. This letter—which was dated on the 16th of April, and which contrasts so forcibly with that of the 27th of March, sent to Louis—decided Ferdinand, who proceeded to Bayonne, where he arrived on the 20th. He was soon followed by his father, who had been persuaded by Murat to submit his cause to Napoleon; and reached Bayonne on the 30th.

After the departure of Ferdinand from Madrid, Murat—who had been strictly enjoined by Napoleon to be very cautious in his conduct, and to do nothing to excite or exasperate the people—found that he could not allay or prevent the discontent which was constantly increasing around him; and any attempt on his part to exert authority was met by resistance. This caused him to conduct himself in the most arbitrary and insulting manner; while the licentious behaviour of the French soldiery led to frequent collisions between them and the populace. Towards the close of April—having already obliged Don Antonio to deliver up to him the prince of Peace, whom he sent off to Bayonne—he insisted that the members of the royal family who remained at Madrid, should also proceed there. The junta were very reluctant to allow them to depart; but as they had no force to oppose to that which Murat commanded (and he was peremptory), they were obliged to submit; and, on the 2nd of May, the infants left the city. A number of persons had collected round the palace, clamorous for their stay; and they would have killed an aide-de-camp of Murat, if another officer had not protected him at the hazard of his own life, and enabled him to get into the palace. Both would, however, probably have fallen a sacrifice had not a French picket arrived at the moment. Murat instantly sent two pieces of cannon to the spot, and by a few discharges of grape, the populace was soon dispersed. The occurrence, however, had the effect of rousing the inhabitants en masse. Seizing knives, daggers, bayonets—whatever they could find—and rifling the gun-smiths shops of fire-arms, they surrounded the French troops as they passed through the streets; and many of them were cut to pieces. The Spanish soldiers had been shut up in their barracks by order of the government, and could render their countrymen no assistance; and the French concentrating, and bringing up some pieces of artillery, soon cleared the streets of the rioters. Many of the people fled to the front of the barracks; and being followed by the French, the Spanish troops, who had been left entirely without orders, finding that it was their own countrymen who were assailed, drew out their guns, and opened a fire on the imperialists, which was fatal to numbers. They, however, charged and captured the guns, killing many of the artillerymen. At length the efforts of the officers, and the leading men of the city, suppressed the tumult, about 300 being killed on each side. An amnesty was immediately proclaimed by the chiefs; and the Spaniards, on the faith that it would be observed, being walking about, discussing the events of the day, Murat had numbers of them seized, on the charge of having been concerned in the insurrection. These men were hurried before a military commission, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be shot. This event, instead of intimidating the Spanish people, inspired them with a spirit of revenge, and first gave rise to those guerilla movements in the provinces, which subsequently proved so fatal to the French armies.

The intelligence of the events of the 2nd of May, was received at Bayonne on the 5th, and seriously irritated the emperor. He had previously been occupied with his endeavours to induce Ferdinand to surrender his crown; but that prince was at first firm in maintaining his rights. During his negotiations with Ferdinand, Napoleon also had several interviews with the canon Escoiquiz, who had accompanied his royal master to Bayonne. In his conversations with him, Napoleon said, that the interests of his empire required, that the house of Bourbon, the secret enemy of his family, should lose the crown of Spain. After urging the canon to persuade Ferdinand to accept the conditions offered, he said it was in vain to speak of the difficulties which lay in the way of the enterprise he wanted to accomplish. "I have," said he, "nothing to apprehend from the only power that could disquiet me in it. The emperor of Russia, to whom I communicated, at Tilsit, my designs, which were formed at that period, approved of them, and gave me his word of honour he would offer no resistance." Probably under the influence of Escoiquiz—and finding that his father had arrived to appeal to Napoleon—the prince, on the 2nd of May, signed a conditional resignation; stipulating, that he and his father should both return to Madrid, where, if his father would not resume his authority, Ferdinand should govern the kingdom as his lieutenant. This, however, was not satisfactory to Napoleon, who succeeded better with Charles. His enmity to his son induced him to agree to a treaty, which was drawn up on the 4th, and signed on the 5th, by Duroc, on the part of the emperor, and by the prince of Peace on the part of Charles. By this document, Charles resigned his rights to the crown of Spain and the Indies, in favour of Napoleon, on condition of a palace being assigned at Compiègne, for the residence of himself, the queen, and Godoy, during his lifetime, with an annuity of 30,000,000 reals (£40,000) per annum. An annuity of 400,000 francs was also to be allowed to each of the royal infants of Spain. When this treaty was signed, Napoleon rode out, and, on his way, met a messenger with the intelligence of the events of the 2nd, at Madrid. Greatly irritated, he returned to his château, and summoned Charles, his queen, Ferdinand, and the prince of Peace, before him. The scene that passed, is described as unequalled for the vituperation which took place between the parties. The king and queen both abused their son; Napoleon and Duroc threatened him; nor were the infants Carlos and Antonio spared; till at length, Ferdinand, alarmed for his own life and that of his relatives, signed a document, by which he declared his concurrence in the resignation of the crown by his father—he acquiring the title of "most serene highness," with the palace, park, and farms of Navarre, and a yearly annuity of 600,000 francs, to be paid from the French treasury. The same day that this treaty was signed, a deputation from the government of Madrid arrived at Bayonne, and succeeded in obtaining an interview with Ferdinand. Their object was, to receive instructions from him as to the course they were to pursue in the future; and Ferdinand, stating that he was deprived of his liberty, sent two despatches to the junta and the royal council, giving them authority to act ad libitum, as to adding new members to their numbers, and to remove such as they thought proper; and ordering them to transfer the seat of government to a place of safety; to summon the cortes together; and to declare war against France, as soon as they knew that he was conveyed to the interior of that country. Don Jose Palafox, whose name became so celebrated in the subsequent war, was the bearer of these despatches to Madrid.

On the 8th of May, Charles issued a proclamation, announcing that he had ceded the crown of Spain to the emperor of France; and, on the 12th, Ferdinand also put forth a manifesto, quite at variance with his instructions to the government at Madrid. He stated, that he had surrendered the crown back to his father, who had conveyed it to Napoleon, to deal with as he thought fit. His brother, Don Carlos, and his uncle, Don Antonio, were consenting parties to the cession; and, releasing the Spaniards from their allegiance to himself, he exhorted them to accept, and be faithful to, the government which the emperor might bestow upon them. These proclamations reached Madrid before the counter-instructions of Ferdinand were made known. Murat immediately invited the different councils and public bodies to express their adhesion to the emperor's decisions; intimating to them, at the same time, that it would be acceptable to his majesty, if they conveyed to him a wish that he would make choice of the king of Naples to rule over them. All those bodies complied with the marshal's invitation, which implied a command: even the junta of government yielded, after a short resistance. The cardinal Bourbon, uncle to Ferdinand, also wrote to the emperor, testifying his acquiescence in the resignation of the crown by his relatives, and promising to recognise the sovereign whom Napoleon might appoint. The emperor, having sent off the king, queen, and prince of Peace to Compiègne, and Ferdinand to Valençay, issued a proclamation on the 25th of May, declaring, that the abdication of the throne by the Bourbon princes had rendered it vacant; and summoning an assembly of the prelates, grandees, &c. (which he called a "constitutional junta"), to meet at Bayonne, for the purpose of arranging the basis of a new government. About 150 degenerate nobles, all partisans of France, obeyed this summons; and, after a formal consultation with them, and their assent to what he proposed, by a decree of the 6th of June (Louis having, in reply to the letter of the 27th of March, refused the offer of the throne), the emperor proclaimed his brother Joseph king of Spain and the Indies; not to hold the crown, however, with that of Naples.

Napoleon had previously summoned Joseph from Naples, to take the more important dignity upon him; and the new king arrived at Bayonne on the 7th of June. He was met, some distance from the town, by the emperor, who explained to him why it was indispensable that he should make the exchange of the two crowns; and, when he entered the town, the constitutional junta received him with every outward appearance of cordiality. This junta was then ordered to frame a new constitution for the kingdom. It commenced its sittings, for this purpose, on the 15th of June; and, by the 7th of July, a constitution was framed, and accepted by the king; which went to the extremes of liberalism. It threw open every office—ecclesiastical, civil, or military—to all classes; subjected the nobles to the same duties and taxes as were imposed upon the middle and working classes; and organised the cortes—throwing open the seats in that body to all persons, without requiring any qualification in payment of taxes, or the possession of property. This important matter adjusted, the emperor, on the 15th of July, promulgated a decree, creating Murat, grand-duke of Berg, king of the Two Sicilies. He then returned to Paris, whilst Joseph proceeded to Madrid. Before he left Bayonne, the latter received a letter from Ferdinand (who appears to have been as false as he was cowardly), dated Valençay, June 22nd, requesting him, as king of Spain, to accept the oath of allegiance of that prince, and the Spaniards who were with him.

The people of Spain, however, evinced no disposition to submit to the monarch thus thrust upon them in the place of the old race. They broke out in insurrection directly it was known that the crown was surrendered to France. The Asturians were the first to hoist the national banner. They were followed by the people of Aragon, Galicia, and several other provinces. Ferdinand VII. was proclaimed, on the 2nd of June, at Saragossa, where Palafox was in command. Juntas were formed in the various provinces; and that which met at Oviedo, for Asturias, on the 6th of June, declared war against France; appointed the marquis of Santa Cruz generalissimo of the Spanish troops; sent deputies to London, to solicit the assistance of England; and, on the 14th of June, hostilities commenced by the Spanish garrison of Cadiz opening a fire upon five French ships of the line and one frigate lying in that harbour, which were compelled to surrender. These measures caused the emperor to order fresh troops to be sent to Spain. Bessières received instructions to put Burgos in a state of defence, and to invest Saragossa; Moncey, to proceed to Cuenca, to prevent the patriots of Valencia and Saragossa from communicating with each other; and Dupont, with 20,000 men, was sent towards Cordova and Seville. Savary had succeeded Murat in command of the French troops; and he directed the first operations to be made upon a large body of patriots at Segovia, where general Frere, on the 6th of June, routed them, and took thirty pieces of cannon, which they had carried off from the arsenal. Other successes were obtained by divisions of marshal Bessières, on the same day, at Logrono; on the 7th, at Torquemada; and, on the 12th, at Caberon, where general Cuesta commanded. At Logrono and Torquemada, the French behaved with the greatest cruelty; putting all the leaders of the patriots to death at the first place, and burning the town of Torquemada; whilst they treated the inhabitants with the greatest severity. There is little doubt but that these atrocities roused the spirit of revenge in the Spanish guerillas, and caused many of the excesses of which those irregulars were guilty. The successes of the French troops had the effect of reducing great part of Leon and Old Castile under the authority of Joseph. On the 10th of June, the siege of Saragossa was commenced; and many gallant deeds were performed by the defenders during its progress. In the south of Spain, the French met with many disasters. Moncey, in an attack on Valencia, was defeated, and compelled to make a retrograde movement. In his retreat he gained some minor successes; and general Cuesta, who always showed himself a most incompetent commander, was defeated at Rio Seco, with considerable loss, on the 14th of July. Every advantage, however, gained up to this time, was counterbalanced by the repeated discomfitures of Duhesme, who commanded in Catalonia; and who, in unsuccessful attempts on Gerona, in attacks made by the Spaniards on Barcelona, and in encounters in the field, lost a number of men, thirty cannon, and quantities of arms and ammunition. At the close of July, the French held no post in Catalonia, except Barcelona and Figueras. But even these losses were slight, indeed, compared with the terrible defeat of Dupont at Baylen, on the 19th of July. He was considerably outnumbered; the Spaniards, under Castanos, amounting to 25,000 men, whilst he had only 14,000. The engagement lasted several hours. The French had 3,000 killed and wounded; and, the next day, Dupont capitulated, with 8,000 men. Another division, under Vedel, was included in the capitulation, with all the French depôts, and small posts and garrisons, as far as Toledo; making a total of about 21,000 troops of all arms. Thus, the effects of this battle cost France 24,000 men. The troops were to have been sent home; the arms, ammunition, &c., to remain with the victors; and it was one of the greatest military disasters France had ever experienced since the battle of Pavia. Napoleon was at Bordeaux when he heard of the capitulation. He was completely overwhelmed; and pronounced the event "a stain upon the French arms, which could never be effaced."*—Previous to this battle, large supplies of provisions and military stores had been received by the Spanish patriots from England; the British government having proclaimed, on the 4th of July, that it was at peace with the Spanish nation.

The intelligence of the insurrectionary movements of course reached Bayonne before the junta broke up; and the emperor and king left that city. Napoleon had repeatedly sent instructions to Savary respecting the measures he was to take to suppress the outbreak; and notwithstanding the gallant defence of Saragossa, and the defeat of Moncey at Valencia, the subsequent successes of the marshal and the defeat of Cuesta, induced the emperor to think that all danger was passed. When Joseph was on his route, however, he was soon painfully convinced that he had nothing to expect from the good-feeling of the people over whom he was appointed to rule. On the 11th of July, he wrote to his brother, to inform him that the "worst spirit prevailed everywhere, particularly at Madrid;" and the next day, from Vittoria, he said—"There is not a single Spaniard on my side, except the few who compose the junta, and my small suite." However, he proceeded, and entered Madrid on the 20th of July—the day that Dupont surrendered. The silence of the city, on that occasion, is described as "mournful;" and there was not the least sign of a popular welcome. Joseph had not been in the capital forty-eight hours, before he became convinced that nothing but a large army could keep him on the Spanish throne. "All classes," he wrote to his brother on the 24th, "are emigrating from Madrid. The servants of the duke del Parque have abandoned him, and written him word they are gone to join the Spanish army. We are penniless. All the provinces are occupied by the enemy. Henry IV. had a party, and Philip I. only a rival, to combat: I am opposed by a nation of twelve millions of inhabitants, brave, and at the highest pitch of exasperation." On the 28th, the news of the capitulation of Dupont (which had been rumoured in the capital as early as the 23rd), was officially communicated; and, on the 30th, Joseph retired from Madrid to Burgos, where he arrived on the 9th of August, deserted by nearly all the nobles who had adhered to him. He was there joined by Bessières, Verdier, with the troops from Saragossa, and the remains of Moncey's corps. About 50,000 veterans were thus concentrated under his orders. When he left Madrid, Joseph carried off with him the crown jewels, and all the valuables he could collect, from the Escorial. For some time after his departure, but little order prevailed in the capital; but, eventually, the junta of Seville proposed, that two members from each provincial junta should form a central junta, to meet at Madrid. This was agreed to. The junta was inaugurated on the 25th of September; and it conducted the affairs of Spain, first at Madrid, and then at Seville, for some time.

When the news of these events reached Portugal, 10,000 Spanish troops at Oporto displaced the French authorities, restored the old Portuguese

* The fate of the men who surrendered was very lamentable. Nearly 18,000 privates and subalterns were, by a gross breach of faith on the part of the Spaniards, detained at Cadiz, of whom few ever returned to France. Dupont and the generals who were sent home, were arrested, sent to prison, and kept there, without trial, till the 1st of February, 1812. A court of inquiry then set, and condemned them all. After the fall of Bonaparte they were liberated; having been several years subjected to close imprisonment.

officials, and marched into Spain. This induced Junot to disarm 5,000 Spaniards who were at Lisbon, and to take steps for maintaining the authority of France against the Portuguese, who began also to manifest symptoms of revolt against French rule. Very soon, they rose in every part of the country; and a junta of government was established at Oporto. Junot sent detachments against the patriots, and, in various places, the greatest barbarities were practised, especially at Beija and Evora. At the former place, as general Kellermann stated in an order of the day, the "inhabitants" ("guilty inhabitants" he termed them) "were put to the sword," and the "houses delivered up to pillage and flames." At Evora, the Portuguese being defeated in the field (on the 29th of July), the French entered the town, and indiscriminately massacred its inhabitants, 8,000 of whom were killed or wounded. But the conquerors had soon to suffer a severe retribution.

The English government thought, that the insurrectionary movements in the Peninsula afforded an opportunity for checking the progress of French ambition. A force of nearly 10,000 men, which had been collected at Cork for another purpose, was, therefore, put under the command of Sir Arthur Wellesley, and dispatched to Portugal; and Sir John Moore, who was at Gottenburg with 12,000 men (sent to aid the king of Sweden, who declined their co-operation), was ordered to return to England with his army, for the purpose of proceeding to Spain. Sir A. Wellesley preceded his men in a fast-sailing frigate, and arrived at Corunna on the 20th of July. There he heard of the defeat of Cuesta at Rio Seco; and ascertained, in his communications with the junta of Galicia, that they did not wish to receive British troops, as "they could put any number of men into the field, if they had arms and money." He left them £200,000, and assured them that further supplies of military stores should be sent. Sir Arthur then proceeded southward, and joined the troops he was to command, in Mondego Bay, on the 31st of July. The landing was completed on the 5th of August; on which day, general Spencer arrived, having come round with a detachment of 3,000 men, from the Bay of Cadiz. The united force was 12,300 strong, and Sir Arthur had eighteen guns. His army commenced its onward march on the 9th, expecting to be joined by 6,000 Portuguese troops, which were in the field. The Portuguese generals, however, would only suffer 1,400 infantry, and 250 horse, to be attached to the English force.

Junot, whom the emperor had, just before, created duke d'Abrantes, had sent Laborde down to the coast with 5,000 men, when he first heard of the arrival of the English force; but that general felt himself obliged to retire before the invaders. As Junot had ordered all his different corps to concentrate for the defence of Lisbon, Laborde resolved to halt at Roliça, or Roriça, a little village in the bosom of the Monte Junta. There, on the 17th of August, they were attacked by the British, who had the advantage in numbers; but the French were so favourably posted, that this advantage appears to have availed little; as only a portion of Sir Arthur Wellesley's army could get into the engagement. The battle was gallantly contested on both sides; but the French were obliged to retreat to the higher mountains, having lost three guns, and 600 killed and wounded. The loss of the British was nearly 500. Laborde was not pursued as he marched inland; and Sir Arthur Wellesley, expecting reinforcements by sea, kept in the direction of the coast. Intelligence was received in the night, of the arrival of a squadron, with troops on board; and, in order to effect a junction readily, the army moved on Vimiera, a town of Estremadura, seven miles north of Torres Vedras. On the 19th, a detachment commanded by general Anstruther, and, on the 20th, another under general Auckland, landed, making the English army 16,000 strong, exclusive of the Portuguese brigade, and two regiments, which were with Sir Charles Cotton, off the Tagus. Sir Arthur's weakest arm was his cavalry; he having only 180 British, and 200 Portuguese horse. Junot, with 14,000 men, 1,200 of whom were cavalry, and twenty-six pieces of cannon, marched from Lisbon to attack this force; and had not Sir Harry Burrard, who arrived to supersede Sir Arthur, forbade his advance on the capital, the two armies would have encountered in a much more advantageous position for the British than they did; and the consequence of a defeat to Junot, must have been the entire destruction of the army. The British had a good position at Vimiera; their right being posted on a mountain ridge running inland from the sea, with the base on a plain, on which the village of Vimiera was situated. Six guns, and two brigades of infantry, were placed on a hill that masked the village; and the cavalry occupied the egress from the plain. Here they were attacked by the French on the morning of the 21st of August. The principal assault took place on the centre and the left; and it was repulsed as spiritedly as it was made. One portion of Junot's force, under general Solignac, after an interchange of volleys, which was kept up for some time with great loss on both sides, was charged with the bayonet by three British regiments—the 40th, 56th, and 71st, supported by three others; and the entire front line of the French is described as going "down, like grass before the scythe." Another attempt was made to drive the British from their posts, with Brennier's brigade, and the reserve under Kellermann.

They were at first successful, as their approach was not perceived; and the assailed, taken by surprise, were thrown into temporary confusion. But they soon recovered themselves, and, in their turn, becoming the assailants, drove the enemy before them; whose rout and destruction would have been decisive, had not the pursuit been interrupted by Sir Harry Burrard, who prevented Wellesley from following up his victory. In this engagement, the French lost about 1,800, the British 720, in killed and wounded. The former also left many prisoners, and fourteen cannon, in the hands of the victors, of whom only between nine and ten thousand were actually engaged.

The next morning, Sir Hugh Dalrymple landed, and took the command. Junot had reached Torres Vedras, and Sir Hugh had given orders to advance on that post; when general Kellermann arrived with a flag of truce, and a proposal from Junot for an armistice, in order that negotiations might be entered into for the evacuation of Portugal. The convention of Cintra was the result, which was signed on the 23rd of August. By its terms, the French were to be sent, by sea, back to France, with their artillery, arms, and baggage.* They would have included in the latter, all the public, and no small portion of the private, property in Lisbon, if the British had not prevented them. With great difficulty most of their plunder was regained; and, on the 15th of September, the first division sailed from the Tagus. By the middle of October, not a French soldier remained in Portugal. Thus ended the attempt of the emperor to possess himself of that part of the Peninsula.

Napoleon arrived at Paris in August; and during that month, he kept up an unintermitted correspondence with Joseph upon the affairs of Spain; the latter constantly dwelling upon the hostility of the Spaniards, and maintaining, that it would require at least 200,000 men to conquer the country. The successes of the insurgents convinced the emperor that some decisive measure must be adopted. On the 4th of September he went to the Luxembourg, where the senate was assembled; and after a few observations on the events which had transpired in the Peninsula (which were not known to their full extent), he said—"I am resolved to prosecute the war in Spain with the greatest activity, and to destroy the armies which England may land in that country. My alliance with the emperor of Russia, leaves England no prospect of success in her projects. I believe in the peace of the continent; but I will not, and I cannot, depend upon the false calculations of other courts; and since my neighbours are increasing their armies, it is my business to increase mine."—In reply, the senate voted an address, in which it was declared, that "the will of France was the same with the will of the emperor;" and that "the war with Spain was politic, just, and necessary." The senators followed up this address by a decree, issued on the 10th, by which 80,000 conscripts of the classes which had been already released—viz., those of 1806, 1807, 1808, and 1809, were placed at the emperor's disposal; and 100,000 from the class of 1810. On the 11th, the emperor reviewed all the troops in Paris, at the Tuileries, and told them, he should himself lead them into Spain, to avenge the wrongs which the Spaniards had inflicted on France!

Before he commenced the new campaign, however, he wished to make all safe on the side of Germany, where Austria had recently shown some signs of restiveness under the inflictions which were the result of the "continental system." On the 8th of September he concluded a fresh treaty with Prussia, by which, in consequence of the king's pledge of amity, he agreed to put an end to the military occupation of the country; with the exception of the fortresses of Glogau, Stettin, and Cüstrin, which were still to be garrisoned by French troops till all the arrears of contributions had been paid. The expenses of those garrisons were to be defrayed by the king of Prussia, who was not to raise an army exceeding 40,000 men for the next ten years. Napoleon was also desirous of strengthening his alliance with Russia; and for that purpose he proposed an interview, to which the czar assented; and it was arranged that the two sovereigns should meet at Erfurth. Napoleon left Paris for that town on the 22nd of September; he arrived at Erfurth on the 27th; and the two emperors remained together till the 14th of October, during which time most of the kings and princes of Germany joined them; and the town was a scene of great festivity. No treaty was concluded at Erfurth; but Las Casas and others, who were in Napoleon's confidence, inform us, that the two emperors entered into engagements mutually to support each other. Alexander sanctioned the proceedings already taken, or which might hereafter be taken, with respect to Spain and Portugal; the transfer of the kingdom of Naples to Murat, and the annexation of Tuscany to France: he also promised to join the French armies with a considerable force, in the event of a war with Austria; and again engaged to use his mediation with England to induce her to conclude a peace. Napoleon, in return, agreed that Finland, Moldavia, and Wallachia, should be added to Russia; and encouraged the czar to entertain hopes of French assistance, in any attack he might make upon the Indian empire of England. The czar wished that the possession of Constantinople should also be ceded to him; but Napoleon told Las Casas, that "he could never bring his mind to consent to it." He had, at that period, formed the project of divorcing Josephine, and contracting an alliance with some of the royal houses of Europe; and before he left Erfurth, he became a suitor for the hand of the grand-duchess, Catherine Paulowna, the favourite sister of the czar. He was defeated, however, by the firmness of the empress-dowager, who could not reconcile herself to an alliance with one not of royal birth. Her imperial majesty, however, publicly alleged religious scruples as a reason for withholding her assent to the marriage; and then gave the hand of the grand-duchess to the prince of Oldenburg.

Though disappointed in his matrimonial speculation, the conferences at Erfurth were satisfactory to Napoleon at the time. It was the opinion of many authorities, however, that there was no sincere friendship between the two emperors, but that each only assumed the guise of amity till circumstances enabled him to take measures for repressing what he considered the aggressive ambition of the other. But they separated with the strongest professions of friendship; and Napoleon set out, on his return to the French capital, in, apparently, the highest spirits. On the 25th of October, soon after he arrived at the Tuileries, he summoned the legislative body, and opened the session by a speech, in which he told them of his intention to go to Spain and take the command of the army. "The hideous presence of the English leopards," he said, "contaminates the continent of Spain and Portugal. I go to place myself at the head of my armies, to crown my brother at Madrid, and to plant the French eagles on the ramparts of Lisbon." The members of the legislative body received this speech with great applause. They readily acceded to the demands Napoleon made for men and money; and, two days after, he left Paris for Bayonne, where he arrived on the 3rd of November.

The aspect of affairs now looked very threatening for Spain. From the time that the king had retired, with his diminished force, behind the Ebro, his negotiations with Prussia and his journey to Erfurth did not prevent Napoleon from enforcing the most active measures for reorganising and strengthening the army in the Peninsula. By the beginning of October, there were 90,000 men in Navarre, and 20,000 in Catalonia; and these formidable corps were still further strengthened by the troops withdrawn from the Rhine, including the corps of Soult, Ney, and Mortier. During the month of October, the road from Bayonne to Vittoria was crowded with armed men, marching to reinforce the army in Navarre; and the entire number of French troops in Spain, when the emperor took the field in November, was estimated at upwards

Corps.	No. of Men.	Commanders.
1st	33,937	Victor, duke of Belluno.
2nd	33,054	Bessières, duke of Istria; and afterwards Soult, duke of Dalmatia.
3rd	37,690	Moncey, duke of Cornegliano.
4th	25,984	Lefebvre, duke of Dantzic.
5th	26,713	Mortier, duke of Treviso.
6th	38,033	Ney, duke of Elchingen.
7th	42,107	General St. Cyr.
8th	25,730	Junot, duke of Abrantes.
Reserve . .	42,382	Napoleon, in person.

Besides these various corps, 15,000 men were, in November, on their march from France to the scene of action. The "grand army" was so disposed, that at least 180,000 men could be collected for offensive operations on the Ebro. To oppose them, the Spaniards had, in that quarter, three armies under Palafox, Castanos, and Blake, amounting to 74,000 infantry, 2,000 horse, and 86 guns. Two small British armies were also advancing to the scene of action. One was the force from Sweden, under Sir John Moore, which had disembarked at Lisbon in the middle of October, and immediately made for the Ebro in two columns—one by Elvas, Badajoz, Talavera, and Madrid; the other, by Abrantes, Almeida, and Ciudad Rodrigo. The other army was under Sir David Baird, who, with 13,000 men, had landed at Corunna on the 13th of October, and took the route for Vittoria, to form a junction with Sir John Moore. The Spaniards had also about 57,000 men, as reserve corps, at Segovia, Talavera, La Mancha, and Slanes. If this entire force could have been concentrated before the French were ready for the attack, it would have been quite unequal to encounter the well-disciplined veterans of France. No wonder, therefore, that a series of disasters, for a time, completely paralysed the patriot cause.

The last success of the Spaniards, in this stage of the war, was obtained at Bilbao, on the 23rd of September, when Blake took that town, and caused the French stationed there to retreat to the mountains of Navarre. A combined attack upon the central position which the French then held in those mountains, was contemplated; but there was neither sufficient strategic ability in the chiefs, nor discipline in the troops, to carry it out. The Andalusian army, under Castanos, on the 25th of October, attacked the French posts around Logrono, on the right bank of the Ebro; and were, after obtaining some advantages, driven back with the loss of their artillery. Blake, after he had taken Bilbao, was joined by the marquis of Romana, and some troops from Corunna. He advanced by the valley of Durango, with the intention of interposing between the corps of Ney and Lefebvre; and, as he had 50,000 men nominally under his command, a decisive action was expected. However, he contrived to appear in front of the enemy, in the valley, with only some 17,000 men, the rest being scattered along the sea-coast. There he was attacked by Lefebvre on the 31st of October, driven back upon Bilbao, which the French reoccupied, and pursued in the direction of the Asturias. He rallied his men, and compelled them to return, but could not regain possession of that town.

When Napoleon joined the French army, Blake, with 25,000 men, dispirited by his defeat, was at Espinosa, in Biscay; the conde de Belvidere, with 12,000 men, was at Burgos; Castanos and Palafox were advancing towards Logrono, ignorant of the strength of the invaders; and the British were converging, as fast as they could, to the scene of action. The emperor directed the first attack to be made on Blake, who was defeated on the 10th, 11th, and 13th of November, at Espinosa and Reynosa. On the 10th, numbers of the Spaniards were driven into the river Trueba, and perished. On the 13th the dispersion was completed—a few thousand men, utterly exhausted and helpless, escaping to the mountains of the Asturias; but all the artillery and ammunition were lost; and Santander, where the British had landed a great many stores, fell into the hands of the French.—On the 10th of November, the conde de Belvidere was defeated at Burgos; 2,000 Spaniards being killed, 800 made prisoners, and all the ammunition and stores at Burgos taken. That town was given up to pillage; and, on the 12th, Napoleon established his head-quarters there.—Ney and Lannes were next dispatched against Castanos and Palafox; the former of whom, ignorant of the fate which had befallen Blake and Belvidere, had formed a plan of breaking through the French force, penetrating to Burgos, and, passing on to Vittoria, co-operate with Blake in attacking and driving back the enemy. The advance of Ney, however, compelled him to fall back on Tudela, where he formed a junction with Palafox. On the 23rd of November, Lannes, who had concentrated 30,000 infantry, 5,000 cavalry, and 60 pieces of cannon, and had generals Maurice, Mathieu, and Lefebvre under him, attacked the united force. One of his divisions, under La Grange, was defeated and driven back by some brave fellows—part of those who won the victory of Baylen. But in all other parts of the field the French were successful; and the Spaniards who had defeated La Grange, were, in their turn, beaten by a dense mass of infantry, whom they encountered when following up their success. The result of the action was, that the Spanish army was entirely broken up and dispersed, except 20,000 men under Castanos, who, with their artillery, fell back to Calatayud; from whence, by order of the central junta, they proceeded to Madrid, to defend the capital. In the battle of Tudela, 5,000 Spaniards were killed, wounded, or made prisoners.

After the last engagement, the emperor resolved to march upon the capital, leaving Lefebvre to watch Sir John Moore and Sir David Baird. The force under Napoleon included the imperial guard, and amounted to 60,000 men. The only difficulty in their way was the pass of the Somo-Sierra mountains, which was defended by 12,000 Spaniards, and was gallantly forced on the 30th of November; the French lancers charging the enemy in the most daring style, and carrying all before them. Nothing then prevented the march of the French upon Madrid; and that capital was deserted by the central junta, who made for Badajoz by various roads. A provisional junta was left, with the duke del Infantado at its head: when the French appeared before the city, however, on the 2nd of December, the duke departed, and followed the army of Castanos to Guadalaxara, where it had retreated, without making any stand at the capital. On the 3rd, the emperor directed a battery of thirty guns to open its fire upon the Retiro, a fort on the heights which command the city. At this moment, says Sir A. Alison, "the agitation in Madrid became excessive. Twenty thousand armed men were within its walls, agitated by furious passions, burning with individual ardour, but destitute of the organisation and discipline necessary for success against the formidable enemy by whom they were now assailed. The city presented the most frightful scene of disorder. Exasperated crowds filled the streets; strong barricades were erected in various quarters; the bells of 200 churches rung together; a confused murmur, like the sound of a mighty cataract, was heard incessantly, even during the night, and was audible at the distance of several miles from the capital." A vivid picture this, of the alarm, consternation, and confusion which the advance of a hostile force creates in a populous town. The French were "silent and orderly;" the force of discipline was evident everywhere; and the authorities of Madrid soon found that resistance was unavailing. The Retiro was taken on the 3rd; and on the 4th the city surrendered—the marquis Castellás, the viscount de Gaëta, and some men with them, withdrawing in the night.

Napoleon, completely disregarding Joseph, who was in his camp, established his head-quarters at Chamartin, in the neighbourhood of Madrid; from whence he issued orders for punishing those who had taken the oath to, and then had abandoned, his brother; abolished the Inquisition, and ordered its funds to be applied to the discharge of the national debt; reduced the number of convents one-third, and ordered half the revenues of those suppressed to be also used in diminishing the debt, and the other half to the relief of the towns which had suffered by the French invasion; abolished all barriers between the commerce of France and Spain; and finally issued a bulletin (on the 7th of December), in which he said, he would "chase the English from the Peninsula;" and predicted, that "the Bourbons could never again reign in Europe." These proceedings displeased Joseph, who found his authority entirely dispensed with. He had not yet re-entered Madrid; and, the day after the bulletin appeared, he wrote to his brother, requesting that he would receive his (Joseph's) renunciation of all the rights he had given him to the throne of Spain. This led to some further intercourse between the two brothers, as it did not suit Napoleon's purpose, at that time, to accept Joseph's resignation; and to the promulgation of a proclamation, in which Napoleon told the Spaniards, that he had removed every impediment in the way of their happiness and prosperity, having replaced their despotic by a constitutional monarchy. "But," he added, "if I find my efforts are useless, and my confidence misplaced, I will treat Spain as a conquered country, and put my brother on some other throne. I will then place the crown of Spain on my own head, and I shall know how to make it respected; for God has given me the power and the will to surmount all obstacles." This proclamation brought the civil and religious authorities to the emperor, to request him to let Joseph resume the regal authority. Their request was granted, and they again took the oaths to their new sovereign, who, however, did not re-enter Madrid till the 22nd of January, 1809.

Soon after the Spanish authorities had renewed their oaths to Joseph, Napoleon departed from Madrid, to arrest the retreat of the British army under Sir John Moore, who had been joined, at Salamanca, by Sir David Baird and general Hope; and found himself at the head of 31,588 men, of whom 25,858 were fit for duty. This army was in the highest spirits when advancing to Madrid; the garrison of which, Sir J. Moore was informed, had vowed not to surrender the city, but to bury themselves under its ruins. When it was found, however, that the Spanish troops were fugitives, and the capital once more in the hands of the French, retreat became indispensable. In this movement, Sir John Moore's and Sir David Baird's corps were divided; but they were reunited at Sahagun on the 21st of December. From thence the retreat was conducted by Benevente, Astorga, and Lugo, to Corunna. Napoleon himself led the pursuit to Astorga; where the intelligence he received from Paris, induced him to leave the task of "driving the islanders into the sea," to Soult and Ney, and to return to France. The retreat was continued through the most difficult roads, and by mountain passes, in which ammunition waggons had repeatedly to be blown up, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. These passes were sometimes choked by deep snow; and the hardships and privations which the men endured, were of the most terrible description. Notwithstanding all the exertions of the officers, the troops, lost to all discipline, became little better than marauders; and they committed sad atrocities on the inhabitants. They were closely pressed by the enemy; but, in the midst of their privations, they never lost their courage. Encounters between pickets, and the rear-guard of one and the advanced guard of the other army, were frequent. The British were, in these affairs, always victors. They made many prisoners, one of them being general Lefebvre Dessouettes; and, in this difficult retreat—one of the most harassing on record, except that of the French from Moscow—they did not lose a single gun.

On the 5th of January, 1809, the English army had twelve hours' start of the enemy, and reached Nogales. "At this period of the retreat" (we quote Sir William Napier), "the road was covered with baggage, sick men, women, and plunderers. Under the most favourable circumstances, the toil of a retreating force exhibits the most terrible scenes of distress; and, on the road near Nogales, the followers of the army were dying fast from cold and hunger. The soldiers, barefooted, harassed, and weakened by their excesses, were dropping on the road by hundreds; while broken carts, dead animals, and the piteous appearance of women with children, struggling, or falling exhausted in the snow, completed a picture of war, which, like Janus, has a double face!" Notwithstanding these disastrous circumstances, on the 11th of January, between 14,000 and 15,000 reached Corunna. There they were to embark; but the transports had not arrived, being detained at Vigo by contrary winds. It was not till the 14th that they hove in sight; and, in the evening of that day, the sick, the dismounted cavalry, the best horses, and fifty-two pieces of artillery, were embarked. On the 15th, the French, under Soult, had reached Corunna in force. Their batteries commanded the town; and Sir John Moore found that his men must force their way, or capitulate. Many of the officers were in favour of a capitulation; but the general would not hear of any such a termination to the expedition. It was resolved, therefore, to fight; and the night of the 15th was employed in embarking all the women, wounded, and everything that could impede the operations of the army. The next day, the English, amounting to not more than 14,500, were attacked by the French, who were at least 20,000 strong. The former, under Sir John Moore, Sir David Baird, Sir John Hope, and generals Frazer and Paget, occupied a range of heights, rising, like an amphitheatre, round the village of Elvina. The French were posted on a semicircular ridge, sweeping round the British position. The English had only twelve cannon: the French had twelve pieces of heavy artillery, and a number of light field-pieces. The fighting began about two o'clock, by an impetuous onset of the French, who advanced in four columns, and made a fierce assault upon the British, which was received with the greatest firmness. The enemy returned again and again to the attack, but with the same result. The fighting continued till night, when a charge with the bayonet drove the French from the heights, with the loss of 2,000 men. The English remained considerably in advance of the positions they occupied in the morning. In the midst of the fight, the gallant commander-in-chief, Sir John Moore, received his death-wound, when animating the 42nd Highlanders to make a successful charge. He died the same night, and was buried in a grave dug in the ramparts of Corunna, his cloak forming his shroud.

"No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Nor in sheet nor in shroud they wound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him."

The French, like gallant enemies, erected a tomb over his remains, which has since been enlarged, and bears the simple inscription—"John Moore, leader of the English armies, slain in battle, 1809."

Sir David Baird was wounded in the action, and the command devolved on Sir John Hope. Under his orders, the troops were all embarked that night, the French offering no interruption. The few Spanish troops who were in the town subsequently closed the gates, manned the ramparts, and kept the French at bay, till the remaining artillery, stores, wounded, and prisoners were embarked. Then they capitulated to marshal Soult, who, a few days after, made a much more important capture—the fortress of Ferrol, and seven ships of the line, falling into his hands.

CHAPTER XI.

NAPOLÉON AT PARIS; POPULAR DISCONTENT; ANOTHER WAR WITH AUSTRIA; THE CAMPAIGN; BATTLE OF ECHMUHL; AFFAIRS IN ITALY, THE TYROL, AND POLAND; TERRIBLE BATTLE OF EBERSBERG; OCCUPATION OF VIENNA; BATTLE OF ASPERN; BATTLE OF WAGRAM; ARMISTICE OF ZNAIM; EXPEDITION TO WALCHEREN; PEACE OF VIENNA; THE TYROL; TREATMENT OF THE POPE; ATTACK ON THE FRENCH SQUADRON IN D'AIX ROADS.

NAPOLÉON arrived at Paris on the 22nd of January, 1809: his return, entirely unexpected, was occasioned by information not only from Vienna, Munich, Dresden, and Milan, relative to the activity with which Austria was pursuing her military preparations; and from Constantinople, of the efforts which were making to detach the Porte from France, and to induce her once more to unite her fortunes with England; but also because, according to Thiers, "it was intimated to him from Paris, that there was a strange uneasiness abroad; that intrigues were timidly, but visibly, urged at the court; that bold language was uttered in the town; and that everywhere, in short, people were uneasy, discontented, ill-disposed, and ill-spoken." The disasters of the Spanish war had produced this change in a few short months; and the disaffection of the people spread to the legislative body, which remained in session; and where the ten or fifteen opposition votes, originally found there, had increased from eighty to a hundred. Even Talleyrand and Fouché were wavering in allegiance, and speculating upon their course, should the career of Napoleon be ended by a ball from a cannon, or a poniard in the hand of an assassin.

The emperor's first step, after his arrival in Paris, was to summon a council of ministers, which he attended, and indulged in a fit of scolding every one present, more especially Talleyrand, whom he frightened into a display of almost abject humility. When his passion had passed off, however, he was ashamed of the anger in which he had indulged, and endeavoured to atone for it to those who had been its objects. After a very few days' rest at the Tuileries, he applied himself to the recruiting of his armies, and to negotiations with Russia and Prussia, with a view to induce them to stand aloof, if they did not give him active aid, in the conflict which he anticipated with Austria. The emperor Francis, affronted at not being invited to Erfurth, and naturally dissatisfied at the humiliating position in which he was placed, had renewed a familiar intercourse with England, which power had rejected the offered mediation of Russia between her and France; one ground for doing so being, that the deceitful prospect of a peace between Great Britain and France, might not discourage those nations who were seeking to exchange "a precarious and doubtful independence," for one of a more honourable and secure character. He had also sent prince Schwartzberg to St. Petersburg, to endeavour to induce Russia to forego her French alliance; but, at that time, Alexander remained firm to his personal engagements with Napoleon, and instructed count Romanzoff to propose, at Paris, a triple guarantee between Russia, Austria, and France, which Austria declined to accede to. The king of Prussia, like Alexander, professed fealty to his engagements with Napoleon; and thus Austria was again left alone to try the fortune of war with one who had hitherto been successful against every opponent. She was supported by the almost universal voice of the German people, instigated by the Tugenbund, wherever they were at liberty to express it. The Prussians were indignant at the supineness of their sovereign, and eager, once more, to try their strength with France; and the inhabitants of the other German states, whose sovereigns were in alliance with Napoleon, were equally hostile to that country. Still the archduke Charles, and other eminent Austrians, strongly discouraged the war, for which they thought the empire was by no means prepared; the army being inadequate to the extent of country it had to defend, notwithstanding the French force in Germany had been greatly weakened by the drafts for Spain.

The withdrawal of the most distinguished regiments for the Spanish campaign, was one of the principal reasons that induced the emperor Francis, and his more confidential advisers, to think that this was a favourable moment for throwing off the yoke which France had imposed, and for endeavouring to recover some of the lost possessions of the house of Hapsburg. By great efforts, the Austrian army had been raised to 300,000 infantry, 30,000 cavalry, and about 200,000 landwehr* and Hungarians. The regular army was divided into nine corps. Six under the archduke Charles, comprising at least 120,000 able-bodied men, were concentrated on the frontiers of Bavaria; a strong reserve being cantoned in Bohemia. In Italy, the archduke John was placed at the head of two corps, of 47,000 men, with 25,000 irregulars, in Carinthia, Carniola, and Istria. On the eastern frontier of the Tyrol, where the peasantry were ready to rise in insurrection against the Bavarian and French domination, the marquis Chastellar had 12,000 veterans; and the archduke Ferdinand, at the head of 30,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry, was ready to carry the war into the grand-duchy of Warsaw. It was the design of the Austrian government to commence operations, simultaneously, in that duchy, Franconia, Lombardy, and the Tyrol; and important successes were anticipated before the French government could collect any considerable force to oppose the imperial armies. But Napoleon had not been inactive. He had ordered troops from Spain; concentrated the garrisons of various fortresses he held in Germany, and replaced them with Saxo-Polish troops; called out the contingents of the German confederation; and raised more men in France itself: so that, before the first three months of 1809 were expired, he had an army of 200,000 effective men, divided into eight corps, under Berthier, Lannes, Davoust, Masséna, Lefebvre, Augereau, Bernadotte, and the king of Westphalia; with a reserve, under Bessières. These different corps, scattered at first, were ordered to concentrate as quickly as possible, around the Lech and on the Danube. They were called, collectively, the "army of Germany;" and Berthier was invested with the chief command till the arrival of the emperor.

While these military preparations were going on, both Austria and France kept their ministers at each other's courts; the subsequently celebrated prince (then baron) Metternich being the Austrian ambassador at Paris. The emperor Alexander also continued his attempts to mediate between the two powers, but in vain. At the same time, he was carrying on his designs against Sweden, the incapacity of whose monarch led to an insurrection; to his arrest on the 13th of March, his imprisonment at Drottingholm, and deposition; to the election of the duke of Sudermania as king of Sweden, under the title of Charles XIII.; and to the annexation of the whole of Finland, part of Bothnia, and the island of Aland to Russia. These events, however, caused little interest, in the midst of the excitement which prevailed throughout Europe from the anticipated hostilities. The lookers-on wondered who would strike the first blow, as, when both were prepared, each seemed loth to take the initiative. At length the arrest of a French courier by the Austrian authorities, under the supposition that he was conveying despatches from the French ambassador at Vienna to the French ministers at other German courts, revealing more than the court of Vienna wished to have known, led to retaliatory acts by Napoleon, who ordered the arrest of the Austrian couriers on all the roads to which the French troops had access. Baron Metternich soon after demanded his passports; and early in April hostilities commenced.

On the 9th of that month, the army of the archduke Charles was cantoned along the Inn, on the Franco-Bavarian frontier; the emperor being at head-quarters. On that day, the archduke sent an aide-de-camp to the king of Bavaria, with a letter, announcing that he had received orders from his imperial brother to advance, and to treat, as enemies, whoever should resist him. He was unwilling, however, to believe that German troops would offer opposition to a liberating army, which came to deliver Germany from its oppressors. The king of Bavaria's reply to this communication was, to put his troops, encamped on the Iser, at Munich, and Landshut, under the command of Lefebvre; and to remove from Munich to Augsburg. The letter addressed to his majesty, and a manifesto from the archduke Charles to the army, constituted the only declaration of war on the part of Austria. In the manifesto the archduke said—"When all attempts to preserve independence from the insatiable ambition of a foreign conqueror prove fruitless—when nations are falling around us, and when lawful princes are torn from the hearts of their subjects;—when, in fine, the dread of universal subjugation threatens even the happy states of Austria, and their peaceable, fortunate inhabitants—then does our country demand its deliverance from us, and we stand forth in its defence. On you, my brother-soldiers, are fixed the eyes of the universe, and of all those who still feel for national honour and national prosperity. You shall not incur the disgrace of being made the instruments of oppression; you shall not incur the disgrace of carrying on the endless war of ambition in distant climes; your blood shall never flow for foreign objects, or insatiable covetousness; nor on you shall the curse alight of annihilating distant nations, and over the bodies of the slaughtered defenders of their country, paving the way for a foreigner to an usurped throne. A happier lot awaits you; the liberty of Europe has taken refuge under your banners." They were then reminded of former victories; exhorted to observe discipline and moderation; and told, that it was "not the intention of their monarch to oppose foreign nations, but to deliver them; to form with their princes a lasting peace, and maintain the general welfare and security."

The Austrians crossed the Inn on the 9th of April, the same day that the archduke's letter was forwarded to the king of Bavaria. They marched in three columns towards the river Iser, and arrived on its banks on the 15th. The next day the entire army crossed that river at Landshut; the advanced guard driving back some Bavarian troops who disputed the passage, and who were compelled to retreat to the forest of Dürnbach, on the Danube, where two divisions of the Bavarian army, under the princely and general de Wrede, had already retired. The next day the army marched on the Danube, two corps being on the left, three in the centre, and one on the right. If the Austrians had been as energetic and prompt as they are brave, and if the archduke had not been controlled in his movements by the absurd routine mania of the Aulic Council, a large portion of the French force might now have been destroyed in detail: but the tide of Napoleon's fortunes had not yet turned. He had ordered Berthier, if the enemy broke ground before the 15th of April (by which time he expected to have his forces collected round Ratisbon), to concentrate his army on the Lech, round Donauwörth. If they did not move till after that date, then Ratisbon was to be the head-quarters; the right bank of the Danube being guarded from that city to Passau, in order to secure the supply of provisions and military stores by that river. On the 12th, however, he received intelligence, by telegraph, that the Austrians had crossed the Inn; and, at two o'clock on the morning of the 13th, he set off to join the army. He reached Donauwörth on the 17th, and assumed the chief command of the army, Berthier taking that of the first division.

Berthier was a bad strategist. He scattered his forces instead of concentrating them, having Davoust at Ratisbon, and Masséna on the Lech, at Augsburg, thirty-five leagues distant; whilst Lefebvre, De Wrede, and Oudinot were placed across Bavaria, in three lines, one behind the other, with several leagues between each; so that, had the archduke shown any activity, they might have all been destroyed in detail. The Austrians advanced, however, very leisurely, at the rate of about three leagues a-day; still, when the emperor arrived at Donauwörth, Davoust, at Ratisbon, with 60,000 men, was threatened by the archduke, at the head of 100,000. The emperor, when aware of the disposition of his forces, told Berthier, that but for his friendship, he should think he was betraying him. He immediately ordered Masséna to advance to Pfaffenhofen, nearly half-way to Neustadt; and Davoust to move in the direction of that town, and to form a junction with the Bavarians, Würtembergers, and Lefebvre, who had retired before the archduke Charles. At the same time, on the 18th of April, he addressed one of his spirited proclamations to his troops. "Soldiers!" it commenced, "the territory of the Confederation of the Rhine has been violated. The Austrian general supposes that we are to fly at the sight of his eagles, and abandon our allies to his mercy. I arrive with the rapidity of lightning in the midst of you. Soldiers! I was surrounded by your bayonets, when the emperor of Austria arrived at my bivouac in Moravia. You heard him implore my clemency, and swear an eternal friendship. Conquerors in three wars, Austria has owed everything to our generosity. Three times she has perjured herself! Our former successes are a sure guarantee of our future triumphs. Let us march then; and, in our aspect, let our enemy recognise his conquerors."

On the 18th of April, Davoust's army had quitted Ratisbon, with the exception of the 65th regiment, which was left to defend that city, with orders to close the gates, barricade the streets, and use every means in their power to retard the advance of the enemy. On the 19th, he commenced his march on Neustadt; while the archduke was advancing towards the city the French had just quitted, and where he ought to have been some days before. On that day there was much sharp fighting near the village of Thaun, on the banks of the Danube, between the divisions of the French army, under generals St. Hilaire and Friant (who, on the heights of Salhaupt and Tengen, covered the advance of Davoust's main body), and the Austrians, under the prince Hohenzollern and Louis of Lichtenstein. The contest continued nearly the entire day, fresh troops continually coming up; and at last there were 20,000 men engaged on each side. The combatants were separated by a violent thunder-storm, about 6 P.M., without either having gained a decisive advantage, and each having had about the same number (3,000) killed and wounded. That night Davoust arrived at Abensburg, on the Abens, sixteen miles from Ratisbon, where he bivouacked. Masséna also concentrated his army at Pfaffenhofen, having surprised an Austrian corps there of 5,000 men, which he soon dispersed. Oudinot had advanced towards Freysing; and Lefebvre, De Wrede, and Vandamme, with the contingents of the Confederation of the Rhine, were at Neustadt and Biburg.

On the 20th—the French army being disposed as stated in the last paragraph, and concentrated upon a line, extending about ten leagues in length—the Austrians were collected upon a tract of some extent, formed, near Ratisbon, by the Iser and the Danube; the masses being bivouacked round Echmühl. Several regiments were in villages between Mainburg and Ratisbon; Hohenzollern was at Hausen; Lichtenstein at Eglossheim; and Rosenberg at Dingling. They were scattered over a space several leagues broad—not in a line, but a semicircle, of which the Iser formed the base, and the bend of the Danube at Ratisbon, the arc; and the collective number of the different corps was not equal to that of the French, even after Napoleon had, on the morning of the 20th, detached Masséna to Landshut, in order to prevent the Austrians from reoccupying that place. On that day the French attacked the corps of the archduke Louis, who was marching from the Abens to join his brother. The corps of general Hiller came to his aid; but both were defeated and driven towards Landshut, where they were followed by a French division, headed by Napoleon in person. On the morning of the 21st, the pursued found themselves between two fires; Masséna having advanced close upon them in another direction. The fighting was most determined on both sides; but the Austrians had ultimately to retreat, leaving in the hands of the French 9,000 prisoners, thirty pieces of cannon, 600 ammunition waggons, 3,000 vehicles of various descriptions, and three pontoon trains. Masséna then took possession of Landshut.

On the 20th, the archduke Charles captured Ratisbon: the officer who was left to defend it, having no ammunition, was obliged to surrender. By this capture, 3,000 prisoners and an eagle fell into the hands of the imperialists. There was much fighting between detached corps of both armies on the 21st; and, on the 22nd, the battle of Echmühl was fought. It consisted of a series of daring attacks, and as gallant defences—Napoleon having brought up most of the corps engaged on the 19th, 20th, and 21st; and the archduke Charles having concentrated the various Austrian corps in the neighbourhood, under Kollowrath, and other commanders with whom he could open any communication. The victory remained with the French, mainly owing to the efforts of Davoust; but the aspect of the fight was varied during the day. The tremendous fire from the Austrian batteries repeatedly drove back the Würtembergers, who attacked Echmühl; and they did not succeed in entering the village till Lannes (who had only just joined the army, having arrived from Saragossa on the 19th) sent a detachment to attack the batteries in flank. There was also an encounter, unsurpassed in gallantry, between the corps of Rosenberg, some Würtembergers under Vandamme, and a division under Davoust, who had returned victorious from another quarter. The Austrians stood back to back; and whilst the infantry and artillery kept up a murderous fire, the imperial cuirassiers made repeated charges on the enemy. But Lannes, at last, by a brilliant charge with fresh troops, sabred the cannoniers and captured sixteen guns. Then the gallant imperialists were obliged to retreat. When the main body was driven back, and likely to be completely broken up and dispersed, twelve squadrons of the emperor's cuirassiers, and a large body of hussars, drew up in front of Eglossheim; and, as the pursuers advanced, they bore down upon them with a fury which was for a time irresistible. The combat was a terrific one; and the other contending parties are said to have "suspended their fire to await the issue. If the equipment of the Austrians had been equal to that of their opponents, they would, to all appearance, have been victorious: but they had only breastplates; whilst the French wore complete coats of mail." After losing two-thirds of their number, the former were obliged to succumb; but during the engagement, the artillery and infantry withdrew to the rear; and, as Napoleon found that the archduke had called up the reserve under Lichtenstein, which had not been engaged, he ordered the pursuit to be arrested. The army accordingly halted, and bivouacked on the field of battle. Their loss had been near 3,000 killed and wounded; that of the Austrians was about double the number: they also lost between 3,000 and 4,000 prisoners, twelve standards, and sixteen pieces of cannon. For his services in this engagement, Davoust received the title of duke of Echmühl.

According to the Austrian general Stutterheim—after this battle, the archduke had 60,000 troops round the walls of Ratisbon; the defeated corps having made for that city. As these men were greatly fatigued with four or five days' constant marching and fighting, and another defeat would have been utter ruin, his imperial highness resolved to cross the Danube, and retreat into Bohemia. This movement was effected on the 23rd of April, but not unmolested. The French were in motion early as well as the Austrians; and whilst the latter were engaged in throwing a bridge of boats across the river, and in passing over to the other side, the light cavalry of the former came up, and a fight ensued between them and the Austrian cavalry, who lost near 1,000 men. They gave way, and defiled through the town at full gallop, followed by the French, who were stopped at the gates. The Austrians made for the bridge of boats; and the French infantry and artillery under Lannes coming up, he ordered the guns to open on the bridge, which was soon broken; but the Austrians effected the passage with the loss of about a hundred men. Napoleon shortly after arrived with Davoust's division, and ordered the city to be bombarded. Volleys of shot and shell were poured in, and the place was soon on fire in several places: whilst this was going on, Napoleon was wounded in the foot. Ratisbon was at length taken; and the events of the day cost the Austrians about 2,000 men killed and wounded, and between 6,000 and 7,000 prisoners.

The results of the five days' operations, from the 19th to the 23rd of April, have seldom been exceeded. The fine Austrian army, which had, on the 18th, been collected on the right bank of the Danube, had lost, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, between 50,000 and 60,000 men, and was driven into the defiles of Bohemia, on the left bank of the river. More than a hundred pieces of cannon were taken, besides an immense quantity of ammunition, provisions, and other stores; and the road to Vienna was open to the victors, defended by only between 36,000 and 40,000 men, disheartened by defeat. The triumphant joy which these successes occasioned was, however, somewhat damped by the events in the Tyrol, Italy, and Poland. Hostilities commenced in the Tyrol on the 9th of April, when general Chastellar entered the mountainous range which separates Carinthia from the Italian

Tyrol: he was received with enthusiasm, the Tyrolese being most anxious to throw off the yoke of Bavaria and France. The archduke John set forward on the 10th, debouching by Cividale on Udine, driving in all the advanced posts, and compelling prince Eugene to retreat. There were sharp engagements in the valleys of the Upper Tagliamento, where the French left a great many dead; but, as usual, the slow and deliberate movements of the Austrians, allowed the prince to concentrate his forces, and he could easily have placed his troops in safety. On finding himself only slowly pursued, he halted between Pordenone and Sacile—two towns in Lombardy; leaving a strong rear-guard in the latter. This corps was attacked by the Austrians; and after defending themselves till their ammunition was exhausted, and 500 of them being killed, the rest surrendered prisoners. Instead of continuing his retreat, prince Eugene resolved to take the offensive; and he attacked the Austrians on the 16th, but was beaten, and compelled still to retire. In fighting, and in the retreat, the French lost more than 3,000 killed and wounded, and nearly as many prisoners: the Austrian killed and wounded were between 2,000 and 3,000. Prince Eugene was joined by general Macdonald soon after, to whom he gave the command of his right wing, and by whose advice he retired on the Adige till his army, still imposing in numbers, could be thoroughly reorganised. In the Tyrol, within a few days after general Chastellar had crossed the frontier, there were at least 20,000 enthusiastic mountaineers in arms, their principal leader being Andrew Hofer, an innkeeper, who had obtained a wonderful ascendancy over his countrymen. To these were added the 12,000 Austrians; and to oppose them there were only 3,000 or 4,000 French, and about the same number of Bavarian troops. Of course such a small force could offer no effectual resistance; and, before the end of April, both the German and Italian Tyrol had passed into the hands of Austria. In Poland, a Polish army, about 15,000 strong, under prince Poniatowski, was outnumbered and defeated by the Austrians, who occupied Warsaw. Added to this, a spirit of hatred to France continued to spread through Germany; and, in Prussia, the soldiers openly deserted to join the imperialists.

The intelligence of these reverses reached Napoleon at Ratisbon; and he was greatly annoyed. Knowing, however, that the most likely means to restore his fortunes in other quarters, would be to follow up his successes in Germany, he resolved to march upon Vienna. He sent Bessières and Lannes to pursue, on the road to that city, the beaten corps of the archduke Louis and Hiller; ordered Masséna to take and occupy the passes of Straubing, Passau, and Linz, forming the points of communication between Bavaria and Bohemia; dispatched Davoust to watch the motions of the archduke Charles; and detached a corps of Bavarians to reoccupy Munich, which had been taken by the Austrians under Jellachich. Napoleon remained at Ratisbon till he saw all these operations in the course of execution; and, on the 26th, he went to Landshut, joining the divisions under Bessières and Lannes, and proceeding along the high road, on the south side of the Danube, to Vienna. The rear of this division was protected by Vandamme, with 18,000 of the troops of the confederation. Davoust, with the remains of his army (40,000 strong), was to march in the same direction, as soon as Bernadotte, who had been ordered up with a Saxon force from Dresden, arrived.

The army advanced to the Traun, one of the mountain streams which descend from the lofty summits of the Alps to the great valley of the Danube. It falls through narrow ravines, and down steep hills, whose sides are clothed with pine, and enters the Danube just below Ebersberg—a long wooden bridge crossing the stream in front of the town, and a castle, standing on the overhanging, precipitous hills, commanding the passage. The Austrians were posted on the heights, and defended the bridge; and Masséna—who, after occupying the passes of Straubing, &c., had rejoined Bessières, and commanded the advanced guard—resolved to attack the position. It was defended by 35,000 men and eighty pieces of cannon, under general Hiller, who had been ordered by the archduke Charles, after the affairs of the 20th and 21st of April, to collect the scattered forces, and defend the road to the capital; and who, in his advance to his present position, had, on the 24th of April, encountered and beaten the French and Bavarians, under De Wrede, inflicting upon them a loss of 1,500 men. The fighting began by an attack on four battalions of Austrian grenadiers, who were posted on the left bank of the river, and ought to have been withdrawn: they were soon overpowered and cut to pieces. The passage of the bridge was gallantly contested; and when the mêlée was at its height, and the French, under general Cohorn, were driving the Austrians before them at the point of the bayonet, the imperialists, on the right bank, closed the gate on that side, and the artillery played upon the bridge, friend and foe falling alike under the showers of round shot, canister, and grape, which were poured upon them. To add to the confusion, several ammunition waggons blew up in the middle of the bridge; and whilst the Austrians, fired on by their comrades and their foes, were throwing themselves into the water, and were swept away by the torrent, many Frenchmen were hurled into the air by the explosion. The gate and flanking palisades were at length levelled by the pioneers; and then the fighting was carried into the streets of Ebersberg, and continued amidst burning houses and crumbling ruins, till the assailants were driven back to the bridge, which was again closed. Masséna, however, brought up fresh troops; but the bridge, and the street leading to it, were then so choked up by the bodies of the wounded and dead, that he was obliged to order the advancing troops to throw them into the river, and both were alike swept away by the rapid stream. The troops, notwithstanding, succeeded in effecting their passage across; and the fighting was resumed near Ebersberg. It continued for several hours; but at last, after the loss of not less than 6,000 men on each side, the Austrians were obliged to retire, and the passage to Vienna was left open. This was one of the most fearful actions that was ever fought; and one which was unnecessary, as Lannes could have turned the flank of the Austrians, and cleared the road without the terrible slaughter which was the result of Masséna's resolve to effect the passage by Ebersberg.

The archduke was, at this time, making forced marches, in order to reach Vienna, by a different road, before the French; having previously sent a messenger to Napoleon with a proposal for an exchange of prisoners, which he hoped would lead to delay, perhaps to negotiation, and an armistice; but which remained unanswered. Notwithstanding all his exertions, the French arrived first at the capital; and, on the 10th of May, their eagles were displayed before its walls. All the imperial family had left the city, except the archduke Maximilian, who defended it; and the archduchess Marie-Louisa, who was too ill to be removed. The city was summoned; and as surrender was refused, a bombardment commenced: but Napoleon was informed that the archduchess was in the palace, and, by his orders, no artillery was pointed in that direction: his future empress remained unhurt, therefore, amidst the destruction that was raging around. The city capitulated on the 12th, and, on the 13th, the French once more took possession of the capital of Austria. The emperor signalled his entrance by issuing a proclamation to his troops, in which he told them, that the inhabitants of Vienna, abandoned by their rulers, should be the objects of their regard. "I take," he said, "its good citizens under my especial protection; as to the turbulent and the wicked, they shall meet with exemplary justice. Let us exhibit," he continued, "no marks of haughtiness or pride; but regard our triumphs as a proof of Divine justice, which punishes by our hand the ungrateful and the perjured."

The occupation of Vienna did not put an end to the war. There were still two large armies on each side of the Danube, eager for victory. Napoleon had 100,000 men in Vienna, and concentrated between Lintz and that city; besides a reserve of 30,000, coming from the Upper Danube. The archduke Charles—whose tardy movements were at the time, and still remain, inexplicable—reinforced by the remains of the archduke Louis and general Hiller's divisions, had 100,000 men with him, ready for action, if the French crossed the Danube; which, after maturely considering his position, Napoleon resolved to do. That river, below Vienna, is divided into three streams, by the islands that intersect it. The French occupied these islands; one of them, Lobau, five miles to the south-east of Vienna, is nearest to the left bank of the river towards which the archduke Charles had been advancing, and where, about the 13th of May, he had concentrated his forces behind the villages of Aspern and Essling. Lobau was a favourable point for an army wishing to attempt the passage of the river. A still more favourable one was at Nussdorf, two miles north of Vienna; and Napoleon at first resolved to force the passage at both places, giving Masséna the command at Lobau, and Lannes at Nussdorf. There was, in the arsenal at Vienna, an immense supply of stores of every description; and from thence the emperor obtained all he needed for his enterprise; though it called for considerable labour and perseverance to adapt the means to the end. The attempt to cross by Nussdorf failed, and 600 Frenchmen were made prisoners on the island of Schwarze Laken, opposite that village. The passage at Lobau was effected. The troops were moved to Kaiser-Ebersdorf, a small town opposite Lobau, on the 18th and 19th of May. Bridges had been laid from Kaiser-Ebersdorf to Lobau, and from Lobau to the left bank of the river; and several divisions, under Boudet, Molitor, Lasalle, Ferraud, Nansouty, Legrand, Marulaz, and Espagne, crossed on the 20th. They found a wood on the opposite bank, from which an Austrian detachment was expelled; and beyond were the villages of Aspern on the left, and Essling on the right, with the vast plain of Marchfeld between them, stretching to the river. The archduke Charles, who had been enabled to watch the movements of the French with a telescope, had removed his advanced posts from the Marchfeld to the Bisamberg—confident that the French were placing themselves in his power, and that he should be able to overwhelm them. One of these advanced guards—a cavalry regiment—as the French moved upon the villages, made a charge upon one of their divisions, but was received by a sharp fire from some voltigeurs, who had taken refuge in a ditch, and compelled to retire. This was the commencement of the battle of Aspern.

That battle (sometimes called the battle of Essling) was continued through the 21st and 22nd of May, being only interrupted by the few hours of night. The French, on landing, established themselves in the two villages, and it was the object of the Austrians to drive them back to the river. The latter had the advantage in numbers, and had a great superiority in artillery. The slaughter on both sides was great; the villages were several times taken and retaken; and, at night, on the 21st, the Austrians occupied Aspern, except a few houses; but Essling remained in possession of the French. During the night, 20,000 additional troops were landed from Lobau, with a supply of ammunition, of which the French were greatly in want. The next morning the battle was renewed. The Austrians, in the form of a semicircle, moved upon the villages; their right on Aspern, where a strong detachment of their army had intrenched themselves in the cemetery; their left on Essling. Whilst the villages were gallantly defended, Napoleon ordered an attack upon the Austrian centre; and one of the most bloody contests on record again raged during the day. The divisions of the French army, who fought so bravely on the 21st, and those of Lannes and Oudinot, which, with the imperial guard, had landed during the night, were opposed by the Austrian corps of Hiller, Bellegarde, Hohenzollern, and Rosenberg. All fought as if not merely the fate of monarchies, but their own personal existence and welfare, depended on the issue. Twice the archduke himself led the Austrians in their charges on the French; repeatedly, as on the previous day, were Aspern and Essling taken and retaken; and victory appeared about to descend alternately on either host. Before evening came on, it appeared certain that the French must retreat; and, as the great bridge between the mainland and the island of Lobau had been carried away by the force of the stream, united to that of some heavy barks sent down by the archduke, their position appeared desperate. Napoleon invested Masséna with the command-in-chief, and returned to the island to arrange means for conveying back the wounded and the survivors. The fighting was again continued till night came on; and then, while the Austrians were taking some repose, the French were busily engaged in getting back to Lobau. Masséna superintended all the movements during the night; and the French boast, that not one wounded, not a single gun, nor even a cartridge, were left behind; and certainly, that the troops were able to get back to Lobau at all, was not the least remarkable circumstance connected with this memorable battle. The loss was immense. Thiers says, that it may be estimated to have been, on the side of the Austrians, 26,000 or 27,000; and 15,000 or 16,000 on the part of the French; marshal Lannes and general St. Hilaire being amongst the killed. The Austrians say that they had eighty-seven superior officers, and 4,200 privates killed, and 16,300 wounded; that they buried 7,000 dead Frenchmen on the field, that 5,000 wounded fell into their hands, and 29,773 wounded were carried to the hospitals of Vienna. Their account is likely to be the most correct: at all events, the French were incapable, for the time, of making any other movement; and a pause in the terrible struggle took place.

Napoleon left Masséna in command at Lobau, and at midnight, on the 22nd of May, crossed the river to Vienna. There he employed himself in reorganising his army. As the aspect of affairs had changed in Italy, where prince Eugene Beauharnais, aided by Macdonald, had succeeded in driving back the archduke John, who was compelled to recross the Alps; and as the archduke Charles had summoned Chastellar to join him from the Tyrol—the army of the prince, and a part of the corps under marshal Lefebvre from the Tyrol, were expected to join the army of Germany; and all the detached corps, in different parts of the confederation, were summoned to Vienna. The island of Lobau was fortified, and Napoleon took care that nothing was wanting to the comfort of the troops, who remained inactive for six weeks, during which he was employed in bringing up reinforcements. All the various corps on which he relied appear to have joined him about the time expected; prince Eugene, on his route, inflicting a serious defeat upon the retreating Austrians, under the archduke John, whom he had overtaken, under the walls of Raab, in Hungary, on the 14th of June. On the 22nd that fortress surrendered to general Lauriston. Presburg was also taken; and much of the artillery in those two fortresses was removed to Vienna. To facilitate the passage between Lobau and Vienna, a wide bridge, for the artillery and cavalry, was constructed on piles—a wonderful work, in the circumstances under which it was undertaken and completed; and a bridge of boats was thrown across the river for the infantry. Napoleon had also a number of flat-bottomed boats constructed to facilitate his operations. By the 1st of July the corps of Masséna, Oudinot, Davoust, Bernadotte, prince Eugene, Macdonald, Marmont, and De Wrede, were collected at Vienna. The imperial guard were also there; the entire force amounting to 150,000 men, of whom 26,000 were cavalry, and 12,000 artillery, serving 550 guns.

During the six weeks which Napoleon employed in these operations, the Austrians were baffled in Poland by the prince Poniatowski; and the Poles, contrary to the advice of Napoleon, and the pledges he had given to Russia, were insisting, in all their proclamations, upon the restoration of their country; whilst the Russian troops, sent to keep the Austrians in check, were, both officers and men, evincing a disposition to join them. Throughout Germany, the spirit of opposition to France, strengthened and invigorated by the result of the battle of Aspern, was still spreading. The duke of Brunswick Oels, immediately subsequent to that battle, raised a corps of volunteers, who wore a light-blue uniform, with a death's-head and cross-bones on their cloaks, which obtained for them the name of the Death's-head Hussars. This corps was frequently heard of from that time to the peace. Their first exploits were against Napoleon's ally, the king of Saxony, who, with his family, fled from his dominions, and took refuge in France. The duke of Brunswick occupied Dresden; the landwehr, from Bohemia, under general Aurende, overran the provinces of Saxony; Franconia was occupied by another corps, under Radivojivich; Leipsic, Bayreuth, and Bamberg fell into the hands of these friends of Austria; and when Napoleon had succeeded in concentrating so many troops in the island of Lobau and near Vienna, the insurrection against France had spread into Suabia and Westphalia; whilst a chain of Austrian posts, extending from the Elbe, by Nuremberg and Stockach, to the mountains of the Tyrol, entirely cut off the communications between France and the "grand army" of Germany.

It is difficult, under these circumstances, to account for the fact, that the archduke Charles remained, apparently, so long inactive, and allowed Napoleon to complete his arrangements, without making any attack upon the isle of Lobau, or endeavouring to retake Vienna. It is said that the archduke John disobeyed his orders, which, if they had been properly executed, would have enabled him to form a junction with Jellachich and Kollowrath, and to have thrown at least 60,000 men into the rear of Napoleon; whereas he contrived to keep in the way of prince Eugene, and had his forces entirely cut up and dispersed before he could join either those generals or his brother. But Charles did little himself. He recruited the corps engaged at Aspern and Essling; stationing Bellegarde's, Hohenzollern's, and Rosenberg's divisions, about 75,000 men, at the extremity of the plain of Marchfeld, which terminates in a chain of small hills, extending from Neusiedel to Wagram. This position might have been rendered impregnable, but little was done to defend it. He intrenched the villages of Aspern, Essling, and Enzersdorf; but took no adequate steps to prevent the French from again landing on that bank of the Danube; and although he had three other corps in the neighbourhood, making his total force about 140,000 men, with 400 pieces of cannon, he remained inactive till the French again descended, like a torrent, upon his position.

Napoleon, who had resided at the palace of Schönbrunn, quitted it on the 1st of July, and established his head-quarters on the island of Lobau. The troops, on the right bank of the Danube, began to remove to that island on the 3rd; on the 4th they were all collected there; and, in the night, they commenced their further migration to the north, or left bank of the river. There was nothing to oppose them but a redoubt and six cannon, at a place called Maison Blanche, on the Marchfeld; and an advanced guard at Enzersdorf. These were soon in the hands of the French; and the troops continued crossing during the night—some armed boats cruising above and below Lobau, firing in every direction where anything like an enemy was supposed to be; and frequent discharges were directed on the unfortunate town of Enzersdorf. This firing, kept up on so many points, distracted the attention of the Austrians, several corps of whom marched down to the river in different directions; but they effected nothing. The landing of the French was continued through the night, and the next day. The Austrian divisions which opposed them were everywhere compelled to fall back: before night, Enzersdorf, Sachsen-gang, Raschdorf, and Rutzendorf—small villages on the Marchfeld—were in the possession of the French, with 3,000 prisoners; and 2,000 Austrians were put hors de combat. The Austrian line now extended from Neusiedel to Wagram, along the line of hills already mentioned; from Wagram it stretched out towards Adersklau, and was continued by Gerasdorf and Stanressdorf, to the Danube. The left, at Neusiedel, was commanded by prince Rosenberg, with whom was Hohenzollern's corps; in the centre were Bellegarde's corps and the archduke's headquarters; on their right were three corps d'armée, under Kollowrath, Klenau, and the prince de Reuss. The French formed one long line, extending for three leagues in front of the Austrians. Their right was under Davoust and Oudinot; in the centre was prince Eugene and the army of Italy; on the left, Bernadotte with his Saxons, and Masséna's four divisions. Marmont's corps, a corps of Bavarians, the imperial guard, and the cuirassiers, formed a reserve.

The next day, the battle of Wagram was fought. An attack made on the centre of the Austrians in the night of the 5th, had been signally defeated; and the archduke Charles and his officers did not retire to rest, but employed themselves in making arrangements for the contest which both sides had determined should take place the next day. The orders issued, however, were not complied with as they ought to have been; and hence, early in the day, some confusion ensued. Prince Rosenberg began the action at 4 A.M., being earlier than he should have done; and some other movements of the left disconcerted the arrangements of the archduke. However, the action soon became general, and 150,000 men, with 1,100 pieces of cannon, were arrayed, says Thiers, against each other. After some sharp fighting, the French left and centre had the worst of the mêlée, and were beaten back; whilst Davoust, on the right, with difficulty maintained his ground. Then Napoleon ordered a concentrated attack on the Austrian centre, which, though bravely resisted, was in the end successful; and Davoust, at last, succeeded in breaking and driving back the left. The conquerors of the French left were now taken in flank, and obliged to retire. The fighting continued till 4 P.M., when the archduke, finding all his positions forced, and disappointed in the arrival of the archduke John, whom he had ordered to advance on the 4th, gave directions for a retreat. He withdrew into Moravia, where he was joined by his brother, whose dilatory movements brought him near Wagram in the evening of the 6th. The French bivouacked on the field, Napoleon creating Berthier prince of Wagram, and raising MacDonald, Oudinot, and Marmont to the rank of marshals before the day closed.

The loss in this battle was very heavy on both sides. The French accounts state that they had between 6,000 and 7,000 killed, including three generals, and about 15,000 wounded. The Austrian loss was greater; but still the archduke had a large army in the field. Napoleon, therefore, pursued him with great caution, as he did not know what forces might be following in his rear. On the 11th of July, the two armies again encountered at Znaim, in Moravia, about fifty miles to the north of Vienna. Fighting commenced, but was interrupted by the archduke proposing an armistice, which Napoleon accepted. The terms were discussed, and signed, on the 12th, by them. The Austrians agreed immediately to evacuate the Tyrol, the Vorarlberg, and the Confederation of the Rhine; and to authorise plenipotentiaries to meet those of France, at Schönbrunn, for the purpose of concluding a definitive peace. In the interval, before the plenipotentiaries met, Napoleon established himself in the palace of Schönbrunn, and immediately commenced organising his armies, and placing them in such positions as to give him a commanding influence on the negotiations. The "grand army" was stationed in camps formed at Krems, Znaim, Brünn, Vienna, Presburg, Edenberg, and Grätz. All the troops at these positions were reclothed; the cavalry were remounted; the artillery was in capital order; and the entire force in a better condition than at any time during the war. Independent of this army, one of 30,000 infantry, and 5,000 cavalry, was formed, under Junot, to keep guard over Suabia, Franconia, and Saxony; and to check the movements of the duke of Brunswick Oels and general Kienmayer, who were still in the field. The army of Lefebvre in the Tyrol was also recruited; as, although the Austrian troops were withdrawn, the Tyrolese refused to submit. Another army was put in course of formation at Antwerp, in pursuance of the intention of the emperor to make that port one of his most prominent points of defence

The negotiations were opened at Altenburg, a small town of Hungary, between Raab and Comorn, where the emperor Francis had retired. The plenipotentiaries were M. Champigny, on the part of France, and baron Metternich and M. de Nugent, chief of the staff of the army, on the part of Austria. The first conference did not take place till more than a month after the battle of Wagram; and then the demands put forth by Napoleon were refused by the imperial negotiators. At first the proceedings went on very slowly. Napoleon had completed the re-organisation of his army; and as the troops were living at the expense of Austria, he was in no especial hurry to conclude the treaty. For some time he adhered to his original demands; whilst the Austrians put all the arts of diplomacy in practice to produce delay, being anxious to know the result of an expedition which the English had dispatched, towards the end of July, to the coast of Flanders. It had been for some time preparing; but by the influence of the imbecility and incapacity which marked the British councils at that period, it had been delayed, till Austria was again struck down, and a diversion on her side was useless: had it been sent to Spain, it would in all probability have much sooner put an end to the war in that country.

This expedition was one of the most powerful and best-appointed armaments that ever was dispatched from British ports, being composed of thirty-five ships of the line, about 200 smaller vessels and transports, and 40,000 troops. Sir Richard Strachan commanded the fleet, and the earl of Chatham the army. The expedition sailed from Portsmouth, Dover, and the Downs, on the 28th of July. Its objects were, to take Flushing; destroy the Scheldt fleet, consisting of some fine new vessels under admiral Missiesey; burn the dockyards at Antwerp, and render the Scheldt unnavigable, by sinking masses of stones, concrete, &c., in the channels. If the fleet and army had made at once for Antwerp, all these objects might have been effected. But much time was lost before Flushing, which did not surrender, after a fierce bombardment, till the 16th of August; and then there was a difference of opinion between the admiral and the general as to the best course to be pursued. The former wanted the troops to land, with their matériel, and march to Batz, one of the forts which defend the Scheldt before Antwerp is reached; but the earl of Chatham would have all conveyed to that fort in the vessels, alleging the difficulty of traversing a country so intersected with arms of the sea, canals, dykes, &c. Ten days more were spent in working the transports, gun-boats, and some of the ships of the line up the east and west branches of the Scheldt; and when the main river was reached, the army was so weakened by sickness, and it was found that the delay had enabled the French to take such decisive measures to defend Antwerp, that it was thought advisable, by a council of war, summoned by the earl of Chatham, not to proceed any further. When the news of the expedition first reached Paris, Fouché, then acting as minister of the police and the interior, proposed calling out the national guard. The measure was opposed by his colleagues, but approved by the emperor, as soon as he was aware of the state of affairs; and Bernadotte, who had returned to Paris, was sent by Fouché to take the command at Antwerp, in the place of king Louis, who had marched there with 5,000 Dutch troops. The prince-marshal, in conjunction with admiral Missiesey, had adopted those measures for the defence of the city, which caused the British officers to think that an attack would not succeed; and on communicating with the government at London, they were authorised to return to England, leaving a garrison to occupy Flushing and the island of Walcheren, on which it is situated. Up to that period, 11,000 or 12,000 troops had been put hors de combat by the miasmatic Walcheren fever; and those left at Flushing suffered severely. At length, in December, the island was evacuated, the fortifications of Flushing being blown up.

This expedition—and its result again greatly dimmed the military fame of England, which general Jomini said, though it had declined for a century, was completely restored by the battle of Vimiera—was a piece of good fortune for Napoleon. He wanted men much, and the levy of the national guard gave him 80,000, which he could not otherwise have obtained—for, once enrolled, he would not suffer them to be disbanded; whilst the withdrawal of the English force, without having effected its most important object, disposed Austria to be less tenacious in resisting the demands of France. In September, prince John de Lichtenstein and M. de Bubna were substituted as plenipotentiaries for M. Metternich and De Nugent; and they at last succeeded in bringing to a successful close the important commission entrusted to them. During the progress of the negotiations, so much ill-will, however, was manifested by the court of Austria, that Napoleon, having recruited his army to the amount of 150,000 men, with 500 pieces of flying artillery, and 300 large cannon in the fortresses, was on the point of recommencing hostilities. A large part of his force was concentrated near Vienna; and on the 12th of October, when reviewing these troops at Schönbrunn, a young man was apprehended, with a large unsheathed knife in his possession, who wanted to get near the emperor to assassinate him. His name was Staaps; and after being some time in prison, he was shot. At length, on the 14th of October, the treaty was signed, six days only being allowed for its ratification. Though the terms, mitigated considerably from those first proposed, were still both severe and humiliating, the emperor Francis was not in a position to refuse ratifying them; and thus peace was once more restored. —By this treaty, his imperial majesty surrendered a large extent of territory. Salzburg, and a part of Upper Austria, were annexed to the Rhenish confederation; part of Bohemia, with Cracow and Western Galicia, were added to the duchy of Warsaw; a part of Eastern Galicia increased the already extensive empire of Russia; whilst Trieste, Carniola, Friuli, Villach, and portions of Croatia and Dalmatia, were added to France; thus connecting the kingdom of Italy with Illyria, depriving Austria of her only remaining seaport, and reducing the Adriatic coast, from one extremity to the other, under the control of Napoleon. The territory given up by the emperor, comprised 45,000 square miles, with a population of about 4,000,000. There were also secret articles to the treaty, by which the emperor Francis engaged to limit the Austrian army to 150,000 men, and to pay 85,000,000 francs (100,000,000 francs were at first demanded), in addition to the millions already received by Napoleon. This sum was to be considered as a full discharge of what it was alleged the Austrian provinces owed; and Vienna was not to be evacuated, till 30,000,000 francs were paid. —The day after the treaty was signed, Napoleon left Vienna and proceeded to Parma, where he gave directions for the transfer of most of the army serving in Germany, to Spain. Having received intelligence of the ratification being effected, and that the evacuation of Vienna was commenced,* he set out for Fontainebleau, which he reached on the 26th of October.

Peace now reigned on the continent, except in Spain and the Tyrol. In the latter, the insurgents maintained their ground for some time; and inflicted a most terrible defeat upon a division of the French and Bavarian army, in the valley of the Inn, in the month of September. But they could not maintain themselves against the force that was sent into their mountains; and Austria made no stipulations for them during the negotiations. Soon after the peace was signed, Hofer and most of their leaders being prisoners, the brave Tyrolese submitted. The gallant innkeeper was tried at Mantua before a court-martial, and shot on the 20th of February, 1810; and about thirty other Tyroleans shared the same fate. A friendly biographer of Napoleon remarks, on this melancholy episode in the history of the Tyrol—"It is impossible to decide whether the heartless passiveness of the emperor Francis, or the tyrannous revenge of the emperor Napoleon, is the more to be execrated in this transaction."

When Napoleon arrived at Fontainebleau, he found many things demanding his attention; and M. Thiers describes, as "the most serious and distressing in the list," the affairs of Rome. After the occupation of that city by general Miollis, the pope took up his residence in the Quirinal; and as he refused to accept of anything from the emperor, he was reduced to such necessities as to be obliged to pledge the tiara, which had been the gift of the latter on his coronation. As no entreaties could bring the pontiff to support Napoleon's views, on the 17th of May the emperor issued a decree, declaring "the states of the pope reunited to the French empire." He alleged, as a reason for this new spoliation, that "Charlemagne, emperor of the French, his august predecessor, made a donation of various territories to the bishops of Rome," as fiefs; but the union of temporal and spiritual authority in the popes "being inconsistent with the safety of the French armies, the tranquillity and well-being of the people, and the dignity and integrity of the empire," he resumed the grants. Rome was declared an imperial and free city; and a "constitutional régime" was ordered to be organised, to come into effect on the 1st of January, 1810. The reception of this decree, and the union of the papal states to the empire, were announced, on the 20th of June, by a discharge of artillery, and the display of the tricoloured flag from the castle of St. Angelo. The pope replied by issuing a bull of excommunication against the emperor, and against all who were promoters, advisers, and counsellors, or who assisted in the execution, of the acts which deprived him of his temporal sovereignty. Copies of this bull, notwithstanding the presence of the French troops, were placarded about Rome, and the people insulted those troops in the streets. A popular commotion was apprehended; and, on the night of the 5th of July, general Radet entered the Quirinal, seized the persons of the pope and cardinal Pacca, and conveyed them, by Florence, Alessandria, and Mondovi, across the Alps, and by Grenoble, to Savona. The pope was taken to the latter place by the direction of Napoleon, who, at the same time, gave orders for the removal of the cardinals, the generals of the several religious orders, the members of the Roman chancery, the members of the courts of the Dataria and the Penitenza, and the pontifical archives, to Paris.—This treatment of the pope did not meet with the approval of the French; and public opinion, towards the close of 1809, was again tending against the emperor. Fouché, Bernadotte, and Talleyrand secretly fanned the flame of discontent. The old royalists, roused by the anger excited amongst all good catholics at the seizure of the pope, again began to bestir themselves; and the doubtful battle of Essling; the defeat at Talavera; the expedition to the Scheldt, causing, as it did, the levy of the national guard—all contributed to strengthen the rising feeling of dislike of the Napoleonic rule; which, though checked amongst the populace by the events of the campaign and the peace—so glorious for France—was never extinguished amongst the commercial and upper classes.

Leaving the events of the peninsular war for a continuous narrative in subsequent chapters, we may remark here, that the events of the year 1809, in other quarters, were not very important, but they were uniformly unfavourable to France. A small English fleet was sent to the West Indies, which captured Martinique on the 23rd of February, and Cayenne was taken soon after.—In the month of April, several French ships of the line were blockaded in the inner roads of the Isle d'Aix, by a British squadron, inferior to the French both in number of vessels and the weight of metal. The French were well protected. The Isle of Aix, which had a garrison of 2,000 men, with thirty long 36-pounders, and several mortars mounted on batteries, covered them on one side; and on the other was the Isle of Oléron, also bristling with cannon and works. In addition, long booms were projected from each side of the harbour, converging at the extremities, so as to form two sides of a triangle, the base towards the British fleet. "This formidable obstacle" (says lord Dundonald, in his Autobiography of a Seaman, published in 1860) "was composed of large spars, bound by chains, and moored, along its whole double line, with heavy anchors at appropriate intervals; forming the most stupendous structure of the kind on record." The British government deemed it very desirable to destroy this fleet; and, as lord Gambier objected to the use of fire-ships (the only means of assaulting it), which he described as "a horrible mode of warfare;" adding, that "the attempt was hazardous, if not dangerous"—lord Cochrane (now the earl of Dundonald) was employed. His lordship—who had acquired considerable knowledge of chemistry when a boy, his father being a great experimentalist—had an explosive vessel constructed, which he himself, with five volunteers, guided into the harbour, and his lordship set fire to the fuse. The terrific explosion of this vessel shattered the boom, and opened a clear passage for the fire-ships; which, however, conducted by less steady hands, did no other damage than that of alarming the French crews, who cut their cables; and every vessel except two—the Foudroyant and Cassard—drifted on shore; where they might all have been destroyed the next morning, but for the unaccountable conduct of lord Gambier, who, at fourteen miles' distance, remained immovable, notwithstanding Cochrane's signals (which were duly acknowledged), demanding assistance, as "the enemy's ships could be destroyed." Cochrane, in his little frigate Impérieuse (to which he had returned when he had fired the explosion vessel), was, when the tide turned and floated the French vessels, attacked by the Calcutta, the Aquilon, and the Ville de Varsovie. Lord Gambier then sent ships to his aid. The three vessels were burned, the crews escaping; and the result of the affair was, that the French fleet was partly destroyed, and the vessels which escaped were so much damaged, that they were rendered useless for the time, and had to undergo a thorough repair. All might have been destroyed or captured, had lord Gambier properly supported Cochrane. The admiral was brought to a court-martial on his return to England, but was acquitted.—In the autumn, on the 1st of October, the Ionian Isles were taken possession of by lord Collingwood; and on the 25th of the same month, a French squadron was chased on shore and destroyed, off the mouth of the Rhone.

NAPOLEON did not return to Paris till the 14th of November, 1809. During the time he remained at Fontainebleau he had received Josephine, all the members of his family—of whom Louis, Jerome, and Murat, had no reason to be pleased with their reception—and many of the kings and princes, his allies; and also his ministers. Whilst he did not neglect business, he partook of pleasure, hunting the stag being his favourite pastime. He made a point of being on horseback several hours in the day, and of having that fact noted in the Moniteur, to show that rumours, with respect to his health being undermined and failing, were unfounded. He appears, also, to have assumed a greater degree of dignity, and an air of more importance, than had previously characterised him. Cambacérès, in describing his first interview with him, after his return from Vienna, says—"He had an air as if he were stalking about amidst his glory;" mixed with great haughtiness. Doubtless he was then thinking of the important change he was about to make in his domestic relations.

He had long been desirous of a heir of his own body to succeed him in the empire, and there was no hope of issue by Josephine: a divorce was, therefore, resolved upon. As far back as 1807, Fouché had divined the emperor's intentions in this respect; and, without authority from Napoleon, he broke the matter to the empress, for which he was severely rebuked. Though then carried no further, Josephine never ceased to think of the communication made to her; and Napoleon's altered behaviour, when he returned from Vienna in 1809, convinced her that the time was come when she was to lose, from no fault of her own, that position in which, with all her errors of omission or commission, she had won "golden opinions" from the great majority of those with whom she came in contact, by her kindness and affability. It was on the 30th of November that the emperor announced to her his intention to annul their marriage. Prince Eugene Beauharnais and the queen Hortense had been summoned to the Tuileries, that they might support their mother by their presence; but though the communication was made with great feeling—Napoleon speaking of his love to her, which had conferred upon him his only happy moments, and attributing his conduct entirely to motives of state; and though she had long been prepared for it—the announcement overwhelmed her with affliction: she fainted, and was removed in a state of insensibility from the room. On the 15th of December, the civil contract was formally dissolved, in the emperor's cabinet in the Tuileries, in the presence of the empress-mother, the queen of Spain, the king and queen of Holland, the king and queen of Naples, the king and queen of Westphalia, the princess Borghese, the chancellor Cambacérès, and the count Regnaud de Saint Jean d'Angely—the two latter acting as officiers de l'état civil for the imperial family. Napoleon, in their presence, announced "the resolution to which he and the empress, his dear spouse, had come." * * * "The policy of his monarchy, the interest and the necessity of his people," rendered it necessary that he "should leave to children after him, inheritors of his love for the people, the throne on which Providence had placed him." He had given up the hope of having children by his well-beloved spouse—but, at the age of forty, he "might entertain the hope of living long enough to bring up, after his own mind, and in his own views, the children it should please Providence to give him," from another source. Therefore the marriage was dissolved with her who "had embellished fifteen years of his life, the memory of which would remain engraved on his heart." Napoleon pronounced this speech without any signs of emotion, his voice being clear and steady, and his attitude firm. Josephine, on the contrary, could not speak—her sobs choking her voice. She put a paper into the hands of M. Regnaud, to read for her, assenting to the proposition of the emperor; and after the senatus consulte had been drawn up, declaratory of the dissolution of the marriage, Cambacérès had to guide her hand to sign it. The next day she left the Tuileries for Malmaison, never more to return; but she retained her rank as empress, with an annual income of 2,000,000 francs. There was some difficulty about the religious contract. The pope was the proper person to dissolve this contract—but he would not interfere. The arch-chancellor Cambacérès, however, summoned a council of bishops, who decided that the marriage was contracted without witnesses, and celebrated by cardinal Feschè, who not being a curé, was not a proper person to celebrate it; and it was, therefore, void: thus Napoleon became free.

As soon as the emperor had concluded the proceedings connected with his divorce, he took steps to contract an alliance with some distinguished member of an imperial or royal family. Three ladies were mentioned—the grand-duchess Anne, sister to the emperor of Russia; the daughter of the king of Saxony; and the grand-duchess, Maria-Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria. The first application was made to the emperor of Russia, who referred the case to his mother, the dowager-empress. This caused considerable delay, during which Alexander induced Caulaincourt, the French ambassador, to sign a convention, stipulating that the kingdom of Poland should never be re-established; that the names of Poland and Pole should disappear in all acts; that the grand-duchy of Warsaw should not be enlarged; that the Polish orders of knighthood should be abolished; and that the engagements should be binding upon the king of Saxony, as grand-duke of Warsaw. Napoleon refused to ratify this convention; and no definite answer being returned by Alexander—whilst the king of Saxony and the emperor of Austria were both anxious for the alliance—on the 6th of February, 1810, he resolved to decline the Russian, and to fix upon the Austrian, bride. The next day a messenger was sent to Vienna, to make a formal demand of the hand of Maria-Louisa; which was at once accorded. Marshal Berthier was then sent to Vienna as ambassador extraordinary; who, on the 8th of March, made the necessary diplomatic arrangements. The marriage ceremony was performed on the 11th; the archduke Charles being proxy for Napoleon. On the 13th, the new empress left Vienna; on the 27th, Napoleon met her at Compiègne, where they remained till the 30th. On the next day the civil marriage took place at St. Cloud: the religious ceremony was repeated at Paris on the 2nd of April, in the Tuileries. On that day, Napoleon made a triumphal entry into Paris, passing through the Arc de l'Etoile, with the empress by his side; that monument, the foundation of which had but recently been laid, being temporarily erected for the occasion, so as to present nearly the appearance it has at the present day. At the Tuileries, all the members of the imperial family received the imperial pair; and the empress's train was borne by the queens of Spain, Holland, Naples, and Westphalia, to the chapel, where the ecclesiastical ceremony was performed. A household was formed for her, composed of members of the ancient noblesse; and in everything the pomp and ceremony of the old régime was revived, whilst its splendour and magnificence were exceeded.

Napoleon now seemed to be in possession of all he ever aspired to—imperial rank; an alliance with one of the oldest royal houses on the continent; despotic power in France; and, apparently, the unlimited control of Western Europe. But the causes which finally occasioned his overthrow were, even then, accumulating and gathering strength; and his marriage with Maria-Louisa, so gratifying to his pride, was not the least of those causes; for, whilst the French people disliked the Austrian alliance, that with France was equally unpopular in Austria and throughout Germany. Though Alexander had shown so much hesitation and delay in returning a decisive answer to Napoleon's suit for the hand of his sister, yet the choice of Maria-Louisa also displeased him; and his doubt and distrust of his ally, from the period of the marriage, were very ill disguised. At the moment, however, all was sunshine on the surface; and whilst it appeared that the republican faction had ceased to exist, the royalist and clerical party seemed disposed to rally round the court.

The legislative session of 1810 opened on the 1st of February, and closed on the 21st of April. It was not an unfruitful one, as the penal code, a law regulating the number of judges, and one for providing for the expense of religious worship in the communes, were passed. The penal code enumerated 480 crimes, of which 220 were offences against the state. These offences comprised the concealing of a knowledge of crimes contemplated against the government; joining illegal societies; publishing seditious writings, prints, or caricatures; and many similar offences, which were classed as lese-majesty, and punishable with the galleys, or imprisonment from two to five years; whilst the higher crimes of actively engaging in schemes against the imperial régime, were punishable with death. Eight state prisons were established at Saumur, Ham, If, Landskrown, Pierre Chatel, Fenestrelles, Campiano, and Vincennes; where prisoners were committed on a warrant from the private council of the emperor, a report of the minister of police, or of public justice. They were confined au secret; all correspondence with any one outside the walls was prohibited; any gaoler who permitted or connived at such correspondence, to be dismissed from office, and imprisoned for six months. In these prisons, many distinguished individuals—not only Frenchmen, but Italians, Germans, and Swiss—were confined during the continuance of the imperial régime; an order from Napoleon, from his minister of police, or from his council, being sufficient to ensure the arrest of any person in any of those countries. All classes were found in these prisons; where the old revolutionists, violent democrats, and the wildest of innovators, were associated with the staunch adherents of the house of Bourbon; the worshippers of the goddess of Reason with the pious ecclesiastic; the roué and the vagabond with the honest and honourable observer of the laws of God and man. The majority of these prisoners were of the classes above the middle and lower ranks: in those, the despotism of Napoleon, “unparalleled for rigour and severity in modern times”—and which a decree of March 10th, 1810, re-establishing lettres de cachet under another name, gave him increased facilities for exercising—experienced few or no symptoms of resistance till towards the close of his career. Then the pressure of the conscription,* the terrible loss of life occasioned by his wars—which left fearful gaps in every family in the kingdom—produced a revulsion of feeling, which essentially diminished his popularity, and led to the return of the Bourbons.

Napoleon never lost sight of the measures he deemed necessary to control public opinion. While busied with the arrangements connected with his marriage, he was also occupied with the laws connected with the press; and, on the 5th of February, he issued a decree, establishing a director-general of the book-trade; subjecting all books to a rigorous censorship; and obliging all publishers and printers to take out licences, and take an oath to obey all his restrictive obligations. As this decree gave him the command of the press, so the imperial university, which he established, gave him the control of the education of his subjects; for its economy was entirely in his hands. He nominated the chancellor, or grand-master, with his salary of 150,000 francs per annum; the treasurer, the ten councillors, and the fifty inspectors, who had under their surveillance all the educational establishments in the empire. This university has been, not inaptly, termed "a vast system of instructing police, diffused over the country, in connection with, and dependent on, the central government;" and, under its influence, the communal and voluntary schools died out, or were suppressed; and all academies and seminaries became connected with, and under the control of, the university. In these institutions, whilst politics was entirely banished, and religion and morality little thought of, the physical sciences, geography, and everything that related to the art of war, were taught by able masters; and, in those pursuits, no one could deny that immense progress was made.

These measures were organised before his marriage. Previous to that event, also, he occupied himself in making various territorial arrangements, with a view of gratifying his relatives and allies. The kings of Bavaria and Würtemberg, and the elector of Baden, received accessions of territory, as the price of supporting the French armies still in those states. The principalities of Fulda and Hainault were constituted into the principality of Frankfort, for the prince-primate, late elector and archbishop of Mayence, who was chancellor and president of the Confederation of the Rhine; and as he was in feeble health, and had no family, the reversion was given to prince Eugene, who, by the new marriage of the emperor, had lost his prospect of succeeding to the empire. Magdeburg and Hanover were added to Westphalia, on condition that Jerome should maintain, during the war, 18,500 French troops. That member of the Bonaparte family was now declared sovereign of Hesse, Westphalia, and Hanover, having Cassel for his capital, Magdeburg for his citadel, and taking rank next to the king of Prussia, in the precedence of German princes. To Prussia, Napoleon's language was humiliating, and he demanded the immediate payment of 48,000,000 francs, out of 86,000,000, which were still due as a balance of the contributions levied upon her. Till paid, Glogau, Cüstrin, and Stettin received Saxon-Polish garrisons, which were as faithful to Napoleon as French soldiers; and thus he retained the complete command of the Oder and the Vistula. His troops were also distributed so skilfully, that, at any moment, the different corps d'armée could support each other, and sustain his power and influence. The corps of marshals Davoust, Masséna, and Oudinot, which had been, successively, the basis of the grand army at Ratisbon, Aspern, and Wagram, were withdrawn from the scene of operations in Bavaria and Suabia, and were at liberty to be employed in other services. Of Oudinot's corps, several regiments, under general St. Hilaire, were distributed along the coasts of France, between Cherbourg, St. Malo, and Brest, "as a menace against England:" the remainder was cantoned near Rochefort, to be in readiness to pass the Pyrenees, if wanted. Masséna's corps was encamped at Boulogne, Brabant, and on the frontiers of Holland: to Davoust's corps the duty of occupying and watching the north of Germany was assigned. The army of Dalmatia, under marshal Marmont, was sent to Laybach; and the army of Italy was distributed in the plains of Friuli, Venice, and Lombardy.

Amidst all his power, Napoleon was embarrassed by the tacit resistance of the pope to his wishes, by the impossibility of carrying out his continental system, and by the insufficiency of his finances, notwithstanding the immense contributions he levied on Italy, Austria, and Prussia. The pope firmly refused, while a prisoner at Savona, to perform any of the functions of his office. Twenty-seven bishoprics became vacant in various parts of the empire. Napoleon nominated new prelates, but the pope would not confer the pall: he at first got over the difficulty by having them endowed with the rank of vicars-capitular, in accordance with the ancient usages of the church. The archbishopric of Paris became vacant, and Napoleon nominated his uncle, cardinal Fesché, as the new archbishop. He was already archbishop of Lyons; and as the pope refused to sanction his transfer to the see of Paris, he retained his first appointment. The cardinal Maury was then appointed; and on his acceptance of the archiepiscopal office, he was seriously remonstrated with by the pope, who, writing to him, said—"Is this the way, after having so eloquently defended the cause of the catholic church in the most stormy times, that you abandon the same church, now that you are loaded with its dignities and favours. You do not blush to take part against us, in the cause that we maintain in defence of the dignity of the church." The other cardinals, who had been brought to Paris, were twenty-eight in number. They were all ordered to attend the marriage of the emperor; but thirteen of them refused. The next day Napoleon ordered Fouché to arrest these refractory priests, strip them of their purple, and scatter them through the provinces, that they might be under the surveillance of the police. The clergy at large entered little into this quarrel with the pope. They are described as being "united, tranquil, submissive." They ignored the bull of excommunication; and though they regarded the seizure of the pope and his imprisonment as unjustifiable measures, they were not disposed to make them cause of quarrel with the government. The bishops were quiescent or with the government; and the bishop of Orleans addressed a letter to his clergy, in which he maintained that the pope was a spiritual priest, and had no claim to temporal authority. This conduct on the part of the clergy, caused Napoleon, though he made many attempts to conciliate the pope, to care little about what was termed the "inveterate obstinacy" of the pontiff, with whom he thought he should yet come to an understanding. His acts, indeed, showed his determination to treat the opposition of Pius VII. to the deprivation of his temporalities with contempt. By a decree of the senate of the 17th of February, Rome and its territory were annexed to France: by a senatus consultum, issued about the time of his marriage, Rome was declared the second city of the empire; and it was provided, that the heir to the empire, so confidently expected, as the result of the marriage with Maria-Louisa, should bear the title of king of Rome, and be crowned both at Nôtre-Dame and St. Peter's. Napoleon also abolished all the sees in the Roman states; suppressed the religious orders in Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia; and sequestered all the ecclesiastical property of the papacy. This last step gave him 250,000,000 francs; of which he appropriated 150,000,000 to the state property of France; and the remainder to the defraying the debt of Rome, to the support of hospitals, the establishment of new sees, and the payment of the clergy who retained their benefices.

As to the continental system, as meant to ruin Great Britain, it was a complete failure. Napoleon found himself obliged, in August, 1810, to issue licences, for which he demanded a high fee, sanctioning the importation of British goods, if French manufactures were taken in exchange; and all the continental states, notwithstanding his remonstrances, openly or secretly connived at the extensive smuggling which took place. The system was, therefore, comparatively ineffective in Europe; but it occasioned great inconvenience, and raised the prices of many articles to an enormous rate. It also embroiled Napoleon with the United States of America, whose friendship he would fain have preserved. In consequence of the restrictions on commerce, imposed by France and England, the government of Washington had laid an embargo on all French and British ships in the ports of the Union. This led to an order, from Napoleon, to seize and detain all ships, and arrest all the sailors, of the States in French ports; and although, in consequence of some relaxation in the American regulations, by a decree of the 28th of April, 1811, he revoked the Berlin and Milan decrees, as far as regarded the United States, the commercial regulations he continued to enforce, were still so vexatious, that no cordiality sprung up between the two governments.

In Europe, it was not only the governments of the independent neutral states that suffered the continental system to be violated and evaded: his brother Louis, to his great annoyance, was very lax in enforcing the system in Holland; and when his majesty arrived in Paris, on being summoned, with other members of his family, to attend the ceremony of Josephine's divorce—the meeting between the brothers was not very cordial. The emperor enumerated his reasons for being dissatisfied with Louis, whose conduct, he said, had made Holland of no more use to him, either in maritime warfare, or in enforcing the continental system, than it had been when a republic under Schimmelpennick. He adduced many specific causes of complaint, and openly intimated his intention of uniting Holland to France. Louis—who was already separated from his wife, Hortense, and whose eldest son had been made grand-duke of Berg, and taken from under his control—had no wish to lose his kingdom; and is described as behaving in a very unkingly manner. For a time, Napoleon's anger appears to have been allayed; and he imparted to his brother his desire, from various causes, for peace: suggesting to him, that, through the connection which the Amsterdam merchants had with Great Britain, he might intimate to the government at London, the imminent danger there was of the annexation of Holland to France; and that it was only by their consenting to treat for peace, that its independence could be preserved.

Louis consented to follow out the hint his brother gave him, and employed M. de Labouchere, head of the first banking-house in Holland—and who was a partner and son-in-law of Mr. Baring, the head of the chief banking-house at that time in London—to visit that city, and endeavour to open a communication with the marquis Wellesley, then foreign minister of England. The envoy had no difficulty, through his connection with the Barings, in obtaining an introduction to the noble marquis, who received him with great urbanity, listened to what he had to say with attention, but was very reserved in his answers. To Mr. Baring the marquis was more communicative. He told that gentleman, that it was a great mistake to suppose the British government was averse to peace, or that it had any desire, much less any interest, in wishing for the restoration of the Bourbons. They were quite ready to treat with Napoleon, but they distrusted his sincerity, and certainly would not treat with non-official agents; nor would they abandon Spain to Joseph, or Sicily to Murat, nor give up Malta; and any agent sent to treat, must be furnished with full powers on these important points. As Napoleon would not relinquish Spain, there appeared to be little hope for peace; but M. de Labouchere was instructed still to keep open a communication with the marquis Wellesley, for the purpose of urging upon him the desirableness of that event; and of pointing out, that, although the emperor would not dethrone his brothers or Murat, Portugal, Sicily, Hanover, the Hanse Towns, and the Spanish colonies, remained to compensate the old sovereigns; and that it would give a more humane character to the war, were it persisted in, if the decrees and orders in council, restricting the intercourse by sea, were withdrawn on both sides.

Notwithstanding these proceedings, Napoleon did not give up the idea of annexing Holland to France; but when that design became known to his mother and sisters, they made such urgent representations against it, that he evinced a disposition to content himself, at least for the present, with a portion of the Dutch territory. He resolved to advance the frontier of the then French territory to the Waal, by which Zealand, the isles of Tholen, Bommel, and Schowen, Southern Brabant, and part of Guelders, containing the important places of Bergen-op-Zoom, Breda, Gertruidenberg, Bois-le-Duc, Gorcum, and Nimeguen, would be added to the empire. Coupled with this loss of territory, were demands connected with military and commercial administration, which would have converted Louis into a mere automaton; but were in perfect conformity with that rule which Napoleon told Lucien must be the guide of all his relatives on whom he conferred power in other lands—viz., that that power must be exercised, not for the benefit of the country they governed, but of France. Louis at first showed a disposition to resist; it is even said that he contemplated uniting himself with England, and declaring war against France. It is certain that he sent off orders—he being still at Paris—to his ministers to fortify Amsterdam, and to refuse admission to French troops into Dutch forts. Accordingly, when a part of the old corps of Masséna, commanded by marshal Oudinot, entered Brabant, to take possession of that province, and general Maison presented himself before Bergen-op-Zoom, they found their progress arrested. Napoleon, as soon as he heard of this resistance to his wishes, sent the dukes of Otranto and Feltre to Louis; and they drew such a vivid picture of the emperor's anger, that the well-intentioned but weak-minded king yielded every point, and sent off couriers to Amsterdam, to dismiss the ministers, who only obeyed his orders. Then a treaty was concluded between the brothers—one clause of which prohibited Louis from sending ambassadors to Vienna or St. Petersburg; and Napoleon immediately wrote to his brother, telling him that he had, for the first time, set aside his true policy, seeing how much it would distress him, and gave up the annexation of Holland, notwithstanding the political reasons which urged him to the measure; but he (Louis) "must be assured that he must make a complete change in his government," and that, on "the first cause of complaint," the annexation would take place. Louis was obliged to be content with this arrangement; and he remained in Paris, to share in the marriage fêtes: after they were at an end he returned to Amsterdam.

The financial position of the empire pressed itself upon the consideration of Napoleon, in addition to the various subjects already mentioned. Hitherto he had greatly exceeded the public resources, notwithstanding the immense contributions from the conquered countries. He had, says M. Thiers, "for many years passed the proper limit of expenses by about fifty millions in time of peace, and about eighty or a hundred millions in time of war." The experience of the Spanish war made him feel that the time would come when the immense armies of France must be supported by the French people; and he had raised the duties on articles of general consumption, with a view to increase the revenue—making, in 1810, the articles of tobacco and salt government monopolies. Whilst he raised the indirect, he reduced the direct taxes on real property, that he might avail himself of that source hereafter. The budget for the year amounted to 740,000,000 francs, exclusive of the payments made from the domaine-extraordinaire, which consisted of contributions levied on foreign countries, or paid under treaties; of the produce of movables, confiscated or seized; and of the public lands of France. The entire receipts from this source, in 1810, amounted to 750,000,000 francs; the expenditure to about 450,000,000 francs, leaving 300,000,000 francs in the treasury. Well might an historian observe—"Never, since the time of the Roman dominion, had conquered states furnished such resources to a foreign treasury."

After his marriage, Napoleon, to the casual observer, appeared for a time to have cast aside all cares of business, and to have devoted himself solely to his youthful bride; so many were the fêtes and rejoicings on the occasion, at most of which he was present. The union did not appear to be disagreeable to the empress, who, some little time after she became the wife of Napoleon, said to the late prince Metternich, then recently appointed foreign minister of Austria, and who visited Paris for the purpose of having interviews with the emperor and empress—"I suppose you think, at Vienna, that I live in great awe of my redoubtable husband! Ah! well! you may tell my countrymen, that he is more afraid of me than I am of him." In subsequent years, she is said to have been warmly attached to the emperor, frequently speaking of him as "Mon Ange!" ("My Angel.") One of the emperor's biographers says—"She was of a gentle, complying, and artless nature, and anxiously desirous of pleasing him. He used, in comparing his two wives, to call the one 'Grace,' the other 'Innocence.' The simplicity and affability of Maria-Louisa rendered her very popular; though her qualities were not such as to excite the strong attachment which had been inspired by Josephine."

After nearly a month spent in festivities at Paris and Compiègne, Napoleon left the latter on the 27th of April, accompanied by a brilliant suite, to take his bride a tour through the provinces. They went by St. Quentin, Cambray, and the palace of Lacken, to Antwerp, where the emperor had a fleet of ten sail, ready equipped. He examined these vessels with much pride; remaining five days at Antwerp, for the purpose of thoroughly inquiring into the capabilities of the port as a naval arsenal. He was very anxious to employ the period of a continental peace to recruit his fleet; and at that time he had thirty-two vessels, besides the ten at Antwerp. There were nine in the Texel, which were to be completed by the 1st of July; two at Cherbourg, three at L'Orient, seventeen at Toulon, and one at Venice. He calculated that, by 1812, the number would be increased to 100 or 110; and that, with the necessary number of frigates and sloops, he should be able, with ease, to embark 150,000 men for any foreign expedition.

Amsterdam, Flushing, and Brussels were also visited; and the distinguished party returned to Paris by Dieppe, Havre, and Rouen. While on this journey, the emperor learned, that Fouché had been employing, as his agent, M. Ouvrard, to follow the suite of M. de Labouchere, and endeavour to open negotiations with England. Ordering Louis (through whom, as we have stated, M. de Labouchere's agency commenced) still to continue that gentleman's mission—as soon as he returned to Paris, on the 2nd of June, Napoleon held a council of ministers, and questioned Fouché, pointedly, as to his proceedings. The latter, surprised to find they had come to the emperor's knowledge, made some excuses, wanting to throw the fault upon Ouvrard, as a man who intrigued in everything. The evidence, however, from the letters which Louis had forwarded to the emperor, was too conclusive to leave any doubt as to the fact, that Ouvrard's mission originated with Fouché. The agent was seized and placed in prison, where he remained for some time. Fouché was dismissed, and Savary, duke of Rovigo, appointed minister of police, against the advice of Cambacérès, the arch-chancellor, who remarked to the emperor, that "public opinion, already somewhat estranged, was not likely to be conciliated by seeing the minister of police in a military uniform." Notwithstanding Fouché's conduct in this affair, the emperor, at first, only transferred him from one office to another. On the 3rd of June, Napoleon wrote to him, stating that he was removed from his ministry on account of the negotiations opened with England, and his "peculiar opinions regarding the duties of the minister of police," which "were not consistent with the good of the state;" but declaring that, notwithstanding, the emperor's "confidence in his talent and fidelity was complete." A day or two after, he was appointed governor of the Roman states. Further disclosures, relative to his share in the negotiations, and proof that he had led the British government to think the emperor would depart from his declared intentions with respect to Spain, so enraged Napoleon, however, that he cancelled his new appointment, and exiled him to Aix.—In this attempt to open negotiations through M. Ouvrard, as well as in that made by M. de Labouchere, the British government evinced a firm desire for peace; and, in a brief note, the marquis Wellesley stated, that his majesty was quite ready to take part in a sincere formal negotiation, which should comprise all his allies, not omitting Spain.

While Napoleon was engaged in this business of Fouché's, the ambassador of Austria (prince Schwartzberg) gave a ball at the embassy, to their imperial majesties and the court. When the festivity was at its height, a fire broke out in the mansion. The emperor carried the empress in his arms from the ball-room to her carriage, and then returned to the scene of the conflagration, in which the princess Schwartzberg unhappily perished. Many of the guests were seriously injured, and the lives of several were saved by the activity of Napoleon. It is stated by his biographers, that, though he made no remark about it at the time, this event made a deep impression on Napoleon; and many persons regarded it as an evil omen, a similar accident having occurred soon after the marriage of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette.

In June, the affairs of Holland were brought to a climax. Louis found the difficulties imposed upon him by his recent treaty with the emperor were accumulating beyond his power to overcome them; and one article of the treaty, which obliged him to suffer French military posts to be established along the coast, in order to prevent all intercourse with England, produced so much popular discontent, that a member of the French embassy was insulted in the streets of the Hague. This threw Napoleon into one of those passionate excesses in which he so frequently indulged. He sent his passports to the Dutch ambassador, M. Verhuel; ordered M. de Laroche foucauld, his ambassador to Louis, and who was then at Paris, not to return to the Hague; sent instructions to M. Sérurier, the secretary of legation, to desist from attending the court of Louis; and demanded, that all who had insulted the member of the embassy should be signally punished. This seems to have been the last trouble Louis found himself capable of encountering; for directly after the arrival of M. Verhuel at Amsterdam, he announced to his ministers, that he intended to resign the crown to his son, under the regency of his mother, the queen Hortense. Louis thought the youth of his son, and the regard Napoleon had for Hortense, would induce him to be less stringent in his demands on Holland; whilst the regent, being a woman, could submit to him with less humiliation than he (Louis) could do. His ministers reluctantly received his resignation; and a messenger was, on the day when the king communicated his intention, July the 1st, sent off to Paris, to announce the new phase in Dutch affairs to Napoleon. On the 2nd, Louis left the palace, keeping every one in ignorance of the place to which he meant to retire. It subsequently transpired, that the locale of his retreat was Bohemia, where he took all his family except his eldest son. The messenger bearing his resignation reached Paris on the 6th; the very day, says M. Thiers, "on which a report was presented to Napoleon, which had been drawn up to explain the reasons that rendered the annexation of Holland to the empire desirable. His resolution had been adopted, therefore, before his brother's abdication." That abdication made no alteration in the emperor's intentions; who set at nought the arrangements, and disregarded the wishes of his brother. He employed two days, after he received the intelligence, in taking the necessary preliminary measures; and, on the 9th of July, it was decreed, that "Holland was annexed to France." The Dutch territory was divided into nine departments, which were to send six deputies to the council of state, six to the senate, twenty-five to the legislative body, and two members to the court of cassation. The French system of taxation was to be substituted for the Dutch, at the close of the year; and the "continental system" was ordered to be rigidly enforced. He also directed that the prince-royal should be brought to Paris, and recognised as the grand-duke of Berg.

Napoleon followed up this annexation by two decrees—one allowing the Dutch to bring the colonial produce accumulated in their warehouses to the French markets, on paying a duty of 50 per cent. to the French treasury: the other was intended to check the contraband trade in British goods. Whilst British manufactures were still sedulously excluded, the produce of the British colonies was permitted to be imported, the importers taking out a licence, and paying the above duty. This decree was dated on the 5th of August. It was to operate throughout the whole of the French dominions; and couriers were sent off to the Confederation of the Rhine, Austria, Russia, and all other neutral powers, recommending the governments to adopt the same system. Custom-house officers, gens d'armes, and troops, were everywhere employed to seize English colonial produce, and compel the owner to pay duty, or to forfeit it. In future, wherever this produce was found, and the payment of duty could not be proved, it was to be declared contraband, and seized. Napoleon raised a considerable sum by this measure, from the payment of the 50 per cent. duty, and the sale of confiscated stores.

Shortly after this decree came into effect, he extended its operation, by compelling every ship which navigated the Atlantic Ocean or the Mediterranean Sea, to take out a licence. By a decree of the 1st of November, he somewhat mitigated these regulations, as far as regarded vessels trading with the United States. This induced president Maddison to issue a proclamation, announcing, that if, by the 1st of February, 1811, England had not withdrawn all its restrictive commercial measures, the commercial interdict issued by the government at Washington, would be withdrawn with respect to France, but rigorously maintained with respect to England.

All the neutral states accepted the decree of the 5th of August, except Russia. That power, which had for some time been lax in carrying out the continental system, became still less stringent after this decree appeared, and Alexander turned a deaf ear to the remonstrances which Napoleon, through M. Caulaincourt, addressed to him. The making more annexations to France before the year closed, still further estranged the two powers. On the 13th of December, a senatus consulte appeared, annexing the Valais to the empire, as the department of the Simplon: and still further to enable the war against English commerce to be carried on, this document declared, that the duchy of Oldenburg, the territory of the princes of Salm and Arenberg, a portion of Hanover, and the territories of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübeck, were converted into French departments. The princes who were to be despoiled were simply informed, that Napoleon was about to take possession of their territories; and it was intimated to the prince of Oldenburg, that out of respect to the emperor Alexander, who was his brother-in-law, the city of Erfurth would be assigned to him. The emperor of Russia deeply resented the manner in which that prince was treated; and it induced him to issue, on the 31st of December, an ukase, regulating the customs' duties of the empire; under which the importation of English colonial produce was permitted in neutral vessels: thus, in fact, Russia renounced the "continental system." By taking this step, Alexander at once revenged the slight cast upon him with respect to the imperial marriage, the refusal of Napoleon to ratify the convention to which M. Caulaincourt had agreed with respect to Poland, and the injury inflicted on his brother-in-law. From that period, the friendship of the two sovereigns was at end, and both began to prepare for war—Napoleon at once calling out 116,000 men of the conscription for 1811.

Early in the year just named, the first wish of Napoleon's heart was gratified—he became a father. On the 20th of March, 1811, the empress gave birth to a son. During the accouchement her state was such, that the accoucheur, M. Dubois, informed the emperor, that it might be necessary to sacrifice either mother or child. "Save the mother," was Napoleon's reply, anxious as he was for an heir—"it is her right: forget that she is an empress, and act towards her as you would to the wife of a shopkeeper of the Rue St. Denis." Both were preserved; and the infant was baptized by the cardinal Maury, archbishop of Paris. He was christened Napoleon-François-Charles-Joseph; and took the title of king of Rome from the day of his birth. This event was made the cause of great rejoicing; and the constituted authorities of Paris, the senate and the council of state, all went through the ceremony, "more honoured," we think, "in the breach than in the observance," of presenting addresses to the infant king in his cradle! and, after the chief nurse had replied, defiling past him with humble reverences. The European sovereigns, including the emperor Alexander, sent ambassadors to congratulate Napoleon on what he regarded as such an auspicious event. Charles IV. of Spain, and the ex-queen, went to Paris, to tender their congratulations in person. Soon after the birth of the king of Rome, the duke of Bassano was made minister of foreign affairs, in the room of Champagny, who had been created duke of Cadore, and was nominated intendent-general of the crown. M. de Caulaincourt, duke of Vicenza, was also replaced as ambassador at St. Petersburg, by M. Lauriston, who arrived at the embassy on the 9th of May.

On the 16th of June, the session for 1811 of the legislative body was opened by the emperor, who, in his speech, made especial allusion to his son, who would, he said, "answer all the expectations of France, and have for their children the same feelings which he entertained for themselves." The French, he added, "will never forget, that their happiness and their glory are attached to the prosperity of this throne, which I have founded, consolidated, and aggrandised, with them, and for them. I desire this to be understood by all the French, in whatever position Providence and my will have placed them—the love of France is their first duty." New members from the departments of Holland, from the Hanse Towns, from Italy, and from Valais, took their seats in this session; and a report on the state of the empire informed the legislature, that, since the last session, sixteen departments, 5,000,000 of people, and 100,000,000 francs of revenue, had been added to the empire. It also appeared, from this report, that France had 800,000 men under arms, of whom 350,000 were in Spain. The expenditure for the year was fixed at 954,000,000 francs, of which 148,000,000 were applied to the interest on the debt. This large sum was exclusive of those paid out of the domaine-extraordinaire, and the secret revenue of the police; which raised the total expenditure to near 1,500,000,000 francs. The session closed on the 25th of July.

The emperor had not yet been able to come to any agreement with the pope, who, towards the close of 1810, sent letters to the chapters, urging them not to recognise as vicars-capitular, the nominated, but uninstituted bishops. This was a source of great concern to Napoleon, though he concealed his uneasiness from the public. To meet the difficulty, he first took the opinion of an ecclesiastical commission on several questions that presented themselves; and then resolved to summon a council of the archbishops and bishops of the empire. This council met at Paris on the 11th of June; and, after going in solemn procession to Notre-Dame, where a grand mass was performed, the members proceeded to business. They could not agree, as a large proportion of the prelates were of opinion, that no acts of the body would be valid without the assent of the church. As no determination, apparently, could be come to, the emperor dissolved the council; and the duke of Rovigo arrested three bishops, those of Tournay, Troyes, and Gaud, in the night, and imprisoned them at Vincennes, without the adjudication of any tribunal, or their being allowed to give any explanation of their conduct. By the advice of cardinal Maury, a decree was then drawn up, to which eighty-five members of the council were induced to give their consent, chiefly to settle the question of the institution to bishoprics. It was provided, that six months should be allowed for nomination by the head of the state; and that the pope should, six months after the nomination, institute the nominee, according to the concordat. If, however, his holiness would not confer the pall upon the new bishop, then the metropolitan of the ecclesiastical province should be empowered to act in his place. The pope, contrary to expectation, approved of the decree, in a brief, dated the 20th of September. That document was, however, drawn up in terms that displeased the emperor, who submitted it to the council of state, that it might be seen how far its language agreed with the liberties of the Gallican church. Notwithstanding, as the pope agreed to institute the twenty-seven bishops, it was considered that this question was, for the present, settled.

In the autumn, Napoleon and Maria-Louisa made a tour to the coasts of France, the provinces annexed the previous year, and Holland. When on this tour, the emperor was actively employed in giving instructions to those princes dependent upon him, as to the course they must take in what he considered as certain—an approaching war with Russia; in which he hoped to induce Austria and Prussia to join him. He also wanted the support of Sweden; but recent changes in that country tended to alienate the two powers. The crown-prince of Sweden died suddenly, on the 23rd of May, 1810. The king (Charles XIII.) had no children, and was not likely to have any. It became necessary, therefore, for the states-general, or diet, to provide a successor to the throne. The rival claims of the brother of the deceased crown-prince, and of Frederick VII., king of Denmark, were preferred; but, under an impression that it would be agreeable to Napoleon, the diet, on the 17th of August, elected Bernadotte prince of Pontecorvo—who was relieved from his oath of allegiance as a French subject, and took possession of his new title of crown-prince of Sweden, under the name of Charles John, on the 1st of November. The election was not in compliance with the wishes of Napoleon, between whom and Bernadotte there had been no cordial feeling since the 18th of Brumaire; as the latter always opposed the aspiring ambition and aggressive disposition of the former. The emperor, however, did not oppose the choice of the diet; but he took care to have it known that it had not been influenced by him. After his arrival at Stockholm, Bernadotte, owing to the infirmity of Charles XIII., exercised the royal authority: and he did so, as a loyal Swede, for the interests of Sweden; not as Napoleon wished, for the benefit of France. A declaration of war against England was made on the 17th of November, but hostilities never commenced; and Bernadotte declined to carry out the “continental system” in its integrity, whilst he cultivated, from the time of his elevation, amicable relations with Russia; both causes being very obnoxious to Napoleon, who, as he contemplated war with the czar, wanted to isolate him from all continental alliances.

Alexander, on the other hand, was, through his ministers, endeavouring to strengthen his interests at Vienna, Berlin, and Stockholm. At Copenhagen, any step of that kind was useless, the king being determined to adhere to the cause of Napoleon; who, however, did not place any great reliance on the assistance he could afford him. During 1811, he had arranged his plan of the campaign; determining to place his base of operations on the Oder and Vistula, and, if possible, on the Niemen. He therefore directed his troops to advance to those points—gradually throwing garrisons, and every description of stores, into Dantzic, Thorn, and Medling, on the Vistula; Stettin, Cüstrin, and Glogau, on the Oder; and Magdeburg on the Elbe. Dantzic was made a vast dépôt for every species of war-like matériel; and another dépôt, as extensive, was established at Hamburg. The emperor, also, again addressed himself to cultivate the friendship of Turkey, which, since the treaty of Tilsit, he had entirely abandoned to Russia. That power had been for some time at war with the Porte; and he wished to bring his quarrel with Alexander to an issue before the latter was free from the contest. In 1811, however, the Russians had gained several advantages over the Turks, which rendered the latter inclined to peace; and negotiations were opened at Bucharest. They did not promise to terminate speedily, as the two powers could not agree upon the terms of a treaty. But the Porte—whilst refusing Alexander’s proposition, that Turkey should retain Wallachia, and give up Bessarabia and Moldavia to Russia, and demanding the status quo ante bellum as the condition of peace—also declined to enter into any alliance with France.

The unpopularity of France, before alluded to, increased, during 1811, in Germany. In Prussia, the most intense German spirit was cultivated. All the younger branches of the aristocracy and the traders, and many of the lower classes, led by the clergy, became members of secret societies—the Ligue de la Vertu, the Ligue Germanique, and others; the object of which was, in art, science, literature, industry, to patronise the products of Germany, and of Germany only. The king, however, who had begun to increase his army, was compelled to desist by a threat from Napoleon, that Davoust should march on Berlin if he did not. The dislike—amounting almost to detestation—to Napoleon and his policy, was nearly universal in other parts of Germany; and though his German allies raised their contingents at his bidding, “they trembled in secret,” says Thiers, “at the hatred which they found the conscription engendered” amongst their people.

As Napoleon closed 1810, by calling for the conscription of 1811, so he closed 1811, with an immediate call for 112,000 men of the levy of 1812; and as much has been said as to the cause of the terrible war of the latter year, and the admirers of Napoleon have been inclined to throw all the blame upon Alexander, it is only fair to that sovereign to quote what M. Thiers, in his History of the Consulate and the Empire, says on the subject. “For my own part,” writes the historian, “loving my country better than anything else in the world, but unable to sacrifice truth for its sake, I must declare, that, after having perused all the documents relating to the subject, my decided impression is, that the emperor Alexander was sincerely averse to war. Whilst distrust of Napoleon's character impelled him to prepare for it, he would have done anything to avoid it; for, besides the great dangers with which it threatened him, it would be a condemnation of his policy—an avowal that he had committed an error in adopting the French alliance at Tilsit; and compel him to renounce Wallachia and Moldavia." This was also the opinion of M. Lauriston, Napoleon's ambassador at St. Petersburg; who, after several interviews with the emperor, wrote to Paris, to the effect, that "he was compelled to say that the emperor Alexander, although to a certain extent prepared, was not desirous of war, and would certainly not take the initiative." The emperor of Austria, now the father-in-law of Napoleon, was, of course, disposed to forward his views; but he deprecated war; and M. Metternich, then decidedly favourable to France, strongly counselled peace. "Great as was the emperor Napoleon," he said, "fortune might betray him; and although the chances were, undoubtedly, in his favour, it would be wiser not to tempt her."

The war with England was productive of several disasters to France and her allies, in 1810 and 1811. In the month of January, in the former year, a force sailed from Madras, which, on the 17th of February, captured the Dutch settlement of Amboyna, and its dependent islands also surrendered.—On the 10th of July, the isle of Bourbon was captured by the same force.—In August, a party of seamen, commanded by captain Cole, of the Caroline frigate, was landed on Banda, the chief of the Dutch spice islands. These gallant fellows attacked and carried the fort of Banda Neira on the 8th. It was defended by 700 regular troops, and 300 militia; but they could not stand against the daring assault of the British. The surrender of the fort was followed by that of the whole island, which proved a rich prize to the captors. In the same month, however, a French squadron captured two East Indiamen; and three English frigates, attempting to recover them, went aground, and were lost.—Later in the year, on the 3rd of December, the island of Mauritius capitulated to a British force. This was a splendid prize. The island was well supplied with provisions, and all kinds of stores; there was much merchandise in the warehouses; and five large frigates, some smaller vessels of war, twenty-eight merchantmen, and the two English East Indiamen which had been captured, in the harbour. The garrison was sent to France; and the conquest was followed up by three frigates sailing to the island of Madagascar, destroying the French batteries at Tametava, on the coast, and routing the French troops from some other positions which they occupied. This was completely effected on the 10th of January, 1811.—In August, 1810, Murat had collected a powerful armament in Calabria, with the design of making an attempt to conquer Sicily. A French division was landed near Faro Point, which was defeated by the British, under major-general Campbell, on the 18th of September, with the loss of 900 prisoners. There was skirmishing subsequently, but no other battle. On the 3rd of October, the French, finding they could make no impression, left the island.—In March, 1811, a combined French and Italian squadron, consisting of five large frigates and six smaller vessels, had eluded the British blockading squadrons; but were encountered, on the 13th, off the Isle of Lissa, in the gulf of Venice, by five English frigates, under commodore Hoste. A fierce engagement ensued, the result of which was, for some time, doubtful. It ended in the capture of three frigates; the rest, much shattered, escaped.—In May, on the 20th, captain Schomberg captured a fine French frigate off the island of Madagascar; and, the next day, attacked and destroyed some batteries which the French had again erected on the coast of that island.—On the 21st of July, a French flotilla, of twenty-six vessels, was taken, off the coast of Calabria, by an English frigate and a sloop.—On the 8th of August the Dutch island of Java was captured. At the close of the year, Napoleon had no possessions out of Europe; and the Spanish colonies in South America having declared their independence, he had little chance, even if he succeeded in Spain, of possessing himself of the "Indies." His dream of obtaining "ships, colonies, and commerce," to rival England, must have been by this time dissipated.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE WAR IN THE PENINSULA, 1809—1811; SURRENDER OF SARAGOSSA; THE FRENCH IN PORTUGAL; THEIR EXPULSION BY THE BRITISH; BATTLE OF TALAVERA; FURTHER EVENTS IN 1809; THE GUERRILLAS; EXPEDITION TO ANDALUSIA; CAPTURE OF CIUDAD RODRIGO AND ALMEIDA; BATTLE OF BUSACO; LINES OF TORRES VEDRAS; THE REGENCY OF CADIZ; CAPTURE OF TORTOSA AND BADAJOZ; BATTLE OF BARROSA; CAPTURE OF FIGUERAS; BURNING OF MANRESA; CAPTURE OF TARRAGONA.

BEFORE we enter upon the history of the Russian war that proved so fatal to Bonaparte, we will give a narrative of the contest in the Peninsula—which, though it greatly affected his fortunes, stood, from the period at which we are now arrived, almost isolated from his other movements; and the events will be better understood if given in a connected form. The quarrel with Spain was never popular in France; and the battle of Corunna, though it was followed by the departure of the British troops from that part of the Peninsula, did not tend to reconcile the French people to a continuance of the war. But the emperor would not abandon his idea of subduing Spain. He reinforced his armies there, and ordered the most energetic measures to be adopted, on his leaving the country in January, 1809, saying, that he should only be absent a few months, during which time the armies were to be commanded by the king. Marshal Soult, however, was really at the head of the army; and he never evinced any great disposition to obey the orders of Joseph.

One of the first operations, after the departure of the British, was to press the siege of Saragossa, which had been commenced by marshal Lannes on the 20th of December, 1808. The inhabitants—greatly animated and encouraged by a female, known as the Maid of Saragossa—made a resistance, of which there are few such determined ones on record. Every house was converted into a fortress, and every foot of ground was contested. The slaughter was great, and there was scarcely a house uninjured. To add to the difficulties of the besieged, an epidemic fever broke out amongst the garrison; and, on the 21st of February, it surrendered—40,000 of the troops and the inhabitants being, it is estimated, buried under the ruins of the fortifications and the houses.—Soon after its surrender, marshal Lannes left Spain.

The French were also active in the field. Marshal Soult, after the occupation of Corunna, having rested and reorganised his forces, descended from that city to the south; and crossing the frontiers of Portugal, he took Braga, from whence he advanced to Oporto, which was garrisoned by a strong Portuguese force. The French opened a bombardment upon the works; and the garrison refusing to surrender, the city was carried by assault on the 29th of March, 1809. In this affair the slaughter was terrible; the French soldiers acting with the greatest cruelty, notwithstanding the exertions of Soult and his officers. The shrieks of women, and the cries of murdered men, were heard in every street; and it is computed that not fewer than 10,000 Portuguese perished; the French loss being 500. From Oporto, following the orders of the emperor, Soult was to proceed to Lisbon, supported by a force under marshal Victor. But his progress was arrested, very much to his surprise.

After the death of Sir John Moore, Sir John Cradock had succeeded to the chief command of the British troops. They had gone from Corunna to Lisbon; and when he heard of the advance of the French army, he had serious thoughts of returning to England. But the Portuguese offered to put their army under a British commander, and to co-operate heartily with their allies—a proposition to which the government of London assented, and major-general Beresford was nominated generalissimo of the troops of Portugal. When Soult advanced to Oporto, that officer was at Thomar, where he had established his head-quarters. He had organised some 20,000 or 30,000 men; and Sir John Cradock had increased his army to 14,500. But as there could not be less than 50,000 in the armies of Soult and Victor, Sir John did not think it advisable to advance on Oporto, and resolved to content himself with covering Lisbon and the Tagus. The British government, however, had resolved to send Sir Arthur Wellesley to take the chief command in the Peninsula. That officer landed at Lisbon on the 22nd of April, and at once entered on the discharge of his duties. He found himself at the head of 14,500 infantry, and 1,500 cavalry, with twenty-four pieces of cannon; and having been joined by general Beresford and 10,000 Portuguese, he resolved to march to the north, and endeavour to expel the French from Portugal. The united armies left Lisbon on the 7th of May, and crossed the Vouga on the 10th, where an affair took place with four regiments of French cavalry, a battalion of infantry, and some guns. The enemy were driven back with loss, as were other detachments of French troops, which had crossed to the left bank of the Douro; some retreated, as they heard of the advance of the allies. The latter pressed on, and, at Vendas Novas, fell in with a French division of about 4,000 infantry and cavalry, which was attacked and dispersed, many prisoners being taken. The beaten enemy recrossed the Douro, destroyed the bridges, and conveyed every boat they could discover to the other bank. When Sir A. Wellesley arrived, he determined not to stop the pursuit, but to cross the river at all hazards. It was one of the most gallant operations of the war. Having fixed upon a spot where the crossing might be attempted, opposite an unfinished building on the right bank, Sir A. Wellesley ordered the first troops who got over to take possession of that building, and defend themselves there till their comrades arrived. A small skiff, after much searching, was discovered concealed amongst some rushes, in which a few peasants and a Portuguese colonel ventured across. These parties were fortunate enough to find four barges buried in the mud, which, being extricated with difficulty, were taken over, and general Paget, at the head of three companies of the Buffs, crossed, and took possession of the building. The barges were going back for reinforcements, when the French discovered the movement. Soult immediately dispatched a division to attack the building, which was successfully defended by the little garrison. The British, under generals Hill, Murray, and Sherbrooke, kept constantly passing from the left to the right bank, in the barges, and by a ford at Avintes, a little above Oporto, under cover of a well-sustained fire from several guns placed in the garden of the convent of San Agostinho, on the left bank. The French fought well for some time, till Soult, fearing he should be outflanked, ordered a retreat. It was made most precipitously, and Sir A. Wellesley and his staff entered Oporto as Soult and his followers were leaving it. They immediately took possession of the quarters of the French marshal, and ate a dinner which was preparing for him and his officers. The British did not, however, remain at Oporto. They continued the pursuit, which was, in fact, a rout; and, on the 18th of June, the French crossed the frontier, and re-entered Spain, barely 19,000 men remaining of the 26,000 which had advanced in February; their guns, stores, and baggage were abandoned to the conquerors. It appeared that they had plundered to a great extent; for almost every kind of property was found in the knapsacks which were left behind, or thrown away on the road, in their retreat: plate of all descriptions, jewellery, large sums of money, women's ornaments, and men's and women's clothes, were stored away in these receptacles, and amongst the baggage. Their sufferings in the retreat are described, by a British officer, as very great. As the allies advanced in pursuit, they found "the road strewed with wrecks of the French army; dead horses, muskets, ammunition, knapsacks, bodies of French soldiers murdered and stripped by the peasants; and now and then a solitary soldier lying on the road-side, and dying from fear, want, and fatigue." In such cases relief was always afforded by the pursuers.

Soult had been followed into Portugal by Victor, who had defeated general Cuesta at Medellin on the 29th of March, forced the passage of the Tagus at Alcantara, and threatened Lisbon. On hearing that Soult had retreated, he also fell back on Merida. The retreating armies were followed by Sir A. Wellesley, who, on the 20th of July, formed a junction with Cuesta at Oropesa. The allies marched in the direction of Madrid. There Sir R. Wilson was also marching, by Placentia, at the head of a Portuguese brigade; as was general Venegas, from the Sierra Morena. On the march, there was a favourable opportunity for attacking the French force on the Alberche; but, it being Sunday, Cuesta refused to fight. A day or two after, on the 26th of July, the French, whom the Spaniard had been the means of saving from defeat, attacked his advanced guard; and it was only saved from destruction by the arrival of Sherbrooke's division of the British force. Victor had then been joined by Sebastiani, from Toledo; also by king Joseph and marshal Jourdain, from Madrid. These different divisions had united at Torrijos, forming an army of nearly 50,000 men. As Victor menaced the allies, the British general resolved to halt at Talavera de la Reyna, a city on the right bank of the Tagus, to the south-west of Madrid, and on the road most frequented between the Spanish and Portuguese capitals. There, on the 27th and 28th of July, he sustained an attack from the entire French army; his own not counting more than 19,000 effective men. But there were Cuesta's Spaniards—a numerous host, who, though not highly disciplined, were brave. The late marquis of Londonderry described them as fine men, but "little better than a bold peasantry, armed partially like soldiers, but completely unacquainted with a soldier's duty." Like the guerillas, however, they would have fought well had they been ably commanded; but the same authority tells us, that "the generals appeared to have been selected by one rule alone—that of seniority. They were almost all old men, except O'Donaja and Largas, evidently incapable of surmounting the difficulties, or bearing the fatigue, of one hard campaign."

The British general had taken up a good position, two miles in length, extending from the Tagus to Talavera. The Spaniards were on the right, the British on the left, where the most formidable attack was made. The French were posted on the opposite side of the Alberche, a small stream, running by Talavera, being one of the tributaries of the Tagus. They crossed that river on the morning of the 27th. The fighting commenced at noon; and the assaults and defence were continued through the day. The French at first succeeded in throwing the 87th and 88th regiments, forming Mackenzie's division, into momentary confusion; and subsequently turned general Donkin's flank, and crowned the hill behind it. But they were beaten back, and forced from every point with great loss. A bold height—the Alatuza de Segusella, on the extreme flank of the British—had been the object of contention during the day. When the night closed, the French again attacked this position; but, after some desperate fighting, were driven off at the point of the bayonet. Then, says Maxwell, "the troops rested upon their arms; and each battalion on the ground it had occupied the preceding day. The cavalry were stretched beside their horses: all were ready for an attack; but the night passed with some slight alarms, and no serious disturbance." The fighting was resumed early the next morning, and again the French attacked the height on the left. They were broken and driven down; and repeated the attempt, but were once more repulsed. On all other points of the British line fighting continued for several hours; and twice, from the impetuosity, first of the 23rd dragoons, under colonel Seymour, and then of the guards, in pursuing the enemy, disaster was threatened to the allies. On the last occasion, if Sir Arthur Wellesley had not seen the danger, and sent the 48th to the rescue, the result would have been the utter dispersion of the guards, who were charged by the French cavalry. The fire of the 48th arrested the career of the latter: the guards rallied; the light cavalry came up, and rode upon the enemy; and the latter were soon in full retreat, leaving the ground covered with their dead. In every other part of the field the British were victorious; and if the Spaniards had made one forward movement, the French would, in the opinion of Sir A. Wellesley, have been entirely destroyed. They recrossed the Alberche in the night; having, in the two days, lost 9,000 killed and wounded, twenty guns, and several hundred prisoners. The British had thirty-six officers (major-general Mackenzie and brigadier-general Langworth being of the number), and 767 non-commissioned officers and rank and file, killed; and 195 officers, and 3,718 rank and file, wounded: the missing were ninety officers, and 644 rank and file. The Spanish loss was 1,250 killed and wounded.*

The battle of Talavera, though represented as indecisive by the French, had, for them, all the features of a defeat; as they, the assailants, were driven back on every point, and had to retrace their steps; whilst the English, the assailed, remained in possession of all the positions from which it was sought to expel them. The next day, Sir Arthur Wellesley was reinforced by general Craufurd's superb light brigade; and learning that Soult, with 35,000 men, was making a flank movement to support king Joseph, he wished to have made a forward march to meet and give him battle. Cuesta, however, over whom the English general had no control, chose to march from Talavera, and leave him entirely unsupported; and Sir Arthur, not having a sufficient number of men to encounter an army like Soult's, and not wishing to incur the fate of Sir John Moore, withdrew to Badajoz. Cuesta's desertion not only endangered the safety of the British army, but was very nearly causing the entire destruction of Sir R. Wilson's Portuguese brigade. Cut off from support by Cuesta's movement, it took possession of the pass of Banos, where it was attacked by a detached portion of Soult's army, much superior in numbers. After fighting with great bravery, and having 800 killed, the remainder were ordered, by Sir Robert, to disperse, and assemble again at Castello Branco; which they did.

At Badajoz, Sir Arthur Wellesley occupied himself in improving the discipline of his own troops, and in organising an efficient Portuguese army, which was clothed and armed by the English government, 31,000 stand of arms and suits of uniform arriving at Lisbon early in the spring of 1810. In October, Sir Arthur visited Lisbon; and it was then that he fixed upon Torres Vedras as the position to be taken for the protection of the capital, and ordered those lines of defence to be constructed, which were afterwards so famous in the history of the war.

In August, the Spanish armies were divided into those of the left, the centre, and the right. The first, under the command of the duke del Parque, extended its operations over Old Castile, Leon, the Asturias, and Galicia. The second was originally under Cuesta, who was displaced by the central junta of Seville, and general Equia appointed to succeed him. Before any action beyond mere skirmishing had taken place, this officer was also superseded by Don Juan de Areizaga, whose corps guarded Estremadura, La Mancha, and Andalusia. The third army, under generals Reding and Blake, was employed in Catalonia, against St. Cyr, and in Aragon against general Suchet. The central junta had established an executive commission of six members, to exercise all administrative functions; and the plan of this commission was, to concentrate as many men as possible, for the purpose of marching on Madrid, and taking the capital out of the hands of the French. This was contrary to the opinion of Sir Arthur Wellesley, who, after the experience he had had of the Spanish troops, strongly advised that all great battles should be avoided. The result proved the wisdom of his advice. Blake attacked

* For this victory Sir A. Wellesley was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Douro and viscount Wellington.

Suchet in Aragon, and was routed with considerable loss. The Spaniards rallied, and once more giving battle, were again defeated near Belchite, twenty-two miles from Saragossa, losing all their artillery, and several thousand prisoners. The duke del Parque, about the middle of October, had nearly 30,000 men under his command. Obeying the orders of the junta to assume the offensive, he had advanced, by the route from Ciudad Rodrigo to Salamanca, as far as Tamanies, where he was attacked, on the 18th of October, by a French division under general Marchand, when skilfully posted upon a group of rocks difficult of access. At the first onset the French captured several guns, and dispersed a corps of cavalry which covered the position. But the Spaniards kept up such a furious fire, that the whole French line was driven back, and retreated. This success—the last in that campaign the Spaniards obtained—confirmed the executive commission in their opinion, that the advance upon Madrid should take place. In obedience to their orders, Areizaga commenced his march upon the capital, with a tolerably well-appointed army of 40,000 or 50,000 foot, 6,000 or 7,000 cavalry, and eighty guns. But Soult had so well disposed his forces, 60,000 in number, that the Spaniards were met on every point; and at Ocana, on the 19th of November, were completely defeated, losing between 4,000 and 5,000 killed, 15,000 prisoners, forty-six cannon, a great quantity of baggage, and 2,000 or 3,000 horses. On the 26th, Areizaga was again defeated by Sebastiani, at Alva, on the river Tormes, and the advance on Madrid was, per force, suspended.—In Catalonia, Gerona having been besieged by a division of general St. Cyr's army, under general Verdier, for six months, surrendered, after a defence, which Jones says, in his Account of the War, "places the name of the governor, Don Marian Alvarez de Castro, on a level with that of Palafox."

Thus the events of 1809, in the Peninsula, were favourable to the French. Madrid, threatened by the allies, had been re-entered by Joseph in triumph; the British had retired to Badajoz; the Spaniards, though a fierce guerilla war was kept up in Old Castile, Navarre, Catalonia, Aragon, and Biscay, found two of their armies in the field completely broken up and dispersed; whilst the French troops of the line from Antwerp and Walcheren, relieved by the retirement of the British, and most of the battalions, which were marching out of Austria, as the contribution levied on that country was paid, were ordered to Spain, to reinforce the French force. Still Napoleon was dissatisfied. Portugal was free, and Spain was yet unconquered. Ney was ordered to return to France, but did not obey the order; Soult was left unnoticed, to his great perplexity; Jourdain, the chief of the staff to Joseph, and Joseph himself, were somewhat roughly censured. Napoleon showed himself indeed hard to please.

The defeats of the Spanish generals excited great astonishment amongst the Spanish people, who thought their fine armies would soon drive the French from the Peninsula; and were greatly mortified at their signal discomfitures. It was well for Spain that the spirit of the guerillas did not quail, and that their activity never slackened, whenever and wherever there was a call for their exertions. Some of these corps are described as being "without officers or commissariat, led only by instinct, and acting according to the circumstances of the moment; supplying themselves with everything they required, while they left their enemies destitute." They were, says the same authority, "always present at the precise moment when least expected, dispersed if the hostile troops were in force, and reappeared as soon as they retired." They were very fierce in their mode of warfare, neither giving nor taking quarter; and as the regular armies were dispersed, their numbers were augmented, many of the soldiers joining the bands. Though without organisation and regular officers, they had several eminent leaders, amongst whom the most distinguished were Mina (who, when he first joined the guerillas, was a student, only nineteen years of age); his uncle, of the same name; Villacampa, an old officer; L'Empecinado, and colonel Raymon-Gayan, Renovales, El Pastor, and Don Juan Sanchez. The last-named chief, when the war was commenced, was an agriculturist: but his father, mother, and sister having lost their lives in an inroad of the French, he left the plough for the sword, and became one of the most dreaded of those chiefs who, by their enterprise and daring valour, inflicted such signal losses on the French troops. The knowledge the guerillas possessed of the country was a great advantage. They would attack forces double or treble their number; intercept, and capture or destroy, convoys; cut off small detachments; and, in every way, harass and annoy the invaders: retiring, when tired of fighting, to the recesses of the woods and mountains, and completely eluding pursuit. Some of the French generals treated the guerillas very barbarously when they fell into their hands; placing them out of the pale of the law, and gibbeting them on the great roads. This was very much against the wishes of the king, who endeavoured to prevent his troops from committing these excesses, and to conciliate the Spanish people by mild and beneficent measures.

When 1810 opened, the emperor and the king differed as to the way in which the campaign was to be conducted. The former wished that the efforts of the army should be directed to the expulsion of the English; but Joseph was desirous of commencing operations by an expedition to Andalusia; as it had been represented to him, that the Spaniards of Seville were discontented with the government of the central junta, and ready to acknowledge his authority. Marshal Soult also favoured the idea of this expedition; and Napoleon consented that it should be undertaken. He, however, wrote to Joseph, and told him that Spain must pay the cost of the war. "The whole revenue of France," he said, "would not suffice for the expenses of the Spanish army, unless he put some limit upon them. His empire was drained of men and money, and he was compelled to pause." All he would be able to afford was 2,000,000 francs per month, for the pay of the troops; Joseph must find all the rest. He added—"The king is fond of cherishing at Madrid the favourites to whom he owes no gratitude. Let him take care of the soldiers to whom he owes his crown. Should he not do this, I will deprive him of the administration of the Spanish provinces: I will govern them by the hands of my generals, and take care to collect from them, as from the other countries in which my troops have been quartered, the necessary expenses."

Joseph collected 70,000 men for the Andalusian expedition; and Masséna, whom the emperor had sent from Paris to take command of the army of Portugal, had 60,000 of the corps of Ney and Junot, 15,000 of the guard, and 10,000 cavalry under Montbrun. There was also a reserve under Drouet: together, more than 150,000 men. Soult was to command the Andalusian army under Joseph; and after that province was subdued, the emperor's orders were, that he was to detach 30,000 men, and march at their head, by the left bank of the Tagus, to Lisbon, whilst Masséna proceeded to the same city by the right bank; and that they would succeed in driving the English before them, and in compelling them to take to their ships, or surrender, his majesty had no doubt. The army advanced upon the Sierra Morena in the middle of January, 1810. The marquis de la Romana, to whom the reorganising the dispersed troops of Areizaga had been entrusted, had collected 25,000 men, but had had no time to reduce them to order and discipline, when he had to divide them into three divisions, to cover the passes of Almaden, Despena-Perros, and Villa Mourique. The troops made no effort to defend the ground they occupied; but, as the French advanced, they retired—some under Areizaga, upon Jaen, to cover Granada; others, first upon Cordova, and then to Cadiz; and a considerable portion of the force, under the marquis himself, made its way to Badajoz, followed by Mortier. The Spaniards reached the citadel first; and, as the French commander had no siege artillery, he took up a position on the Guadiana, where he could observe all who came in or went out of the fortress.

General Sebastiani, at the head of the 4th corps, pursued the Spaniards who went to Jaen, and successively occupied that place, Cordova, Granada, and Malaga; arriving at the latter on the 6th of February. At the same time, the king marched upon Seville, with the corps of marshals Mortier and Victor. The junta had left that city, for Cadiz, before 1809 closed, having first agreed to convoke the cortes early in January: but though left to themselves, the inhabitants at first showed signs of resistance. The force brought against them, however, and the threat that, if the gates were not opened, an assault would take place, and every one who resisted would be put to the sword, caused the authorities to capitulate; and, on the 1st of February, the French, with drums beating and colours flying, entered the capital of Andalusia. They found the city almost deserted. As soon as the resolution to capitulate was taken, all the upper classes who were left (many had quitted the city on the first approach of the French) went to Cadiz. The clergy and the monks had also fled, and most of the other inhabitants had dispersed themselves over the surrounding country. After a time, the conciliatory conduct of Joseph, who certainly was a benevolent and an indulgent sovereign, induced many to return.

Except Cadiz, Andalusia now lay at the feet of the French; and Victor was sent to take that important position, where a regency of six persons, substituted by the junta for the executive commission of Seville, administered the government. This regency excited a strong feeling against the central junta, several of whose members were imprisoned, though they do not appear to have been guilty of anything but misfortune: the new government also delayed the meeting of the cortes, which the central junta had ordered to be convoked. Fortunately, this body had little to do with the defence of the city. The duke d'Albuquerque had repaired there with his division; and he was joined by 4,000 British troops, under major-general Stewart, landed from the ships in the harbour. When marshal Victor appeared before the place it had been put into a good state of defence, which enabled the garrison to defy all the efforts of the assailants. An attempt of Ney on Ciudad Rodrigo, and of general Suchet on Valencia, were also defeated; the former sustained a great loss in killed and wounded. The latter, after his failure at Valencia, set down before Lerida; and, on the 23rd of April, he defeated general O'Donnell, who attempted to raise the siege, taking nearly 6,000 prisoners, with numerous cannon and colours, and a quantity of baggage. The garrison made a brave defence till the 14th of May, when the governor, Garcia Conde, found himself obliged to surrender.

The emperor, at this time, though engaged in disputes with his brother Louis, and full of thoughts of his marriage, assumed the title of commander-in-chief of the Spanish army, which he ordered to be divided into three corps—marshal Soult to command the first, called that of the south, which occupied Granada, Andalusia, and Estremadura. Joseph was put at the head of the army of the centre, the head-quarters of which were at Madrid; and the emperor gave such orders to the marshals as confined the authority of the king within the gates of the capital. The army of Portugal was continued under Masséna, who had Ney (recently returned from Paris) and Junot for his lieutenants. The emperor also, very much to the annoyance of Joseph, converted Catalonia, Aragon, Navarre, and Biscay into four military governments, and communicated, to those in his confidence, his intention of uniting them to France. The revenues of the provinces occupied by the French troops, were appropriated to the maintenance of the respective armies; Joseph's resources being limited to the taxes he could levy at Madrid. As soon as that unhappy monarch—for most unhappy his letters prove him to have been—heard of these arrangements, he left Seville in disgust for the capital; from whence he sent the marquis Almenara to Paris, where his queen then was, with letters to her, and instructions to communicate with the emperor, and obtain for him either redress for his wrongs, or permission to resign his crown. His ambassador had orders to make strong representations for the maintenance of the integrity of Spain, all of which were unheeded; and Napoleon, says Bignon, reminded his brother, "that he held in his power the prince of Asturias, Ferdinand, whom he was strongly tempted to send into Spain, and who would make no scruple, as the price of his liberty, to cede the required provinces, or do anything else that might be required of him." Instead of yielding to any of the representations made by the queen and the marquis Almenara (though on one occasion, remarked the former, in a letter to her husband, dated the 22nd of August, "he did appear somewhat softened, but said you must have patience"), the emperor ordered the various generals he had appointed, to collect all the revenues, and not to obey any instructions received from king Joseph, if they were contrary to those given by him. But, though he encroached so much on the authority of his brother, he would not hear of his resignation, and told him that he had no right to resign his throne, or give up his commission as commander-in-chief of the army of the centre, without his permission.*

The emperor directed all the operations for the summer. He ordered Soult to besiege Ba-dajoz as well as Cadiz; and Masséna to take Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida: the two armies were then to advance upon Lisbon, as he had directed before the opening of the spring campaign. Masséna concentrated his forces at Salamanca, and from thence marched to the south. He had then upwards of 80,000 men under his immediate command—viz., etat-major and gendarmes, 229; Regnier's corps (the 2nd), 19,232; Ney's (the 6th), 35,067; Junot's (the 8th) 26,431; a reserve of cavalry, under Montbrun, 5,117. There were, besides, three reserve corps—Drouet's, at Valladolid, 22,315; Serras's at Benavente, 15,107; and Bonnet's in Asturias, 14,885; the grand total being 138,383 men. The rear of this army was watched, and its communications kept open by a corps of 26,000 men, who occupied Biscay, Navarre, and Old Castile. Masséna sent Ney, with his corps, again to invest Ciudad Rodrigo, which is one of the frontier fortresses of Spain, forty-four miles south-west of Salamanca, in the commencement of June. The aged general, Herrasti, who commanded, made a gallant defence; but as lord Wellington did not think it prudent to risk a battle to raise the siege, he surrendered on the 9th of July. Almeida was next invested, after a brilliant affair on the Coa with the British light division, under general Craufurd, on the 24th of July. The British, greatly outnumbered, had to cross the river; but they made such a noble defence of the bridge by which they effected the passage, that the French were checked, and the British joined the main body of their army, without leaving a single trophy behind, though Masséna avowed he took both cannon and colours. Almeida is the frontier fortress of Portugal; and it was the middle of August before the French were in a condition to commence the siege. The trenches were opened on the 15th of that month; but the bombardment did not commence till the 20th. Soon after the firing began, a shell fell on a powder-magazine, which exploded, throwing down many houses, and killing nearly 500 persons. This led to the surrender of the fortress the next day; when the garrison, 5,000 in number, were made prisoners of war. In other quarters the French were everywhere successful in the field, except in Catalonia, where O'Donnell, in August and September—his little army of 6,000 men being reinforced by numerous bodies of armed peasants—defeated Schwartz's brigade, making 1,200 prisoners; and dispersed the detachments on the coasts, taking 1,500 prisoners, who were sent from Palamos to Tarragona; where a severe wound obliged the general to follow them. But he left Campoverdè, with a strong force in the field; and Napoleon, in consequence, sent strong reinforcements to Gerona, and 30,000 fresh troops into Navarre.

At the beginning of 1810 the British had been posted partly in Spain, and partly in Portugal, lord Wellington's head-quarters being at Viseu, in the Portuguese province of Beira. When the French invaded Andalusia, the British troops were withdrawn from Estremadura; and, after the capture of Almeida, lord Wellington ordered a further retreat. He was soon followed by Masséna; but the two armies—except a few skirmishes—did not encounter till the 27th of September. On the 26th, lord Wellington had taken up a position at Busaco, a village of Beira, where he awaited the attack of the French. The Sierra Busaco, a lofty mountainous ridge, with a very steep face, covers Coimbra, the capital of the province of Beira, extending about eight miles from the river Mondego. Two heights in this ridge, the Sierra Murcella and the Sierra Alcola, command the village. Lord Wellington occupied the latter, and general Hill the former; but the commander-in-chief, observing that the movement of the French army was directed towards the Alcola, the entire allied army—25,000 British, and about the same number of Portuguese—was concentrated there. The French were not far distant. "Upon the evening of the 26th," writes captain Sherer, "the army of Portugal, a dark and dense multitude, reposed, in massive columns, at the foot of the allied position, which rose abruptly above them, to an elevation of from 200 to 300 feet." At daybreak on the 27th the battle of Busaco commenced. Attacks were made on different points of the British position, by Regnier, Ney, Marchand, and Simon; and very desperate was the fighting on both sides—the British, under Hill, Leith, Picton, Cole, and Craufurd, gallantly holding their ground. The attacks were all repulsed. The third division, under Picton, suffered the most, its right being borne down by the masses of the French. The 45th and 88th British, and 8th Portuguese regiments, were sent to aid Picton, and found the enemy keeping up a fierce fire, though two guns, planted under the eye of Wellington, were playing on their flanks with grape. The three regiments levelled their muskets and charged with the bayonet, driving the French over the mountain side with a fearful slaughter. Similar results attended the other attacks; and when the fighting ceased, the allies maintained all their positions. The loss of the British was 107 killed, 493 wounded, and thirty-one prisoners. The Portuguese had ninety killed, 512 wounded, and twenty were missing. Of the French, one general, three colonels, thirty-three officers, and 250 privates, were made prisoners; 2,000 were left dead on the field; and the wounded are said to have amounted to 6,000, most of whom were left to the tender mercies of the peasantry.—The next morning, Masséna, still greatly superior in numbers, made a flank movement, with a view of turning the British left. Lord Wellington, in consequence, quitted the heights; and having issued a proclamation to the Portuguese, calling upon them to retire into the interior, carrying off or destroying their provisions, cattle, and stores—all which they did, subjecting themselves, with the greatest patriotism, to many privations—he conducted his army to the position which, with that strategic skill and admirable forethought that so greatly distinguished him, he had had prepared for the defence of Lisbon.

The lines of Torres Vedras, planned by lord Wellington, were executed by the corps of engineers under colonel Fletcher and captain Jones, assisted by Portuguese workmen, from 8,000 to 10,000 of whom had been employed. Lisbon stands on a peninsula, formed by the Atlantic Ocean and the Tagus. At the distance of nearly thirty miles from the city, that peninsula is traversed, from east to west, by two chains of hills, which descend to the sea on one side, and on the other to the river. These chains run in parallel lines, at the distance of from six to nine miles; and they are crossed by the four great roads which connect Lisbon with the interior. Along the further chain, from Alhandra, on the right bank of the Tagus, to Torres Vedras, on the ocean, intrenchments were thrown up, interspersed with redoubts, armed with heavy artillery. A second line of works was constructed at a distance from the first, varying from three to ten miles; and a third nearer Lisbon. The various gorges of the hills were closed by abattis and redoubts, and the summits were crowned with forts commanding all the avenues by which an enemy could approach, and from which deadly cross-fires could be directed on a hostile force. There were fifty-nine redoubts, containing 232 pieces of cannon, and requiring about 17,500 men to garrison them in the first line, which extended twenty-two miles. On the second line (twenty-four miles from flank to flank), there were sixty-nine redoubts and batteries, in which were mounted 319 pieces of artillery; and upwards of 18,000 men were found necessary to perform the military duties of the position. The third line was much less extensive than the other two, being only intended, should the first and second be forced, to cover the troops en route to the ships. The arsenal of Lisbon supplied these works with artillery; and nothing was left undone to render them perfectly impregnable. Behind them, roads were constructed, so that the communication between the different positions could be kept up with ease and rapidity. Telegraphs were also erected, and a code of signals, adopted from the navy, introduced, to transmit orders and information from point to point. These lines were garrisoned and defended by nearly 30,000 British, about the same number of Portuguese, and 8,000 Spanish troops.

The allies established themselves in the lines of Torres Vedras in the first week of October.

They had been little pressed by the French on their march, and Masséna did not arrive in front of the intrenchments till the 10th of that month. His rear had been much harassed, as he advanced, by bodies of militia and peasantry, who took possession of every town as the French troops moved out; and at Coimbra, three days after the French had quitted it, a corps of militia, under colonel Trant, captured the hospitals and stores left there, and took prisoners a number of the imperial guard. Masséna, however, pushed on, feeling convinced that the English were going to their ships; and that he should fulfil his promise to the emperor, of planting the tricolour on the walls of Lisbon. When, therefore, he came in front of the formidable works which barred his progress, he was surprised at the scene presented to him. He and Junot spent three days in examining the works and their defences, and were compelled to pronounce them impregnable. The marshal, therefore, withdrew his troops to a position between Santarem and Thomar, fifty miles to the north-east of Lisbon. There the army was established in the middle of November. Regnier's division was cantoned on the heights of Santarem; Junot's, at Torres Novas; and Ney's at Thomar. In fixing upon this position, Masséna had three objects in view—to command the passage of the Tagus; to capture Abrantes, a fortified town on the Tagus, thirty miles north of Santarem; and to blockade the English in their lines. Having made all his arrangements, he awaited reinforcements, and dispatched general Foy to Paris, to inform the emperor of the exact state of affairs. In these positions the British and French continued for the remainder of the year.

In Spain, the cortes assembled on the 24th of September, at Cadiz. Many years had elapsed since that body had met; and it was very differently constituted from what it was in former days, consisting of only one chamber. The members swore allegiance to Ferdinand VII.; appointed a regency to exercise the executive power; and then employed themselves in framing a new constitution for the kingdom, of a very democratic tendency. The regency directed itself to military matters; general Castanos, who was a member, summoning to Cadiz general Blake, and the other high officers, for the purpose of consulting them, and arranging operations in concert with the honourable Henry Wellesley, the British ambassador.

Notwithstanding the fruitless advance of Masséna into Portugal, the position of the French, at the close of 1810, was better than it was at the commencement of the year. Both the Castiles, Andalusia, Granada, Aragon, the greater part of Catalonia, Estremadura, and La Mancha, were occupied by the imperial troops; the road from Perpignan to Barcelona was opened to them; they were firmly established on the Ebro; and only the capture of Tortosa and Tarragona was wanted to enable another irruption to be made into Valencia. The armies in these provinces were numerous and well-appointed. Soult had 75,000 men in Andalusia; Bessières had 60,000 at Valladolid, in Biscay, and Leon; Macdonald had 45,000 at Gerona and Hostalrich; Suchet, besides his garrisons, had 30,000 troops in the field; Joseph had 20,000 at Madrid; Regnier, 15,000 in Estremadura and La Mancha; and the army of Portugal numbered 50,000 effective men. No wonder that the year 1811 opened with more successes for the French arms; the Spaniards not having more than 80,000 or 90,000 badly officered and badly disciplined men, to oppose to the veteran troops and experienced commanders of the enemy.

On the 2nd of January, Suchet captured Tortosa, which was considered as the key of Southern Catalonia. The siege had commenced in December, and it surrendered after two practicable breaches had been effected; the garrison, 7,000 in number, laying down their arms. There were taken, in this fortress, 180 cannon, 30,000 shells and balls, and 150,000 pounds of powder. On the 22nd of January, Olivenza, a fortified town on the left bank of the Guadiana, near the Portuguese frontier, sixteen miles south-west of Badajoz, surrendered to Soult. The same day, the marquis de la Romana, one of the ablest and most honest of the Spanish generals, died. Before his death, he had reorganised his army, placing 10,000 men in the castle of Badajoz, and encamping the remainder on the heights of Santa Eugracia, on the right bank of the Guadiana, nearly vis-à-vis with that fortress, with which there was a communication by a stone bridge of twenty-eight arches. The camp was also protected by the fort of St. Christoval, on the same side of the river. On the 26th of January, Soult left Olivenza to undertake the siege of Badajoz. He arrived before that place on the 29th, and the trenches were opened on the 30th. As the siege progressed, it was found that the camp and fort were a great annoyance to the besiegers; and Soult resolved to take the one, and drive the Spaniards from the other. In the night of the 18th of February, a division of 6,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry crossed the Guadiana, both Soult and Mortier accompanying the force. On the 19th, the Spaniards were completely routed. Out of 12,000, not more than 5,000 escaped; the rest were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. The siege of Badajoz was then carried on with great vigour; and, on the 11th of March, the governor surrendered. Soult devoted two days to repairing the works, organising the garrison, and replenishing the stores, and then set out for Cadiz.

The siege of that city had been kept up by marshal Victor, since he first set down before it, early in 1810. The garrison had been considerably reinforced by English troops; and major-general Sir Thomas Graham had succeeded Sir Charles Stewart in the command. A detachment of these troops, under captain M'Laine, had greatly distinguished themselves, first in the capture, and then in the defence, of Matagorda, a fortress which commanded Cadiz. General Graham ordered it to be abandoned, when half the garrison were killed; but while it was in the hands of the British, it occupied the attention of the besiegers, and enabled the defenders of Cadiz to organise a complete system of defence, and collect reinforcements till they had 30,000 men within the walls, supported by a fleet of twenty-three ships and twelve frigates. Victor had only 20,000 men; but he had raised most formidable works, forming an immense semicircle, ten leagues in length, on which upwards of 300 pieces of cannon were mounted; and extending from Rota, a village on the north of Cadiz, to the tower of Bermeja, three leagues south of the port.

In February, 1811, an expedition was ordered by the Spanish government to sail from the harbour; land in the neighbourhood of Tarifa, or Algeiras; join a British force stationed at San Roque, near Gibraltar; and then, marching to the west, take the French besieging force in the rear. This expedition comprised 11,000 British and Spaniards; and a part of the remaining Spanish troops in Cadiz and the Isle of Leon, under general Zayas, was ordered to pass to the mainland, and co-operate with the force advancing from the west. Of the latter, the Spanish general, La Penas, was the commander-in-chief; and Sir Thomas Graham commanded the British contingent. The expedition sailed on the 20th and 21st of February, landed at Algeiras, and, advancing by the passes of the Ronda hills, halted within four leagues of the French outposts. Victor had heard of the expedition; but being uncertain of the points on which he would be assailed, he had, with 11,000 men, taken post between the roads of Conil and Medina, a position which enabled him to observe the movements of his opponents. On the 3rd of March, the Spaniards on the island of St. Leon, having thrown a bridge over the canal Santi-Petri, were crossing to the mainland, to aid general La Penas. They were, however, surprised by general Villatte, who drove them back, killed about 100, made 400 prisoners, destroyed the bridge, and then took up a position in the vicinity of the scene of action to watch the motions of the British, who, he expected, would move in that direction. The allies had halted on the Cerro de Puerco, overlooking a rugged plain, near the village of Barrosa, about sixteen miles to the south-east of Cadiz; the range now generally known as the heights of Barrosa. This position Graham wished to hold; but Penas refused to listen to his advice; and, on the 5th, ordered him to march through a pine-wood, which skirted the centre of the plain, down to the Torre de Bermeja, about half-way to the San Petri river. He marched the Spaniards from the heights, in another direction, leaving there only three or four battalions, and as many pieces of artillery. Victor saw the movement, and sending one of his generals, Laval, against the English, he ascended the back of the Barrosa height, dispersed the Spaniards left there, and made an easy capture of their guns and baggage. The position of the British was now perilous. The Spaniards were nowhere to be seen; the French cavalry was between them and the sea; Victor, with a brigade of fresh French troops, was on the heights, and Laval close upon Graham's left flank. In this dilemma, the British general determined to become the assailant. His small and weary force, which had been under arms twenty-four hours, and had now scarcely any food, was divided into two columns, which attacked Laval and the brigade on the hill. Laval's division was formed in two lines; the British drove one upon the other, and routed both with great slaughter. The second division, under general Dilke, scaled the height, and were met by the French before they reached the summit. A hand-to-hand combat ensued; victory seemed at first to pause, uncertain on which side to incline; but the furious valour of the British soon brought on the decision. They drove their equally brave enemies to the mountain's edge, forced them over the heights, on the opposite side to that by which they had ascended, and captured their guns. The French attempted to rally; but the British artillery had by that time reached the spot, and their destructive fire rendered re-forming impossible: the French, therefore, retreated—the great fatigue of the English preventing pursuit. The British lost, in this engagement of scarcely one hour and a quarter (and it was one of the shortest and most brilliant ever fought), seven officers and 195 rank and file killed; 54 officers and 985 non-commissioned officers, and rank and file, wounded. The loss of the French was much greater: 2,000 were killed and wounded, nearly 500 made prisoners, and six guns and an eagle were taken. La Penas never came near during the action, nor did he give directions to pursue the French in their retreat. Two battalions came up just as the fighting concluded. While it was at its height, the French, under general Villatte, were found to be attempting to turn the Barrosa height by the sea. General Whittingham, with three squadrons of cavalry, kept them in check; and one squadron of the 2nd hussars, and two of the German legion, under lieutenant-colonel Ponsonby, arrived just in time to make a brilliant charge upon the retiring foe, capturing two guns, and putting many of the troops to the sword.

An incident is connected with this battle which is worth relating, as a relief to the monotony which must, in some degree, attach to military details. Neither French nor British had any means of conveyance for the wounded, and they remained on the field, with the dead bodies, all night. The next day the British interred the latter, and took all possible care of the wounded. Amongst them was the French general Rosseau; and when he was discovered, a white poodle dog was found by his side, moaning, and licking his face and hands. It was the favourite dog of the general, which, left in quarters the previous day, when it found its master did not return, had gone in search of him, and found his body on the battle-field. The general lived three days; and, during that time, the faithful animal never left his bedside. When he was buried it established itself by the grave; from which it was, at last, attracted by general Graham, who kept the animal with him, brought it home, and it remained in his possession till his death, in Perthshire, some years afterwards.

The French were not disposed to make any further attack upon the gallant little force, which had so signally baffled their hope of driving them back to the coast; and returned to the camp before Cadiz. The British ultimately rejoined the garrison of that port.

Early in the year, Campoverdè, who had been left in Catalonia by O'Donnell, reorganised an army in the northern part of the province. Having, in a few weeks, assembled 15,000 men, he attacked Barcelona in the night of the 29th of March. He failed; but shortly after, on the 9th of April, he descended from the mountains to which he had retired, and carried the fortress of Figueras by assault—a brilliant success, which caused the greatest joy throughout the Peninsula. General Baraguay d'Hilliers immediately collected a force to blockade it; and Campoverdè, who had left a strong garrison in the place, as soon as he knew of this movement, marched on the French rear, with nearly 10,000 men. A sortie from the town, combined with an attack in the rear, would have overwhelmed the French; and to ward off this catastrophe, D'Hilliers announced to Sarsfield, who commanded the Spaniards in the field, that he had concluded an armistice with D'Erolles, who commanded the garrison, with the view to a capitulation. Sarsfield fell into the snare, suspended arms, and gave D'Hilliers time to obtain reinforcements. When he discovered the deceit which had been practised upon him, he attacked the French, and succeeded in supplying the garrison with provisions; but was ultimately obliged to retreat, with the loss of 1,100 men. Figueras was then so closely blockaded, that famine ultimately compelled the garrison to surrender.—General Macdonald, at the commencement of these operations in Northern Catalonia, had marched from Lerida to Barcelona, by the circuitous route of Manresa. Encountering a strong opposition at the bridge, which he had great difficulty in overcoming, his troops set fire to the town, though it made no resistance, and reduced 700 buildings to ashes, including two hospitals. But the flames roused the guerillas of the hills, who, learning what had taken place, attacked Macdonald's rear-guard with such fury, that, before he reached Barcelona, he lost 1,000 men. This event—which, it appears, Macdonald could not prevent—roused the fury of the Spaniards to the highest pitch; and, on the 5th of April, Campoverdè issued a proclamation, directing that no quarter should be shown to the French who might be met with in the neighbourhood of any town which had been burned by their troops.

Another important success was achieved by the French in Catalonia. After the capture of Tortosa, Suchet remained there a few weeks to obtain the necessary reinforcements, and then undertook the siege of Tarragona, also an important fortress in the province. It is situated on a rock, washed on one side by the Mediterranean, and on the other by the Francoli, which runs by the side of the walls for some distance, and then turns into the town, dividing it into upper and lower. The upper town was, at this time, surrounded by old Roman fortifications, strengthened by modern works; and the lower was defended by regular and strong intrenchments. There was a large garrison in the place, and an English fleet kept the troops constantly supplied with stores. Tarragona was invested early in May; the trenches were opened on the 21st; and the place was taken by assault on the 28th of June. The garrison defended all the outposts with the most daring bravery. None of them were taken but by "long and murderous" assaults; and the loss of life, both on the part of the besieged and the besiegers, was immense. A few of the garrison made their escape, but upwards of 10,000 prisoners, 350 cannon, a great many muskets, twenty colours, and a quantity of ammunition and other stores, were taken. More than 5,000 of the garrison were killed, and the assailants could not have lost a much smaller number. The fall of this fortress was a great blow to the patriots, as it deprived those in Catalonia of their chief support, and entirely cut them off from their compatriots in Valencia. Suchet dismantled the lower town, but garrisoned the upper division. He placed his park of artillery and ammunition in Tortosa, making it his great dépôt; sent detachments against the various guerilla bands; captured a fortified convent on Mount Serrat; and then repaired to Saragossa, where a marshal's baton awaited him.

CHAPTER XIV.

PENINSULAR CAMPAIGN, 1811; RETREAT OF MASSENA; LIFE AT HEAD-QUARTERS; OLIVENZA RETAKEN; BADAJOZ BESIEGED; BATTLE OF FUENTES D'ONORE; BATTLE OF ALBUERA; SIEGE OF BADAJOZ RAISED; CAUSES WHICH INTERFERED WITH WELLINGTON'S SUCCESSES; FRENCH DECREES AGAINST THE GUERRILLAS; THE MEASURES TAKEN TO DEFEND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES; JOSEPH'S VISIT TO PARIS; AFFAIR OF EL BODON; PERILOUS STATE OF THE ENGLISH ARMY; THE FRENCH SURPRISED AT ARROYO DEL MOLINOS; THE FRENCH IN VALENCIA; BATTLE OF SAGUNTUM; SURRENDER OF THE FORTRESS OF SAGUNTUM; CAPITULATION OF VALENCIA; FAILURE OF THE FRENCH BEFORE TARIFA; RESULTS OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1811.

DURING the winter of 1810-'11, Wellington had remained in his position at Torres Vedras, and Masséna in his at Santarem. The former was well supplied with provisions; but the latter suffered in that respect, the country being completely exhausted by the Portuguese. As the famine grew more severe, discipline was with difficulty preserved. The marshal had expected both supplies and reinforcements; but neither arriving, he gave orders to "march to the north." On the 4th of March, 1811, the backward movement began; the sick and the heavy baggage being sent in advance. On the 5th the whole army was in motion, the left bank of the Mondego being taken as the line of retreat. Lord Wellington discovered, the next day, that the French were making a retrograde movement; and immediately commenced a pursuit. On reaching Santarem, it was found that the French had used every means to cover their retreat. Sentinels appeared still to be at their post, but they were men of straw; and they had carried off all their baggage. Santarem afforded a terrible picture of the horrors of war. An officer thus described the scene it presented when the allies entered—"Smoking ruins everywhere met the eye, with the accumulated filth of months, and the putrefied remains of horses and human bodies. The houses had scarcely a vestige of wood: doors, windows, ceilings, roofs—all were burnt; and, where the sick had expired, there they were left to decay! The numbers thus abandoned were great. Every church was demolished—the tombs opened in searching after hidden plate; every altar-piece destroyed; and the effluvia so offensive as to defy describing." Such was the state of many of the towns in the Peninsula.

In the retreat, the British kept close upon the rear of the French. On the 11th of March, the rear-guard, under Ney, was attacked at Pombal; but the affair was very slight. On the 12th, the French made a stand on the heights of Redinha, where Ney was attacked by the divisions of generals Picton, Park, Cole, Spencer, and Erskine's light infantry. The French claim the honour of driving the British from the heights which they assailed, and throwing them into confusion, when lord Wellington advanced with fresh troops in support; and Ney retreated, crossing the river Soure, on the banks of which the village of Redinha is situated. He marched by Condexa to Ponte Murcella; whilst Masséna, with another column, moved by Ponte Cobreta, where he was nearly surprised and taken prisoner. On the 13th, Ney was defeated at Fonte d'Aronce, and compelled to pass the Ceira in great confusion, losing nearly 500 men, while the loss of the allies was very trifling. On the 15th there was another engagement at Sabugal, which lord Wellington described as "one of the most glorious actions the British ever were engaged in." The French were the assailants; only a part of the British army, isolated from the rest, was in position: they sustained the attack of greatly superior numbers, repulsed them, became themselves the assailants, and drove the French from the field, retaining an howitzer as a trophy of victory. The conduct of Ney, in these movements, so much displeased Masséna, that he put him under arrest.

The retreat of Masséna (which, in his despatches, he termed, "a change of position from the Zezere to the Agueda") was, as a military movement, admirable; but, as a moral one, remarks colonel Maxwell, "nothing could be more disgraceful. The country over which the retreating columns of the French army passed, was marked by bloodshed and devastation. Villages were everywhere destroyed; property wasted or carried off; and many personal outrages committed." Great cause had the Portuguese, therefore, to rejoice when, on the 5th of April, the invaders recrossed the frontier; and the British, having closely blockaded Almeida, where alone a French soldier remained in Portugal, except as a prisoner—established their head-quarters at Villa Formosa, where the time appears to have passed pleasantly. In the lines of Torres Vedras, the officers had, says the late marquis of Londonderry, "contented themselves with keeping pointers and greyhounds, and indulging, as often as opportunities offered, in the sports of shooting, coursing, and fishing; but now a taste for hunting began to prevail amongst us, and packs of fox-hounds and harriers, more or less numerous and good, were established in the different divisions of the army. At head-quarters we were fortunate enough to become possessed of an excellent pack, which afforded us much amusement, and occupied time, which otherwise would have hung heavily on our hands. In our quarters we lived gaily and well: a spirit of good-fellowship and hospitality everywhere prevailed; and, in them, balls, private theatricals, and agreeable parties, were things of common occurrence." War undoubtedly appeared under a very different phase at Villa Formosa, to that which we have shown it presented at Santarem.

Lord Wellington devoted some days to the reorganisation of his army, and then repaired to Alemtejo, where general Beresford was stationed with a British and Portuguese force; at the head of which he had, on the 26th of March, defeated the French, when, in pursuance of the orders of Masséna, they were retiring from the town of Campo-Mayor, which they had previously occupied. After this affair the general retook Olivenza; and inflicted a considerable loss upon the French in a cavalry affair at Santos Maimona. He then commenced preparations for the siege of Badajoz. Wellington was very anxious to recover the possession of that fortress, and it was invested by a British and Portuguese force on the 22nd of April, the day after his lordship arrived at the cantonments of the allied armies in Alemtejo. The next day his lordship, with a strong escort of German and Portuguese cavalry, crossed the Caya, to make a reconnaissance of Badajoz. He was enabled to ascertain, pretty well, the condition of the fortress; and he also learned that Masséna would soon be on his way to relieve Almeida. Captain Sherer remarks, that there is "no feature in the military character of the French more admirable than that hopeful elasticity of mind with which they cheerfully apply themselves to repair losses and misfortune." Masséna and his troops displayed this quality. On the 5th of April they quitted Portugal, dispirited, dejected, and after having sustained several defeats, although they had well preserved their character for bravery. Before the close of the month they were reorganised; and Masséna found himself at Ciudad Rodrigo, at the head of 40,000 infantry and 4,000 cavalry, with which he prepared to advance to the relief of Almeida. That town stands on the right bank of the Coa, which is crossed by several bridges, one thirty miles above the town, affording a direct communication with Ciudad Rodrigo. Lord Wellington was anxious to prevent its relief; and, with that view, he collected four brigades—those of Craufurd, Campbell, Pack, and Erskine, in and near the village of Fuentes d'Onore—a pretty hamlet, situated on the left bank of a small river, the Duas Casas, which runs in a northerly direction, nearly parallel with the Coa. A guerilla force, under Don Juan Sanchez, was posted at a short distance, at once to observe the French, and support, if necessary, the British, whose entire force did not exceed 30,800 infantry, and 1,200 horse.

On the 1st and 2nd of May, Masséna's army crossed the river Agueda by the bridge of Ciudad Rodrigo, having with it an immense convoy; the intention being at once to relieve Almeida, and furnish the garrison with the means of making a protracted defence. On coming near the fortress, he discovered the English encampment at Fuentes d'Onore, evidently formed to obstruct his march. On the 3rd, the French made a fierce attack upon the village; general Ferry, with 1,200 men, advancing first, 1,800 being left in reserve. At the onset he carried, by a determined charge, the barriers which had been raised before the principal approach to the village, and drove the British beyond the Duas Casas, following them to the left bank. Colonel Williams, who commanded, being reinforced, renewed the battle. He was soon after wounded, and the command devolved on colonel Cadogan, of the 71st. The ground won by the French was now, inch by inch, recovered; and colonel Maxwell remarks, that "probably, during the Peninsular conflicts, a closer combat was never maintained; as, in the main street, particularly, the rival troops fought fairly hand to hand." Night closed, and the English remained in possession of the village; the French being on the left bank of the Duas Casas, which, in their despatches, they call the bottom of Fuentes d'Onore. Masséna spent the next day in a reconnaissance, and he determined to change the front of his army, and, on the 5th, attack the British right, which he expected to drive back upon the centre, and to force both right and centre upon the left; then, following up the entire allied army to the lower Coa, he hoped completely to disorganise it. The movement was executed in the night of the 4th, and the morning of the 5th of May; but not so secretly that Wellington did not observe it, and penetrate the main design of his opponent. Fighting recommenced on the morning of the 5th; the first interchange of hostilities being between Montbrun's cavalry and Don Juan Sanchez' guerillas, who were driven back. Junot also attacked and carried Pozo Velho, a small village, where an advanced guard had been posted; and these two successes uncovered and turned the British right. Wellington now changed his position, to meet the strategy of his opponent. Still holding Fuentes, and leaving his left to rest on the Duas Casas, he ordered his right to fall back, and take up a new line at right angles with the original formation. This wing had to retire nearly two miles, in the face of the French cavalry, commanded by one of their most daring officers, Montbrun. It was, however, successfully executed; and the divisions composing the wing took up their new position on a lofty knoll, near Frenada, another village in the vicinity of Fuentes, standing on the left bank of the Turones, a stream running between the Duas Casas and the Coa. There was some little confusion when the new alignement was taken up, says captain Sherer, and "Montbrun directed a general charge. He was met with so heavy a fire of artillery, and such close and steady volleys of musketry, that he drew off, leaving the ground covered with fallen horses." The battle now raged, says Sir William Napier, "throughout a vast plain; and in all the war there was not a more dangerous hour for England." The village of Fuentes d'Onore was again the scene of a bloody strife. It was defended by three regiments—the 71st, 24th, and 79th. About two o'clock, wrote the late general Picton, in a letter to his uncle, "these regiments [which, it should be remarked, were greatly outnumbered] began to give way, and fell back on more defensible ground in the rear of the village. At this moment, the 88th, under colonel Wallace, and led on by major-general Mackinnon, was ordered to move up and support them. This was done in admirable order; and they made so overwhelming a charge through the streets, that they drove the enemy out of the village with immense loss." Evening put a stop to the fighting. The right of Masséna's army was brought to a halt; the brigades which had endeavoured to take the village were withdrawn; the French troops took themselves to repose—their commanders being employed, it would seem, in disputing as to the course to be pursued the next day; whilst the British, fatigued as they were, anticipating another attack, employed themselves in throwing up intrenchments to defend the position; in which labour a brigade of the light division, that joined after the battle, assisted.

No attack, however, took place. On the 6th and 7th of May, the British were under arms at early dawn. The enemy, however, remained immovable. On the 8th and 9th, they appeared to threaten the centre of the British, but no attack was made; and on the 10th, the entire army of Masséna was seen in full retreat towards Ciudad Rodrigo, by the road on which they had advanced. The French historian of the Consulate and the Empire tells us, that, on the 6th, "Masséna had determined to renew the contest. But generals Fririon, Lazowski, and Eblé, who were as devoted to him as to the honour of their arms, revealed to him some sad truths he would fain have ignored, and informed him that many officers, some of them worn out with fatigue, others summoned to serve in different armies, were not sufficiently resolved to do their duty to be relied on in a desperate attack." He therefore resolved to destroy Almeida, instead of revictualling it; and having obtained three volunteers to convey a dispatch to general Brennier, who commanded the garrison, ordering him to blow up the fortifications, he only waited till he knew, by a signal to be given (the discharge of a hundred guns), that his despatch had been received. This signal was heard in the evening of the 7th. The movements on the 8th and 9th were made to attract the attention of the British, and give Brennier time to carry out his instructions. This he did on the night of the 10th. At ten o'clock the mines were fired; the garrison sallied out; and though seen and followed by generals Pack and Cotton, the fugitives succeeded in reaching the main army. Masséna again crossed the Agueda at Ciudad Rodrigo, deposited the four months' provisions he had intended for Almeida in that fortress, and then proceeded to Salamanca, to refresh and reorganise his troops.

The loss of both parties, in the two engagements of Fuentes d'Onore, was considerable. The British had 200 killed, 1,028 wounded, and 294 missing. It is estimated that not fewer than 5,000 French soldiers were put hors de combat. Masséna, in his despatches, claimed a victory; but as he abandoned the object for which he had advanced, gave up the town he had come to save, and left the British in possession of the ground from which he attempted to drive them, the affair had, most certainly, all the characters of a defeat. Wellington, with that generosity which distinguished him, declared, that general Brennier's exploit was equal to a victory: but his skilful and daring evasion of the blockading force had nothing to do with the battle. His lordship was very angry with general Campbell, who commanded the force that blockaded Almeida, for not being more on the alert.*

After the battle of Fuentes d'Onore, Masséna resigned the command of the army of Portugal, and was replaced by Marmont; the troops retiring to Salamanca, and being scattered round that city, "in a state of misery, discontent, and disorganisation," according to Thiers, "it is difficult to describe." Wellington, after the retirement of the French, removed his headquarters to Elvas, a fortified frontier city of Alemtejo, twelve miles to the westward of Badajoz; leaving to marshal Beresford the conduct of the siege of that important fortress. The 5th French corps, under general Latour-Maubourg, was posted at no great distance; but he was too weak to attempt to raise the siege, and he waited impatiently the arrival of marshal Soult, to whom applications for assistance had been repeatedly sent. On the arrival of that general at Cadiz, after his defeat of the Spaniards, and the capture of Badajoz, he found that marshal Victor did not require his immediate assistance; and, on the 10th of May, with a division of about 11,000 or 12,000 men, he retraced his steps to the north, and joined the 5th corps. He was then at the head of from 18,000 to 20,000 first-rate infantry, 3,000 superb cavalry, and had forty cannon with him. On the 15th, this army arrived at Santa Martha; and Soult found that a considerable allied force was posted at Albuera, a village standing on the left bank of a river of the same name, about thirteen miles south-east of Badajoz—marshal Beresford having, on hearing of the advance of the French, raised the siege, joined the Spanish generals Castanos and Blake, and taken up that position, with a view to arrest the progress of Soult. The allies—a motley force, composed of English, Germans, Portuguese, and Spaniards—were posted on some hills to the north of the Albuera. The British divisions, commanded by brigadier-generals Cole and Stewart, were in the centre; the Spaniards, under Blake, were drawn up in a double line on the right; the Portuguese on the left; and Alten, with his German legion, was posted in the village. The cavalry, under Lumley, covered the right flank of the Spaniards. There were about 7,000 British, 8,000 Portuguese, and 16,000 Spaniards, of whom 2,000 were cavalry; besides the German legion, and thirty-two guns. The allies had, therefore, the advantage in the number of troops; but, except the British and the Germans, they were greatly inferior in character to the enemy.

There was a wood to the south of the Albuera, abutting on a plain which extended to the banks of the stream: in the wood and on the plain the French bivouacked in the night of the 15th of May. In the morning of the 16th—observing that the allies had not occupied a wooded eminence, situated in advance of a rivulet, called the Ferida, that ran past their right, and which high ground commanded the field in that direction—Soult determined to make that quarter the object of his principal attack. Accordingly, he concentrated nearly 15,000 men, consisting of the 5th and Gerard's corps, with the artillery, in that direction, while an attack was made upon the village by the remainder of the army. When the French began to cross the river, they were greatly annoyed by the guns from a Spanish battery; but they passed on, nothing heeding, and came upon the right wing of the allies, while it was making a change of front to receive them. Blake had been apprised of his danger by marshal Beresford, time enough to have been completely prepared: but his attention, and that of Castanos, was directed to the village, and the bridge over the Albuera, where fierce fighting was going on; and he had paid no attention to his lordship's entreaties, that he would throw back his line and face outwards, till the glittering of the enemy's lances and bayonets through the wood, convinced him that the principal attack was coming in that direction. Then the necessary orders were given; but it was too late. The Spaniards were attacked while in the act of moving, thrown into confusion, broken, and driven from the heights, upon which the French immediately established themselves. While the Spaniards were in disorderly retreat, the British division advanced to regain the heights. The brigade, under general Stewart, had made its way through the broken mass of the Spaniards, reached the slope of the hill, discharged several volleys at the enemy, and were about to dash upon the solid mass opposed to them with their bayonets, when two regiments of French hussars, and one of Polish lancers, which had got round to their flank under cover of a thick mist, charged the column, killed many, and drove more unto the French line—700 men and three standards being taken. With any other soldiers the day would have been lost. But the British, as Napoleon observed subsequently, "never knew when they were beaten." Those that remained, returned again and again to the charge; and though the French, now greatly superior in numbers, not only maintained their post, but gained ground, whilst the Polish lancers captured six guns, and lord Beresford was making preparations for a retreat—movements (directed by colonel, afterwards lord, Hardinge) of Cole's and Abercromby's divisions, upon the right and left flanks, changed the fate of the day. A fearful carnage ensued; the guns were recaptured, and the British were advancing to victory, when a fearful fire from Gerard's infantry stopped them: many officers and men fell; and the whole brigade, says Sir William Napier, "staggered by the iron tempest, reeled like sinking ships." Still they were not conquered. They continued pressing on, firing as they advanced, and cheering as only British soldiers can cheer, till they drove the French before them to the farthest edge of the hill. "In vain did their reserves, joining with the struggling multitude, endeavour to sustain the fight: their efforts only increased the irremediable confusion; and the mighty mass at length giving way like a loosened cliff, went headlong down the ascent. The rain flowed after, in streams discoloured with blood; and 1,800 unwounded men, the remnant of 6,000 unconquerable British soldiers, stood triumphant on the fatal hill."* Up to this time, there was a mass of Spaniards which had not been engaged; and Beresford, collecting these, the German legion, and the Portuguese, forming a column of near 10,000 men, advanced up the hill, and pursued the now retreating French, of whom Gerard's corps was completely dispersed; and the men, throwing aside their arms, were recrossing the stream. Another corps, under Werle, sent to their support, was also beaten, and their general killed. Their artillery, however, was well served, and arrested the pursuit. At length the fighting ceased, the French having left the north bank of the Albuera, and the allies being too much exhausted to follow up the retiring foe. The battle was a fierce and bloody one. The Spaniards lost 2,000; the Portuguese and Germans, 600; the British, 4,500; and 500 prisoners and one howitzer were carried off by the French. Soult had nearly 4,000 killed, and 6,500 wounded, of whom 800 were taken by the British.

In this hardly-fought battle, the results, as in that of Fuentes d'Onore, were in favour of the British. They remained in possession of their position, having beaten off the assailants, and immediately resumed the siege of Badajoz; whilst Soult, remaining inactive in the wood on the 17th of May, on the 18th retired to Solano, leaving such of his wounded as could not bear removal, to the generosity of the British. His retreat was covered by the heavy cavalry of Latour-Maubourg; and followed by the 3rd and 4th dragoon guards, Lumley's horse artillery, and Madden's Portuguese cavalry. They came up with the French cavalry near Usagre, a few days after they left the wood of Albuera—attacked, beat, and dispersed them, taking eighty prisoners, and killing about 100. After this affair, the pursuing troops were recalled; lord Wellington left Elvas, and joined the camp to take the direction of the siege of Badajoz, which Beresford had resumed; general Hill took the command of the 2nd division and the covering army; and Beresford returned to Lisbon to reorganise the Portuguese military administration, which was much in want of the directing head and hand.

Soult retreated to Llarena, sixty-two miles to the south-east of Badajoz, and established himself on the slope of the mountains which separate Estremadura from Andalusia. He was greatly in want of reinforcements; and they had been provided for him by the emperor, who, early in May, had ordered Marmont to collect his corps on the Tagus, and co-operate with Soult for the deliverance of Badajoz: the general of the army of the north had sent him 4,000 men, in consequence of orders from the same quarter; and Drouet was on the march to join him with 9,000 more. Marmont collected 27,000 infantry, 3,000 cavalry, and thirty-six pieces of cannon. To deceive the English, whilst carrying out the orders of the emperor, he first made for Ciudad Rodrigo, revictualled that place, and then advanced into Estremadura, to join Soult, and enable him to raise the siege of the fortress. That garrison still made a most heroic defence; and had repulsed two assaults of the English, in the nights of the 9th and 10th of June, with great loss to the latter. Before the second assault was made, an intercepted despatch informed lord Wellington of the enemy's movements; and as he had not sufficient force to resist the united corps of Soult and Marmont, his lordship resolved to raise the siege, and to retire upon the Caya and the mountains of Portalègre. On the 17th, he took up an excellent position, well capable of being defended by such troops as he had under his command; all the stores and heavy cannon being removed in safety to Elvas. On the 18th, Soult and Marmont effected their junction; and, on the 20th, entered Badajoz. They had now 60,000 infantry, and 2,600 cavalry—composing, the French historians say, "the best army in Europe, with the exception of that of Davoust;"—and pitched their advanced posts on heights in sight of the British, who kept close in their camp. Wellington had only 57,000 men (15,000 being Portuguese); and if the French had attacked him, it is impossible to say what might have been the result. The two marshals differed, however, as to the proper strategies to be adopted; and the consequence was, that, having reinforced the garrison of Badajoz, and made a reconnaissance of the English positions on the 22nd of June, without inducing Wellington to make any display of his force—Soult, on the 27th, started with his corps for Seville, where he certainly was very much wanted; and Marmont placed himself en route towards the Tagus. He selected the village of Naval-Moral, lying between that river and the Tiètar, for his head-quarters; and, choosing the bridge of Almaraz as the centre of the communications he had to guard, he stationed his forces so as to enable him to march upon Estremadura or Castile with equal rapidity; and then devoted his attention to the formation of magazines, the repair of his defective artillery, and the care of his sick and wounded.

Notwithstanding Napoleon had such a large army in Spain, it had been unable to effect more than one of his objects. It had raised the siege of Badajoz, but it could not compel the English to quit Spain, much less drive them out of the Peninsula. Had Wellington been better supported at this time, the war might have been sooner brought to a close. But the corruption which pervaded every part of the Portuguese administration, for some time paralysed the efforts of marshal Beresford to recruit and discipline the Portuguese army, and prevented Wellington from receiving the supplies of money and men which were promised him, and of which he stood so much in need. The army in the field was seldom more than half the number returned, and for which pay was drawn. The English subsidy was frequently diverted to other purposes; and when the government at Lisbon found their funds running short, they resorted to anything rather than the imposition of taxes, which would have endangered their popularity. Writing, on the 12th of June, to colonel Gordon, lord Wellington said, speaking of this government—"From want of money, they can pay nobody. The hire of mules and carts is never paid; the horses die and the people desert; the commissaries have no money to buy provisions, or provide the means of transport; and hence the troops are constantly suffering; and, as I will not allow pillage, every department of the service is paralysed. In consequence, I have been obliged to incorporate the Portuguese troops with the English divisions, and both are paid from one military chest; but the evil exists to its full extent with the detached corps and garrisons." Whilst this was the case with respect to the Portuguese, there was not a Spanish army in the field worthy of the name; and the greatest jealousy prevailed amongst the generals, of each other, and of the British commander-in-chief. Combined action, to any extent, was impossible: and when the troops of the two nations were engaged together, as at Albuera, the obstinacy of the Spanish commanders first put success in jeopardy, and then prevented a proper advantage being taken of a victory when it was gained. Nor were the British government exempt from blame. The reinforcements in men, sent to Wellington, were very limited; and his lordship says, in one of his despatches—"The miserable and pitiful want of money prevents me from doing many things which might and ought to be done for the safety of the country."

The difficulties of Wellington would have been greatly increased, but for the bravery and activity of the Spanish guerillas, who were never idle when there was a possibility of their harassing the enemy, or cutting off his supplies. In May, Bessières issued two decrees—one making "the clergy, alcaldes, curés, and justices of every village, responsible for the exact payment of the contributions;" and the second was directed against the guerillas. By this decree—which nothing could justify—"the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, children, and nephews of all individuals who had quitted their domiciles, and did not inhabit the villages occupied by the French," were declared to be "responsible, in their person and effects, for all acts of violence committed by the insurgents." Every person absent from his home eight days, was to be considered a brigand; every one found corresponding with the insurgents, was to be put to death; and "every one writing to the inhabitants of a country occupied by them," was "sentenced to ten years' imprisonment." These severe decrees, and "the authorised and regulated plunder," as Wellington termed it, of which the French were guilty in every district they occupied, kept alive the patriotism of the Spaniards, and made them more than ever desirous to expel the invaders.

After the battle of Albuera, defensive measures were adopted, by order of the emperor, over the entire north district of the Peninsula. Astorga was evacuated and dismantled, not being considered worth employing a garrison; but the castle of Burgos was strongly fortified; formidable têtes-de-ponts were constructed on the Ebro, at Miranda, and the Bidassoa at Irun; the defiles between Vittoria and Bayonne were defended by blockhouses and earthworks; and a strong fort was constructed at Santona. Napoleon also sent reinforcements of men to strengthen his army, with ample supplies of ammunition and military stores. Vandermaison crossed the Pyrenees with a division of several thousand men, and joined the army of the north. A reserve was formed at Bayonne; and the divisions of Reille, Caffarelli, and Souham, with the Italian division of Severole—the four amounting to 40,000 men—were appointed to occupy Biscay, Navarre, and the northern portion of Old Castile, and to watch and keep open the communication with Bayonne. By the end of September, Napoleon had 368,000 men in Spain, of whom 314,000 were effective. Such an army appeared more than adequate to the conquest of the kingdom; but, according to Bessières, it occupied too wide an extent of country, and was too much scattered. Writing to Berthier, in June, he complained of this state of things. "We cling to dreams," he said. "Cadiz and Badajoz will swallow up all our resources; Cadiz, because it will not be taken; and Badajoz, because it can only be supported by an army. The only safe course would be, to destroy the one, and abandon, for the moment, all thought of the other. We should concentrate our forces; retain certain points d'appui for the protection of our magazines and hospitals, and regard two-thirds of Spain as a vast battle-field, which a single victory may either secure to, or wrest from us, until we change our whole system, and seriously set about pacifying and conquering the country." These views, though no doubt correct, were so displeasing to Napoleon, that he immediately superseded Bessières in the command of the army of the north, and ordered him to return to France.—Not only were the armies of France too widely scattered, but, in the early part of 1811, they were in want of many necessaries, and exhausted by fatigue, notwithstanding the system of plunder which was pursued, and the heavy contributions which were levied on the inhabitants. When Soult was at Seville he lived in luxury; but all the other generals, as well as their men, had to endure great privations. "When I arrived at the head-quarters of the army of the north, in January last," wrote Marmont to Berthier, "I did not find a single grain of corn in the magazine, not a penny in the military chest; nothing anywhere but debts, and a real or fictitious scarcity, of which it is hardly possible to form an idea. Provisions, even for each day's consumption, could be obtained only by arms in our hands."

The king, in his palace at Madrid, was no better off than the officers in cantonments or in camp. He could not touch the revenues of the provinces, and those of Madrid were quite unequal to meet the demands made upon them. Many and bitter were his complaints to his brother of the marshals, who "intercepted his revenue, disregarded his orders, insulted his government, and oppressed and ruined his country." So many and so great were the difficulties by which he was surrounded, that having, early in April, 1811, received a formal letter from his brother, announcing the birth of the king of Rome, and asking him to be one of the sponsors, he resolved to go to Paris and resign his crown. He left Madrid on the 23rd of April, and met with a courteous reception from his imperial majesty, who, however, would not accept his resignation; but listened to his complaints, and promised him pecuniary aid, and that reinforcements and stores should be sent to the army. There was an agreement between the brothers, which some term a "private treaty," by which the emperor stipulated to place the army of the centre entirely under the command of the king, who was to receive one-fourth of the contributions levied in the provinces for its support; and also of the Spaniards, who, to the amount of nearly 30,000, had enlisted in his service. Half a million francs per month had been remitted from Paris, for the more urgent expenses of the king's court and household. This was to be increased to one million. The emperor still retained the direction of the armies in the field; still insisted upon the marshals corresponding with Berthier, and taking all their orders from the Tuileries. Before Joseph left Paris, Napoleon strongly pressed upon his brother the advisability of summoning a cortes at Madrid, to legislate for the country, and thus throw what he called "a miserable canaille of obscure agitators"—the cortes at Cadiz—into the background. Joseph promised compliance with his brother's wishes, and returned to the Spanish capital on the 16th of July. The emperor kept his promise as to reinforcing and supplying the army; but his personal engagements with Joseph were not carried out; and circumstances prevented the latter from summoning the cortes.

Both Marmont and Soult remained nearly inactive in the months of July and August, except when the latter was obliged to act against the guerillas. Towards the end of the latter month, they prepared to carry out orders given to Masséna in March, before he resigned the command of the army of Portugal. Berthier informed that general, that it was the intention of the emperor, "after the harvest, in September, to combine a movement with the army of the south, a corps of the central army, and the army of Portugal, in order to defeat the English." The expulsion of Wellington and his troops from the Peninsula was the object to be achieved; and the emperor could not be brought to believe that success was doubtful. His marshals were much less sanguine.

In September, the allied army under Wellington was cantoned upon the line of the Agueda; and the English general was again preparing for the investment of Ciudad Rodrigo, the capture of which, as well as of Badajoz, it was the great object of the French generals to prevent. The garrison of the former fortress was reduced to the greatest distress. In the beginning of September, they were put upon half-rations; and on the 15th, general Reynaud, the governor, informed Marmont that it would be impossible for him to hold out beyond the 25th. The marshal, on receipt of this intelligence, directed general Dorsenne, who commanded the army of the north (having replaced Bessières, duke of Istria, when he was ordered to Paris), to prepare a large convoy of provisions in the neighbourhood of Salamanca. That general succeeded in getting together 900 waggons, laden with bread, flour, biscuits, and meat, and put himself at the head of above 30,000 troops, to cover their entry. Marmont, who, since the arrival of his reinforcements, had 50,000 effective men under his banners, also collected a large convoy at Bejar; and the two armies and convoys united at Tamanes on the 21st of September. These armies were both in a very effective state, thoroughly refreshed, provided with all necessary matériel, and exceeded 80,000 in number; having 6,000 excellent cavalry, and a good park of artillery. The centre of the British force, at this time, was at Fuente Guinaldo, on the Agueda, almost within sight of the walls of Ciudad Rodrigo; and, quite unknown to the French, Wellington had collected sixty-eight heavy guns, with all the apparatus for a siege, within sixty miles of the fortress. He had an advanced post at El Bodon, on a height commanding the road from Ciudad Rodrigo to Fuente Guinaldo. The troops cantoned there were the 5th and 77th regiments, a brigade of Portuguese artillery, a few troops of German hussars, and the 11th light dragoons, under major-general Colville. On the 23rd of September, the French approached Ciudad Rodrigo, and succeeded in sending in the convoys. This operation was superintended by general Dorsenne; while marshal Marmont advanced to the left, and reconnoitred the English position. It was deemed a favourable moment for an attack; but none was made till the 25th. On that day, the general of cavalry, Montbrun, at the head of fourteen battalions of foot and thirty-five squadrons of horse, crossed the Agueda by the bridge of Ciudad Rodrigo, and made a furious assault upon the position of El Bodon. The French cavalry, outnumbering the whole British force, dashed up the hill, under a heavy fire from the Portuguese artillery. They were met, and repeatedly repulsed; but at last numbers prevailed: the cavalry reached the battery, sabred the gunners, and took the guns. Then was seen an act of most heroic daring. The 5th regiment, under major Ridge, rushed forward in line, drove back the cavalry, retook the guns, turned them upon the enemy, and, being supported by the 77th, fairly drove the French cavalry down the hill. Thus the post was theirs; but Wellington, seeing that a French division was advancing to cut off the only road to Guinaldo, ordered the victorious troops to join the centre at that place. The little band, shorn of many of their number, immediately descended into the plain, where they were again assailed by Montbrun and his splendid horse. Colville formed his infantry into two squares; and as the remains of the cavalry which had been on the hill were some distance in front, the 5th and 77th were completely enveloped in the mass of the French horse. Then a rolling volley was heard; the steeds recoiled, and became scattered; "the glitter of bayonets was seen," says Napier, in his eloquent language, "on the edge of the smoke; and the British regiments, unscathed, came forth, like the holy men from the Assyrian furnace!" Ere the French could recover, the English were joined by Picton, at the head of three regiments of the 3rd division; and the whole reached the camp in safety.

Had Marmont known the position of Wellington, he might have made himself master of the entire British army, which was divided at various points on the Agueda; and his lordship had not more than 15,000 men with him at Fuente Guinaldo. Neither his right nor his left wing had come up; and on the 26th, the French general had 35,000 infantry, and about 7,000 cavalry, in front of his position. The affair of the 25th was, however, not forgotten; and, uncertain what might be the number of the British, no attack was made. In the night, the other divisions came in, and Wellington ordered the army to retire to a new position, between the Coa and the source of the Agueda. The French had also been ordered to retire; and had begun their march in the night. But when the next day, it was found that Fuente Guinaldo was evacuated, they retraced their steps, and started in pursuit. One division of the British had taken the road to Aldea del Ponte. At that village a French column came up with a brigade of the 4th division, and the village was twice taken and retaken; the British holding it till the entire army had reached its destined ground—a strong and narrow position in front of the Coa. Here, on the 28th, Wellington offered battle; but Marmont declined fighting. The former then put his troops into cantonments on both banks of the Coa, the blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo being entrusted to Don Juan Sanchez. Marmont returned to his old quarters on the banks of the Tagus; and Dorsenne went to Salamanca and the Douro. Thus retracing their steps, says Thiers, "with the single satisfaction of having revictualled Ciudad Rodrigo; but with the bitter regret of having permitted the escape of the English army at the moment when it might have been overwhelmed." When Marmont was informed of the small force before him on the 26th, he exclaimed, says Napier, "Ah! Wellington! thy star, too, is bright."

Wellington left general Hill hovering on the confines of Spain and Portugal, covering Alentejo, and watching Badajoz. Soult had left general Drouet at Merida, to observe Estremadura; and authorised him to extend the levy of his contributions as far as Cáceres—a town in the northern part of the province, standing on the river of the same name, which runs through the valley of the Tagus. Drouet had placed general Gerard at the head of one of the divisions of his corps, and that officer had made excursions, for the purpose of raising supplies, as far as Cáceres. Castanos, after the dispersion of the Spaniards at the battle of Albuera, had succeeded in rallying another army, and the operations of Gerard were extremely injurious to him, as they cut off his supplies. This made it necessary that the French should be driven from that part of Estremadura; and the duty of dislodging them was entrusted to general Hill, who was assisted by a Spanish detachment. Gerard had again advanced as far as Cáceres, when he was informed that the English were ascending the valley of the Tagus, to cut off his line of communication. He did not, at first, pay any attention to the information, though, on the 27th of October, the enemy was close upon his rear. He was, on that day, at Arroyo del Molinos, twenty-seven miles to the south-east of Cáceres, where he awaited the alcalde, who had promised to bring him 1,000 oz. of gold, levied on the inhabitants. In the evening, the British had reached Alcuéscar, a short distance from Arroyo, where they lay under arms all night. In the morning, when the French were preparing to march, they were surprised to find themselves attacked. There was but little fighting. The French cavalry made off; the infantry threw down their arms, and attempted to escape; but nearly 2,000 were made prisoners, and the arms, baggage—in fact, the entire matériel of the division, fell into the hands of the British. General Hill having effected the duty entrusted to him, retired to Portalègre, a frontier town of Alemtejo, and the troops went into cantonments.

We must now refer to the important movements in the south of Spain. After the capture of Tarragona—which was followed by that of Montserrat, a strong mountain fortress, and the last stronghold of independence in that part of Spain—general Suchet had established order and regular government in Aragon and Catalonia; but several bands of guerillas threatened the frontier, and kept him and his troops in constant activity. In September, he received orders from the emperor to occupy Valencia, and capture its capital; Napoleon anticipating that, when that object was effected, at least half his army might join those of Portugal and the north, and accomplish the great end and aim of his ambition, the expulsion of the English. As Suchet was obliged to leave at least 12,000 troops to guard Aragon and Catalonia, he had only about 22,000 for his new expedition; and with this force, divided into three columns, he started on the 15th of September, and on the 20th these columns had crossed the frontier, and were united on the plain of Castellon de la Plana. An army which Blake had collected and organised after the battle of Albuera, being in a distant part of the province, no opposition was made to this advance. On the 23rd, the town of Murviedro, the ancient Saguntum, was invested. The town is built at the foot of a rock, crowned by a strong fortress. The French attempted to take this fortress by escalade on the 28th of September, but were repulsed with great loss. Finding that a regular siege was necessary, the siege-train was sent for from Tortosa; general Compère, with his corps, being at the same time detached to invest Oropesa, a fortress Suchet had left in his rear. The artillery stopped before this fortress till its surrender, on the 10th of October, and then was taken on to Saguntum; which having been bombarded and breached, was again assaulted on the 18th, and again were the assailants repulsed, with the loss of several hundred men. The garrison had also suffered considerably; and being enabled to make signals to the vessels passing along the coast, a knowledge of their condition was conveyed to general Blake, who was in the neighbourhood of Valencia, and resolved to make an attempt to relieve them. This was the very thing Suchet wanted. He was anxious to encounter Blake's army, but reluctant to go too far from Saguntum to meet it.

Blake had about 30,000 men with him, and several distinguished officers; one being the gallant guerilla chief, Villa Campa. He left Valencia soon after he received accounts of the straits to which the garrison of Saguntum was reduced. He approached the plain of Saguntum on the 24th of October; and the next day the two armies were face to face. Suchet had about 16,000 men to oppose to Blake's 30,000; but his troops were better commanded; and though the Spaniards fought bravely, and stood more steadily than usual, they were out-manœuvred, defeated, and retreated in disorder, leaving 1,000 killed on the field, 4,700 prisoners, twelve pieces of cannon, and four flags. The French, though they admit that "the Spaniards fought desperately," yet estimate their own loss at only 700 killed and wounded. The immediate result of the victory was, that the fortress of Saguntum capitulated, and 2,500 more prisoners were taken.

Suchet, though successful in his advance, found his rear greatly harassed by guerillas, who had gained many successes. He was compelled, therefore, to detach a part of his army to clear away these active and persevering irregulars, and with the rest he blockaded Valencia, at the same time sending couriers to Paris, to demand reinforcements. The emperor attaching great importance to the conquest of Valencia, thought everything else should be subordinate to that object; and he ordered Joseph, Marmont, and Soult to send troops to Suchet; and general Reille was ordered from Navarre, in the same direction, being succeeded by general Caffarelli. Joseph and Marmont dispatched divisions from the armies of the centre and Portugal, and Reille entered Valencia at the head of two corps d'armée. Soult, however, could not spare any men; and they were not wanted. The reinforcements he received enabled Suchet to carry on, successfully, his operations against the capital of the province, where general Blake had taken refuge after the battle of Saguntum. So much time was lost in waiting for the reinforcements, that December closed before the city was regularly invested. Then general Blake abandoned the outer works, and retired within the enceinte; and having refused to surrender on the first summons, he capitulated, after a brief bombardment. On the 9th of January, 1812, the French entered the city from which they had been twice, in 1808 and 1810, repulsed; and Suchet, who appears to have possessed higher administrative talents than any other of the French marshals, soon established, in Valencia, the same order and subordination which prevailed, when he was present, in Aragon and Catalonia. He, however, levied a heavy contribution on the province, amounting to £2,000,000.

Soult, in Andalusia, had not the success which attended Suchet in Valencia. Ballasteros, one of the Spanish commanders at Albuera, had, after that battle, landed in the south, and soon was at the head of several thousand men. Soult sent a powerful force against him; and he was obliged to take refuge under the cannon of Gibraltar. Brigadier-general Skerrit had, about that time, taken possession of Tarifa, which he garrisoned with 1,500 Spanish troops, and 500 British; and Godinot, who commanded the French division that defeated Ballasteros, was ordered to besiege and take Tarifa. He was compelled, however, chiefly from the losses his corps sustained from the raking fire of the English ships in the roadstead, to withdraw, without making any impression on the fort. Soult then sent general Laval, at the head of 7,000 men, to undertake the siege. He arrived before the walls in the middle of December; and having compelled Ballasteros, who had advanced to the northward after the discomfiture of Godinot, again to retreat to Gibraltar, he broke ground before the place on the 19th of December. The garrison then consisted of 1,800 British and 700 Spaniards; and the engineers of the former had greatly improved the defences. The walls were much injured by the 27th; and by the 30th, a breach, sixty feet wide, had been effected. The ascent was easy; and a column of the besieging force, 2,000 in number, on the 31st, at daybreak, commenced an assault, in which they were repulsed with considerable slaughter. Laval would have immediately raised the siege; but marshal Victor, who was still before Cadiz, ordered him to persist. He remained till the 4th of January, 1812, when he retreated; having first thrown his powder into the sea, and buried his heavy artillery. All the cavalry and artillery horses, and about 1,000 men, were lost in this siege.

Thus the campaign of 1811 could not be considered, on the whole, favourable to France. Except in Catalonia and Valencia, the French generals had failed in all their efforts. The British were still in possession of Portugal. Ciudad Rodrigo, which France had sent two armies to protect, was again invested; and whilst the French troops were beginning to lose confidence, the British, who, though always brave, were, at first, found wanting in many things that constitute the good and effective soldier, had found out their deficiencies, and were greatly improved. If, therefore, the emperor had maintained the same number of men in Spain in 1812, that he did in 1811, the two armies would still have been upon a more equal footing. But, towards the close of December, he found it necessary, in order that he might have a competent army on the Vistula, to recall some of the troops who were serving in Spain. Accordingly, in January, 1812, general Dorsenne left Spain, at the head of 12,000 guards: 7,000 or 8,000 Poles were withdrawn from Suchet and Soult: the 4th battalions, which had composed the 9th corps, and twelve regiments of dragoons out of the twenty-four in the Peninsula, recrossed the frontier, to proceed to the north of Europe. In the whole, not fewer than 35,000 troops were thus taken from the armies in Spain. Ney went with them.

The Spaniards, notwithstanding their losses and privations, were not disheartened; and lord Wellington became confident of final success. In December, he sent a despatch to lord Liverpool, in which he said—"The people of the country are still disposed to resist, whenever they see a prospect of advantage. Bonaparte is yet far from having effected the conquest of that part of the Peninsula of which he has military possession. And, in truth, the devastation which attends the progress of our enemy's arms, and is the consequence of their continuance in any part of the country, is our best friend, and will, in the end, bring the contest to a conclusion."

CHAPTER XV.

CAMPAIGN IN THE PENINSULA, 1812; CAPTURE OF CIUDAD RODRIGO; POSITION OF MARMONT; SIEGE AND CAPTURE OF BADAJOZ; DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH AT USAGRE; STRENGTH OF THE FRENCH AND BRITISH ARMIES; DESTRUCTION OF THE BRIDGE OF ALMARAZ; ADVANCE OF WELLINGTON INTO SPAIN; OCCUPATION OF SALAMANCA; BATTLE OF SALAMANCA; AFFAIR OF LA SERNA; JOSEPH LEAVES MADRID, AND RETREATS TO VALENCIA; WELLINGTON AT MADRID; UNSUCCESSFUL SIEGE OF BURGOS; RETREAT OF THE ALLIES; THE FRENCH RE-ENTER MADRID; THEY SET OUT IN PURSUIT OF THE BRITISH; THEIR FAILURE IN ARRESTING LORD WELLINGTON'S RETIREMENT TO CIUDAD RODRIGO; CONCLUSION OF THE CAMPAIGN.

WHEN 1812 opened, Napoleon had reached the zenith of his fortunes. He then ruled over a wider extent of territory than had ever before been subject to the French sceptre; and except Russia and England, all the powers of Europe succumbed to his influence, and obeyed his will.

But from that time, his star, in which he put so much faith, began to pale; and on the day of the capture of Valencia, the last of his triumphs in the Peninsula, Wellington crossed the Agueda with the British army, and proceeded to gain more victories. We have stated that he had collected a competent siege-train, for the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo. He took the opportunity afforded by the departure of several divisions of the army of Portugal for Valencia, to prepare for the investment of that fortress, the defences of which had been considerably strengthened by the French. The investment was regularly commenced in the night of the 8th of January, 1812, and for eleven days the siege was carried on with great vigour; the defence being equally determined and energetic. A fort, San Francisco, which covered the approach to the main fortress, was carried on the 9th. On the 14th, two convents, Santa Cruz and San Francisco, which the French had fortified, were taken by storm. On the 18th, a practicable breach was made; and soon after dark on the 19th, the final assault took place; the troops engaged in it being, the divisions of general Picton, which comprised the brigades of major-general Mackinnon and lieutenant-colonel Campbell; and the light division, under general Craufurd, consisting of major-general Vandeleur's and colonel Barnard's brigades. The garrison fought well; but, after a fierce resistance, they abandoned the intrenchments; and being driven from street to street, they at last flung down their arms, and called for quarter. They received it; but it is greatly to be regretted that victory was stained by the licentiousness of the troops, which could not be restrained for several hours. The loss of the allies in the siege and storm was 1,310 killed and wounded; the greater number of the killed on the 19th, including general Mackinnon, losing their lives by the explosion of a magazine. The gallant general Craufurd was also amongst the killed. The French had 1,000 killed and wounded; general Barrie, 80 other officers, and 1,700 men, were taken prisoners; a battering train of 44 guns, 109 pieces of artillery on the walls, an armoury and arsenal filled with military stores, and large quantities of provisions, were found in the place. It was not till the 21st that order was restored amongst the troops, exhausted by the fatigue of the siege, and the excesses committed in the public stores and private cellars after the storm. The breaches were then repaired, the trenches filled in; and the fort being rendered once more defensible, and cleared of the débris of the siege, was given over to Castanos, the captain-general of the province; and lord Wellington, resuming his former position at Fuente Guinaldo, prepared for another gallant adventure.

The commanders of the army of the north and of Portugal, and the general staff of king Joseph at Madrid, were alike alarmed at the rapid fall of Ciudad Rodrigo, the siege of which had occupied Masséna a month, whilst Wellington had carried it in eleven days. Marmont, as soon as he heard of its fall, turned his attention to Salamanca, where he had strong defensive works thrown up, making use of three large convents, in the place of regular fortifications; and he established there a camp, strongly intrenched, with magazines and hospitals, for the supply of the army and the accommodation of the wounded. His entire effective force—infantry, cavalry, and artillery—numbered about 40,000. He did not think himself strong enough to attack the English with less than 50,000; and as he could not obtain reinforcements from general Caffarelli, who had succeeded Dorsenne in the command of the army of the north, or from the army of the centre (which was completely exhausted in marching from the Guadalaxara to Talavera, from Segovia to Toledo, and to and fro in other directions, with a view to keep open communications, without succeeding), he made the best arrangement of his force he could to meet the difficulties that surrounded him. He had no doubt that Wellington's next attempt would be upon Badajoz; but he did not feel himself warranted in quitting his position, and leaving Salamanca unguarded, in order to defend that fortress. He therefore dispatched a confidential aide-de-camp to the emperor, to inform him of the dangers which were gathering around him, and to suggest, that the armies of the north, of Portugal, and of the centre, should be united under one person. Napoleon refused to listen to this advice; telling Marmont, in his reply, that he was interfering in matters which did not concern him, as Badajoz was not intrusted to his care, but to the army of Andalusia, which was competent to defend it. "You must suppose the English mad," said Berthier, writing in the name of the emperor, "to imagine that they will march upon Badajoz, leaving you at Salamanca." * * * "The instructions of the emperor are precise: you are not to quit Salamanca: you are not even to reoccupy the Asturias: let your head-quarters be at Salamanca; and never cease to menace the English from thence." "Never mind Hill and the army of the south," was the language of the French war minister in another despatch. "That army is strong enough to combat five divisions of the English army. You should have marched on Ciudad Rodrigo, and retaken it, before the breaches were filled up, or the place provisioned."

Marmont was, however, right in his anticipation of the next enterprise of Wellington; who, Ciudad Rodrigo captured, immediately made preparations for the siege of Badajoz. As the only remaining frontier fortress, he felt it was necessary that it should be in his possession before he marched his army into the interior of Spain. His lordship had then planned the achievement which he finally accomplished—viz., to cross Spain, driving the French before him into their own country; and to its success, it was necessary that he should not leave the means of annoyance in his rear. In his dispositions for the siege—by sending the battering train and engineers from Lisbon by sea, as if they were going to Oporto; and making arrangements apparently preliminary to the establishment of a magazine beyond the Douro—he concealed the real end of his movements. His preparations were completed by the beginning of March, and, on the 9th, the various divisions under his command commenced their advance, all converging on Badajoz. To cover the siege, general Hill was posted at Almendralejo, with 30,000 men; and Wellington himself commanded the besieging force of 22,000.

The refusal of the Portuguese regency to furnish the necessary means of conveyance, caused a delay of several days before the investment of the fortress could be completed; and enabled general Philippon, who commanded the garrison of 5,000 men, to make very complete arrangements for defence. The town of Badajoz stands at the confluence of the rivulets Calamon and Rivellas with the Guadiana, which runs in front of the walls, and of the heights of San Christoval. The castle rises above the union of the three streams. The fortifications were, when the siege began, says colonel Maxwell, “exceedingly strong—the bastions and curtains regular—while formidable outworks, the forts of Pardelaras, Picarina, and San Christoval, completed the exterior defences.” The investment was not begun till the 17th of March; it was completed on the 24th; the French having lost 300 men, and the British 150, in a desperate sortie made by the former in the night of the 19th. After the trenches were completed, the Picarina fort was first assailed and carried by storm. The bombardment was continued till the 5th of April, at which time it was known that Marmont had made a forward movement in front of Beira, and that the advance of Soult in another direction had obliged the covering army, under general Hill, to fall back in the direction of Talavera. Wellington, therefore, determined that the assault should take place on the 6th; Picton’s and Leith’s divisions, and the light divisions under major-general Colville and colonel Barnard, were selected for the enterprise, than which a more fearful one cannot be conceived. Again and again were the assaulting parties repulsed. The scaling-ladders, in one instance, were too short; and two gallant fellows, springing into a breach, pulled their comrades up after them. In another direction, “the ramparts, crowded with dark figures and glittering arms, were seen on one side; and, on the other, the red columns of the British, deep and broad, were coming on like streams of burning lava. A bright flame, shooting upwards, displayed all the terrors of the scene. It was the touch of the magician’s wand. A crash of thunder followed, and, with incredible violence, the storming party were dashed to pieces by the explosion of hundreds of shells and powder-barrels. For an instant the light division stood on the brink of the ditch, amazed by the terrific sight; then, with a shout that matched even the sound of the explosion, flew down the ladders, or, disdaining their aid, leaped, reckless of the depth, into the gulf below; and, nearly at the same moment, the 4th division came running in, and descended with like fury.” There was a deep cut in the bottom of the ditch, in which 100 fusiliers perished; but their comrades pushed on, though a wide and deep chasm presented itself between them and the ramparts. That and other difficulties were met, encountered, and overcome, amidst what appeared the most terrible confusion. “The heavy roll and horrid explosion of the powder-barrels, the whizzing light of the blazing splinters, the loud exhortations of the officers, and the continued clatter of the muskets,” says one authority, “made a maddening din. Now a multitude bounded up the great breach, as if driven by a whirlwind; but across the top glittered a range of sword-blades, sharp-pointed, keen-edged on both sides, and firmly fixed in ponderous beams, which were chained together, and set deep in the ruins; and, for ten feet in front, the ascent was covered with loose planks, studded with sharp iron points, on which the feet of the foremost being set, the planks moved, and the unhappy soldiers, falling forward on the spikes, rolled down on the ranks behind.” Their place was taken by others, amidst the roar of a hundred cannon and several thousand muskets. “Never,” says colonel Jones, “probably never, since the discovery of gunpowder, were men more seriously exposed to its action. Shells, hand-grenades, every kind of burning composition, and missiles of every hellish variety, were hurled into the ditch. The roll of musketry was incessant; and the night was now light with the most dazzling fires; and now black with utter darkness.” A report of the slaughter which was taking place in this direction, was made to lord Wellington about midnight, and he gave orders to withdraw the 4th and light divisions, and to re-form them before daylight for another effort. But in other quarters, fighting, equally terrific, had been attended with more effect. The 5th brigade, under major-general Leith, carried a barrier, called St. Vincent. Picton’s brigade had carried the castle, having mounted the walls—notwithstanding hundreds were hurled over by logs of wood, large stones, and loaded shells, thrown by the besiegers—and driven the French before them with the bayonet. The gates were also blown open, and the town entered; the divisions which had suffered so dreadfully in the ditch, marching in through the breaches. Then Philippon, and the rest of the garrison retired to Fort San Christoval, to surrender at daylight; and Badajoz was in possession of the British. We wish we could draw a veil over what followed. The British soldiers offered no violence to the garrison, who surrendered themselves as prisoners of war; but, says an eye-witness, "they no sooner got into the place, than they broke the reins of discipline. They drank, they plundered, they revelled in all licentiousness; and their wild orgies and frantic excesses were continued for many hours before their noble commander could possibly control them. This was at last done by extraordinary measures, severe examples, and by bringing fresh and steady troops into the town." It was nearly the last display of the kind. The discipline introduced by lord Wellington, in consequence of the excesses at this place and at Ciudad Rodrigo, so improved the character of his men, that they were subsequently hailed as friends and protectors by the Spanish people wherever they appeared.

In the siege and assault of Badajoz, the allies lost 5,000 men, about 700 being Portuguese: 317 British officers, and 3,344 non-commissioned officers and privates, having perished in the assault. The French had 1,300 killed or wounded, and 3,800 were made prisoners. Large quantities of stores, 170 heavy guns, 5,000 muskets, and 80,000 shot were found in the various forts and redoubts; but what was of more consequence, the prestige of the English was established. The news of the capture, remarks Thiers, threw Soult, who had advanced as far as Llerena, "into the greatest consternation, for the sole trophy of his Andalusian campaign had thus escaped him; and, should lord Wellington choose to carry forward his operations by Estremadura or Andalusia, all the routes were open to him." Napoleon blamed both Soult and Marmont for permitting the capture of the fortress; the former for doing nothing at the head of 80,000 men; and the latter, for not knowing how to modify orders given at the distance of 300 leagues. But Soult had not the number of men stated; and the orders to Marmont were so positive, that he was not justified in doing anything more than make a diversion on the side of Beira, which he did; blockading Ciudad Rodrigo, crossing the Portuguese frontier, driving back the Portuguese militia under Trant and Wilson, and sending marauding parties to overrun the Lower Beira. As soon as Badajoz had fallen, Wellington made dispositions for marching to attack the French, and Marmont immediately withdrew his men from Portugal, and retired to Salamanca. Soult also retreated, pursued by the British cavalry under Sir Stapleton Cotton, who overtook the rear-guard of the French at Usagre, where a smart action took place. The French were broken and dispersed, pursued for several miles, and 130 prisoners taken, numbers being killed. Soult pursued his march the remainder of the way, unmolested, and re-entered Seville on the 14th of April. The allied armies then took up cantonments on the Coa and Agueda; and the British commander again established his head-quarters at Fuente Guinaldo; Sir Thomas Graham, with 10,000 men, being left at Badajoz.

The armies on both sides required rest and reorganisation; and several weeks were spent in cantonments before active operations were resumed. When they were recommenced, it was with an immense disparity of force. Notwithstanding the troops that had been withdrawn to join the army of the Vistula, and the losses sustained in the early part of the year, the "imperial muster-roll" gives the following as the number of the French army in Spain in May, when the antagonistic forces again took the field:—

Corps.	Infantry.	Cavalry.	Artillery.	Total.
Army of the South . . .	51,819	7,311	4,340	63,470
" " Centre . . .	15,451	3,332	420	19,203
" Portugal	62,771	4,481	3,448	70,700
" Aragon	30,421	2,976	1,980	35,377
" Catalonia	39,875	1,376	279	41,530
" the North . . .	43,492	4,443	1,163	49,098
	243,829	23,919	11,630	279,378
Old reserve at Bayonne	6,293	207	—	6,500
New do. do.	5,666	103	—	5,769

Of this gross number, of 291,647 men, 26,375 were returned as detached, and 32,196 in hospital; leaving an effective force of 233,076 who were present "with the eagles." To meet this host, Wellington had 42,289 infantry, 7,558 cavalry, and 3,322 artillery; total, 53,169. There were certainly, in addition, the Spanish armies, under their various commanders, and the Portuguese, under marshal Beresford. But, including these, the collective force of efficient men was not equal to the aggregate number of the French force, and Wellington could not depend implicitly upon any troops except his own. The Portuguese, occasionally, were amenable to order, and fought well; but it was seldom, indeed, that he received any effectual support from the Spanish regular army. The guerrillas, however, still were most successful in distracting the attention, cutting off the resources, and diminishing the numbers of the French.

When operations again commenced, Napoleon, who was about to leave Paris for the banks of the Vistula and the Niemen, conferred the supreme command on his brother Joseph, whose major-general and military adviser was marshal Jourdain, an officer much attached to him. But although he found it necessary to make such an appointment (as, from the interior of Russia, it was impossible to direct the armies in Spain), such was the emperor's distrust of his brother, and dislike to Jourdain, that he could not bring himself to give peremptory orders to the marshals to obey the former. He also decreed Catalonia to be an integral part of the French territory, dividing it into four departments. This measure added to the unpopularity of the French; whilst the doubtful orders to the marshals caused the military operations to become fluctuating and indecisive. If, instead of taking these steps, Napoleon had withdrawn his troops, and left Joseph—who had succeeded in enlisting an army of from 30,000 to 40,000 Spaniards, who served him faithfully—to fight his own way, and make his own terms, it is very probable he would have established himself on the throne. He was undoubtedly a better man and a better sovereign than Charles IX. had proved himself to be; and the Spaniards could scarcely expect that Ferdinand would make even so good a king as his father; whilst Joseph's justice, good feeling, and lenient rule, wherever he could act for himself, had made a favourable impression upon the nation. When Joseph was in London, many years after, he met general Mina (the elder) in the British metropolis, who told him that he himself, Ballasteros, Infantado, and Montijo—all grandees of Spain—had, in 1812, come to the determination of acknowledging him as sovereign, if the emperor would recall the French armies. Wellington's victories, however, and Napoleon's obstinacy, prevented this determination from being carried out.

Having suffered his men to rest through the month of April, and into May, the British general began to think that it was time to take the field once more, and to endeavour to aim a decisive blow at the French usurpation. The question was, where should that blow be delivered?—against Marmont in the north; or against Joseph and Jourdain in the centre? Thinking, with the emperor, "that the vital point in Spain was the line of communication between Bayonne and Madrid," he resolved to make a demonstration on that quarter, where Marmont was posted. First, it was necessary to destroy a bridge of boats, which the French had thrown over the Tagus at Almaraz, and by which the armies of the north and south kept up a secure communication. Sir Rowland Hill, still stationed at Almendralejo, with 10,000 infantry and 1,200 horse, for the purpose of observing Estremadura, was entrusted with the commission to destroy this bridge; and it was promptly and efficiently executed. The bridge was defended by the old tower of Miravete, by a strong tête-de-pont, and Fort Napoleon on the left side of the Tagus, and by Fort Ragusa on the right. The approach to Almaraz from Sir Rowland Hill's position was over a range of mountains, which descend from the Miravete tower, from which it was found impossible to lower artillery. He therefore, in the night of the 17th of May, sent a column of infantry down the Sierra, by what is called a "goat's path," leaving his cannon at the top. When these troops reached their destination, they were enabled to conceal themselves in a deep ravine, till the thundering of the artillery upon the castle of Miravete announced the time for the attack, which was to be by escalade. About 8 A.M. on the 18th, the French garrison of Fort Napoleon crowded to the ramparts, surprised at hearing the cannon rolling in the direction of Miravete. The British, headed by major-general Howard, shortly after occasioned a still greater surprise, by dashing upon them from the ravine; and though their ladders were not so long as they ought to have been, the breadth of an intermediate ledge or berm enabled them to overcome the difficulty, and to mount the ramparts. A rattling volley of grape and musketry did not arrest their progress; they rushed on, drove the garrison before them, out of the fort, through the tête-de-pont, unto the bridge, over which the fugitives made their way at great speed. When they reached the right side, they found that three of the boats had been cut away, and the communication was broken off. Many jumped into the Tagus to avoid their pursuers, but between 150 and 300 surrendered themselves prisoners.* It was found that the commander of Fort Ragusa had abandoned his post; so that both forts, the tête-de-pont, and the bridge, fell into the hands of the British, with an immense quantity of stores of every description—all of which were destroyed. This gallant little affair cost the British 15 officers and 162 privates, killed and wounded. The attack on Fort Miravete in the morning was only a feint; but, having carried the other works, Sir Rowland retraced his steps to that post, and was commencing operations against it on the 19th, when intelligence of the advance of Soult caused him to abandon the prize as it was about to fall into his hands; and he returned to his cantonments. Marshals Soult and Marmont had received intelligence of his march, but were too late to prevent it. They both advanced in different directions; the mischief was done, however, and the British safe in their old position, before they arrived.

Lord Wellington now carried on his preparations for a forward march, from which, himself, he did not expect any great results, though he felt compelled to make it. But he sent a despatch to the war minister, detailing the facts of his position, and stating, that the French generals had only to combine to drive him back into Portugal. He therefore wished that a feint should be made by the English ships in the Bay of Biscay, of landing troops, in order to prevent reached the bank. Other authorities say, that it was done by the commandant of Fort Ragusa; who was tried by a court-martial for cowardice, and shot at Talavera.

Caffarelli from proceeding to the assistance of Marmont; and that a force, which lord William Bentinck had raised in Sicily, where it was not wanted, should make a descent on Murcia or Catalonia, for the purpose of occupying the attention of the army of that province. The condition of the British army was then excellent; and its discipline was rapidly approaching that state of perfection which led lord Wellington to say, that, with the Peninsular army, as it was the last two years of the war, he would go anywhere. But, if the French marshals had been united, it would have been easy to have overwhelmed the British by numbers. There were, however, dissensions between those officers themselves; and several of them did all they could to thwart the views of the king. Soult, who was deeply offended at Jourdain's being appointed Joseph's major-general instead of himself, was very little inclined to obey any orders he received from his majesty. The king wished him to send reinforcements to Marmont, which he refused to do, because it would endanger Andalusia; and Joseph, having sent some orders to the count d'Erlon, one of his generals of division, Soult took umbrage at the royal interference, and tendered his resignation, which was accepted. Circumstances prevented it, however, from being carried out.

It was early in June when the British divisions began to concentrate: on the 13th, the cantonments on the Agueda were broken up, and the frontier crossed; on the 16th, the army having been unmolested on its march, was before Salamanca. Marmont, anticipating the approach of his opponent, after furnishing the line of the Douro, in the rear of the city, with well-garrisoned posts at Toro, Zamora, Benavente, Tordesillas, and Astorga, had broken up his camp, and had retired to a strong position covered by the Tormes. He left garrisons in each of the three convents of San Vincent, San Gaetano, and La Merced, which commanded the city; and they would, he hoped, be able to maintain those posts till he received reinforcements. When the British presented themselves, they were received by the inhabitants with the greatest demonstrations of joy; and they marched through the enthusiastic throng, by whom they were welcomed, to the heights of San Christoval, about three miles in advance of the city, where lord Wellington cantoned his troops. Soon after his arrival, the citizens besought him to deliver them from the surveillance of the French in the convents. An attempt to carry them by assault failed; but, on the 28th of June, a siege-train having arrived from Ciudad Rodrigo, they were formally invested, and, after a fierce bombardment, taken. San Vincent had made the most strenuous defence; and, standing on a perpendicular cliff, rising from the bed of the Tormes, and skilfully fortified, its capture was no mean achievement.

The French lost 1,000 men in killed and prisoners, 36 pieces of cannon, a quantity of stores, and much clothing. Several valuable officers, and 450 privates, were placed hors de combat in the siege. During its progress Marmont had made several demonstrations, with a view to draw out the British; but Wellington, prepared to fight if attacked, did not feel himself in a position to be the assailant: therefore they produced nothing but the marching and counter-marching of his own troops.

At midnight of the 28th, after the convents were taken, Marmont broke up his position, and began to retire to the other side of the Douro. When day broke, his entire army was in full march, and the rear-guard was seen quitting the ground. His retirement caused the greatest triumph and festivity in Salamanca. High mass was celebrated in the cathedral, where, writes captain Leith Hay, "the scene was grand and impressive. The spacious, noble building was crowded to excess; and the ceremony was performed with all the pomp and splendour of the [Roman] catholic worship. The pealing organ never poured its tones over a more brilliant, varied, or chivalrous audience. Contrasted with the sombre dresses of the numerous officiating clergy, the scarlet uniforms of the British were held in relief by the dark Spanish or Portuguese costumes. The Spanish peasant, in all the simplicity and cleanliness of his dress, appeared by the moustached and fierce-looking guerilla; while the numerous mantillas and waving fans of the Spanish ladies, attracted attention to the dark voluptuous beauties of Castile." The commander-in-chief gave a dinner after the cathedral services, and the junta a ball in the evening. The next day the soldiers had to resume their warlike duties.

The object of Marmont was, as he learned that reinforcements were on their way from the Asturias under Bonnet, and from Biscay under Caffarelli, to delay fighting till they had joined him; and he took up a good tenable position behind the strongly fortified bridges of Zamora, Toro, and Tordesillas. Wellington followed, but found the position, defended by a hundred pieces of cannon, too strong to attack. On the 7th of July, Bonnet's division joined Marmont; and Caffarelli, with, it was reported, 10,000 foot and 1,500 horse, and Joseph, with 14,000 men from the army of the centre, were rapidly advancing. Wellington, on the contrary, had no reinforcements to expect; and the diversions he recommended were not made. Lord William Bentinck had gone to Italy, instead of making a descent upon Spain: a Spanish force of 14,000 men, which might have aided him, was besieging Astorga; but though a practicable breach was effected, they would not hazard an assault, and lay idle before its walls: whilst Soult had been so successful, recently, in the bombardment of Cadiz, that it was expected every day the city would fall, and that then a large part of the army of Andalusia would be marched to the north. These facts, and his want of money—a most effective matériel of war—caused lord Wellington to resolve to fall back upon Portugal. He began his retrograde movement on the 17th of July, and was narrowly observed by the French. On the 18th there was some sharp fighting, the French attacking the 4th and light divisions, under Sir Stapleton Cotton, who was supported by the cavalry of Bock, Le Marchant, and Alten. The British had to retire, which they did in good order, to the Guarena, one of the tributaries of the Douro; their cavalry having, in a spirited charge, taken 300 prisoners (including general Carrier) and a gun. That night both armies bivouacked in the valley of the Guarena, on opposite sides of the stream; but so near, “that the fixed sentinels almost received the secret whispers of each other’s watch.”

The three next days were spent in marches and counter-marches; and on the 20th, one of the most singular events occurred that was ever met with in warfare. The two armies were marching for several hours through an open country, in parallel lines, in full view of each other; the officers and men exchanging signs of courtesy, though they were so soon to be engaged in hostile conflict. “Ninety thousand combatants,” writes an eye-witness, “marched, side by side as it were, without collision, each host admiring the array of its opponents—all eyes eager in their gaze—and all ears intent for the signal sound of battle.” But the signal was not given. Both armies, to a certain extent, retraced their steps; and on the 21st of July, Wellington had his entire army concentrated in its former position, on the heights of San Christoval. Marmont followed, and stretched his centre and left wing across the Tormes—the stream on which Salamanca is situated—so as to command the road from that city to Ciudad Rodrigo; but Wellington made a corresponding movement, which prevented his communications from being interrupted; and on the morning of the 22nd, the allies were found to be established in position between two bold heights, called the Arapeiles, and the Tormes, just below the ford of Santa Maria across that river; their left resting on one of the heights, which is distinguished, in the accounts of the battle, as the “English Arapeiles.” Had Marmont been prudent, they might have been kept in that position till the king, with his 14,000 men, joined him; or compelled again to retreat, and taken at a disadvantage. But as Wellington had declined fighting when he had previously occupied the heights of San Christoval, the French general appears to have formed a mean opinion of him; and having been joined by Bonnet and by Clausel, with a considerable reinforcement from the army of the north, he was anxious to bring on an engagement, that he might have the honour of achieving the victory himself, before he was superseded by the king and Jourdain.

Early on the day just named—the 22nd of July—Marmont rode out of the French camp, for the purpose of making a personal reconnaissance of Wellington’s position; but he could not discover anything that threw the least light upon what were the plans of the English general. The two armies were divided by a valley, or ravine, of some extent. The village of Calvarossa de Ariba, occupied by Foy’s division, was the pivot of the French right; their centre and left resting on a wood, which occupied the ground not far from the Tormes. Marmont, after his return from inspecting the allied position, ordered general Ferry to join Foy with his corps, and caused his centre and left to defile behind their position, along the wood by which it was backed. Observing that the rocky heights of the Arapeiles were unoccupied, he sent a body of infantry to take possession of the highest; which they effected, and crowned its summit with artillery. This movement was made about noon, and the wood concealed it till it was accomplished. The height, thus occupied, was called “the French Arapeiles;” and when it was taken, another French corps made a dash at the “English Arapeiles;” but a British regiment anticipated them, gained the height, and kept it. Whilst these movements were making, Marmont carried forward his divisions: the left, Thomiere’s, was in front, defiling opposite the allies; Sarrat’s and Maucune’s divisions were in the centre; Clausel’s in reserve; and Brennier’s in the rear, with the baggage and artillery. The valley was still kept between the two armies.

These movements, in the presence of a hostile force, could not be made unobserved. The attention of Wellington was directed to them, and he found that they rendered an alteration in the position of the allies necessary. He caused the entire army, therefore, to change its front; and Marmont, observing that the allies were in motion, imagined they were retreating to Ciudad Rodrigo. Nothing, however, was further from Wellington’s intention. Having satisfied himself as to the direction the French were taking, he descended from the height, and made the necessary arrangements for meeting the enemy. The 5th division (Leith’s), and the 4th (Cole’s), formed the right, and were stationed behind the village of Arapeiles. The 3rd division (formerly Picton’s, who had left from ill-health, and was succeeded by Sir Edward Pakenham), a corps of Spanish infantry, D’Urban’s cavalry, and two squadrons of the 14th light dragoons, were in the centre. Pack’s Portuguese brigade, Bradford’s brigade, and Le Marchant’s heavy cavalry, formed the left. There were two reserves—the 6th and 7th divisions, under Clinton and Hope, forming one; Barnard's light division, and the 1st division, composed of the guards and Germans, the other. Cotton's cavalry was placed in the rear of the 5th and 6th divisions; an artillery reserve was posted behind the dragoons; and, in the rear of all, out of the reach of fire, were the Spaniards, under Don Carlos d'España. The left of the allies was on the height; the centre between the English Arapeiles and the village; the right extended to the village of Les Torres. When formed, the allied force constituted a compact line, en échelon, the right being in front. Wellington had also the advantage of the French, as his line formed the chord of an arc, round which they were toiling; and the allies could make their dispositions, therefore, with much greater rapidity than their opponents.

Under the impression that the English movement was a retreat, Marmont resolved to attack their rear-guard. He moved his left forward with that intention; at the same time carrying his centre still closer to the valley, ordering Clausel to support it. He, however, gave no orders for the attack; but general Maucune, also entertaining the idea that the English were retreating, and conceiving that it was the proper moment to commence the battle, sent to request permission that he might do so. Without waiting for the return of his messenger, he ordered his men to advance, drove back the British skirmishers, and descending into the hollow which separated the two armies, was soon actively engaged with Cole's and Leith's divisions. Thomiere's division, as it came up, was attacked by Pakenham's infantry in front, and D'Urban's cavalry in flank; and the divisions on the left and right of the two armies also were engaged: thus the conflict became general. There was a varied fortune during the battle. The English 3rd division, 5th, Bradford's light brigade, and the light and heavy cavalry, were everywhere successful, cutting up and dispersing the French. But the 4th division was repulsed by Bonnet; and Pack's (composed of Portuguese regiments) was defeated in an attack upon the French Arapeiles. On observing the state of the contest in this direction, Wellington ordered the 6th and 7th divisions, under generals Hope and Clinton, to advance; then, though Bonnet stood his ground well, the British bayonet conquered, and the French retired in great confusion. After several hours' intense fighting, in which the village of Arapeiles had been taken and retaken, as well as the heights, from which the French were at last driven, the "issue was as decided a rout on the part of the French as was, perhaps, ever experienced by any army." The broken masses made for the Tormes, and many were drowned in crossing. One circumstance favoured them. There were two fords, and the castle of Alba de Tormes commanded one of them. This castle had been held by a Spanish garrison, who had, unknown to the English commander, evacuated it the day before. The French were aware of the circumstance, and most of them made for that passage; whilst Wellington himself, with the leading regiments of the light division, made for the other ford. This, and the approaching darkness—fighting did not cease till 8 P.M.—saved the French from total destruction. As it was, they lost 134 officers and 7,000 privates prisoners; and two eagles, six standards, and eleven cannon. Marshal Marmont was struck by a shot soon after the battle commenced, which broke his arm, and inflicted a serious wound in his side. He had to give up the command to Bonnet, who, late in the day, was also wounded, when Clausel assumed the direction of what was, then, the retreat. Three generals, Thomiere, Ferry, and Desgraviere, were killed. The total number of their killed and wounded was never published; but we think it could not be less than that of the allies, which was as follows:—

	British.	Portuguese.	Spaniards.	Total.
Killed	694	304	2	1,000
Wounded . . .	4,270	1,552	4	5,826
Missing	256	182	0	438
Total	5,220	2,038	6	7,264

Amongst the officers, general Le Marchant was killed; generals Beresford, Cole, Leith, Cotton, and Alten, wounded. Lord Wellington was struck by a spent ball in the thigh.

The French were followed in their retreat, the next day, by the light division, headed by Wellington; but Clausel had been so diligent in getting his army advanced during the night, that nothing was seen of them till noon, when their rear-guard was discovered near La Serna. On the first appearance of the allies, the cavalry gave way, leaving the infantry to receive the charge of Bock's German, and Anson's brigade of English, dragoons. Formed in squares, the French did not flinch; but the charge of the Germans broke the first square: the second soon shared the same fate; and the third broke up of its own accord. The result of this affair—acknowledged by the French to have been one of the most brilliant cavalry actions during the war—was, that, with the loss of about 100 killed and wounded, 1,200 prisoners were taken by the British. The French army now fell into great confusion; but they succeeded in getting forty miles from the field of battle, the first night after it. The next day they were joined by Caffarelli, with 1,500 cavalry and artillerymen, instead of the 15,000 expected; and they continued their retreat, crossing the Douro, to Valladolid, and from thence to Burgos. Lord Wellington followed them to Valladolid, where he captured seventeen guns, and took 800 sick and wounded prisoners. He then returned with the light division to the main army, with the intention of marching on Madrid.

Thiers describes the battle of Salamanca* as "the commencement of the ruin of French affairs in Spain." And though, from want of support, Wellington was soon obliged, for a time, to retrace his steps, the cause of king Joseph never assumed a favourable appearance after it. That monarch left Madrid to join Marmont on the 21st of July, with 14,000 men; and had reached Blasco Sancho on the 25th, where he received the intelligence of the defeat at Salamanca, and was informed that Clausel was unable to keep the field south of the Douro. He immediately retraced his steps to Madrid; from whence he wrote to the minister of war at Paris, on the 28th, stating that the few troops of the army of the centre under his command, were assembled in the environs of the capital; that "the whole provinces of the centre were evacuated, and even the important positions of the Somo-Sierra and Burgtrago;" and that "unless the emperor could discover means to make the generals of the north, of Aragon, and the south, obey him, Spain was lost, and with it the French army." He also, at the same time, ordered Soult to evacuate Andalusia, and join him. This would have increased his army to 60,000 men; and a further junction with the army of Portugal would, he imagined, constitute a force which Wellington could not resist. As, however, neither the army of Andalusia nor that of Portugal could reach Madrid immediately, and as it was announced to Joseph that Wellington was advancing upon the capital, he found it necessary to leave it. He did so accordingly, directing his march by the Tagus upon Valencia, and giving fresh orders to Soult to retreat by Murcia upon that province, instead of advancing to Madrid. He left that city on the 10th of August; the sick and wounded, who could not be taken away, being placed in the Retiro, which had been strongly fortified by the French, and garrisoned by 2,000 men, under colonel Laffond. Joseph was accompanied by a number of Spaniards who had accepted office under him, or had rallied round him on account of the personal good qualities which he was known to possess, and who were distinguished by the name of Afrancesados. At least 2,000 carriages are said to have left Madrid, escorted by the army of the centre; the fugitives and troops amounting to about 24,000 individuals, one-half of whom were provided with arms, whilst the supply of provisions was very scanty. When the king arrived in the neighbourhood of Aranjuez, twenty-eight miles to the south-east of

Madrid, general Treilhorn was sent with a corps of dragoons, to reconnoitre the movements of the allies. He succeeded, on the 11th, in surprising, at Majalahonda, on the banks of the Guadarama torrent, an advanced guard of Wellington's army, and capturing twenty or thirty men and three guns—a success entirely owing to the disgraceful flight of the Portuguese dragoons, who rode off without crossing a sabre, and left their comrades—a regiment of German horse artillery, whose colonel, De Jonquiers, and twenty troopers, were killed—to sustain the charge of a force double their number. The intelligence this officer brought was, that Wellington and the allied army were at the gates of Madrid; and Joseph continued his retreat under the most discouraging circumstances. The inhabitants along the route had fled, and carried off all the stores and provisions; whilst the guerillas hung on the flanks of the fugitives, harassing them in every way, and putting numbers to the sword. On the confines of the province of Valencia, marshal Suchet received Joseph with great respect, notwithstanding his fallen fortunes, and conducted him to the capital, where he arrived on the 1st of September. There he was joined by Soult, who, before he raised the siege of Cadiz and left Andalusia, had sent off a despatch to the emperor, charging the king with being leagued with England, Russia, and Bernadotte, against his brother. This despatch was placed in the hands of the commander of a vessel that sailed from Malaga. Chased by an English corvette, the captain ran his vessel on shore on the Valencian coast, landed, and, unable to forward his despatch, gave it to Suchet, by whom it was handed to Joseph. The king, expecting to find some information relative to the Andalusian army, opened it, and was surprised at its contents. He immediately transmitted it to his brother, protesting against the atrocity of the charges, and demanding the punishment and recall of Soult. The reply, which arrived in due time, was, that the emperor was at too great a distance to give any orders; that a moment might arrive when he could punish Soult if he thought fit to do so; but that that marshal was the only commander in Spain who had a "military head," and that he could not be withdrawn without danger to the army. To colonel Desprez, who took him Joseph's letter, he said, that many of the French generals took the same view as Soult, and thought the king preferred Spain to France.

When Soult arrived at Valencia, he was closeted with Joseph, and was greatly surprised when told of the letter he had written to the emperor. He

* For the battle of Salamanca, Wellington received the title of marquis from the British government, and a grant of £100,000 from the parliament to enable him to support his dignity; and the title of duke of Vittoria, and an estate of 15,000 dollars annually; from the prince-regent of Portugal. His lordship accepted the title, but declined the estate. Spanish and Portuguese orders of knighthood were also conferred upon him.

contrived to satisfy Joseph by some means, or the latter was afraid to dismiss him from his command; for he remained at the head of the army of Andalusia, retaining all his power. On his arrival at Valencia, frequent consultations were held as to the course which it would be most desirable to pursue, to "make the English expiate their recent triumph by an overwhelming defeat." The three marshals—Jourdain, Suchet, and Soult—had each different plans; but that of Jourdain was adopted. This was, to unite the armies of the south and centre, which would amount to 56,000 men. This force, divided into two columns, was to march to the Tagus; the first column by the La Mancha route, passing Chinchilla, San Clemente, Ocana, and Aranjuez; the second, by the Cuenca route, passing Reguena, Cuenca, and Fuenti-Duena—both uniting at that point on the river where they were to effect the passage, and form a junction with the army of Portugal, now under Clausel. Accordingly, on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of October, the two armies left Valencia, in the order, and by the routes, proposed. They were well provided with munitions and provisions; Soult's army never having wanted either, and Joseph's having been supplied in Valencia. No part of Suchet's force was taken from him; and all the Afrancesados, who accompanied Joseph from Madrid, remained in Valencia.

When Wellington gave up his pursuit of Clausel, and retraced his steps towards Madrid, he met with no impediment or mischance on the route, except the affair at Majalahonda; and he entered the capital in triumph on the 12th of August. However Joseph might have succeeded in attaching some persons to his government, the popular feeling at Madrid seemed to run in a direction quite adverse to his pretensions. When the allies entered the capital, Wellington had a perfect ovation. The entire population of the city appeared to have turned into the streets—many of whom strewed green boughs, flowers, and even shawls, under his horse's feet; shouting, "Long live the duke of Ciudad Rodrigo!"* "Long live Wellington!" whilst banners, tapestry, carpets, and garlands, were hung from every balcony. The next day the Retiro was invested by detachments of the 3rd and 7th divisions, under generals Pakenham and Hope; and, on the morning of the 14th, the governor surrendered. The garrison became prisoners of war; and 190 pieces of cannon, 900 barrels of powder, 20,000 stand of arms, 2,000,000 of musket cartridges, and two eagles, were found in the arsenal which the French had established in that fort. Don Carlos d'España was then declared governor of Madrid, in the name of Ferdinand VII.; and the constitution which the cortes had framed, was accepted, as it had previously been at Salamanca. Various successes, also, attended almost simultaneously the Spanish arms. Guadalaxara, and its garrison of 700 men, surrendered to L'Empecinado; Astorga, which had been long besieged, was given up, and 1,200 prisoners taken; the French in Toro, Tordesillas, and Zamora, were closely blockaded; Jorden capitulated; the castle of Mirabete was blown up and evacuated; and Drouet, who had been, with 23,000 men, at Santa Martha, observing Hill's corps, which was too strongly intrenched for him to attack, retreated towards the Sierra Morena, followed by Hill, who eventually occupied Toledo, Yepes, and Aranjuez, covering the right of the main army, and the road from the south of Spain to Madrid.

But it was not long before Wellington's doubts as to the permanence of his successes, were proved to be well founded. He was disappointed in the expected co-operation of lord William Bentinck, his descent being made too late to be of any use in causing a diversion of the French forces: and, though general Maitland landed in Alicante, he had too small a corps to produce any effect. It was also ascertained that the French in the south were concentrating, whilst Clausel had been considerably reinforced in the north. The French troops still outnumbered the English, four or five to one; but their division, as Bessières had stated, had rendered them unable to effect those services which the emperor expected of them. They were now concentrating towards Madrid, and Wellington found the Spanish government in that capital quite unable to provide any resources for the campaign. A loan of £480,000 was promised; but such was the poverty of the inhabitants, that scarcely any of it was realised. The Spaniards, indeed, were evincing a degree of thoughtlessness which was scarcely to be expected. Whilst the poorer classes of Madrid were obtaining support from a soup-kitchen, established for them by the British officers, and which, Sir William Napier tells us, "rescued hundreds from an untimely death"—the rich, thinking the war at an end, were giving themselves up to feasts and bull-fights; and even the guerillas were returning home, or quietly settling down in the large towns, and endeavouring to realise the plunder they had collected. Thus Wellington found that the whole weight of the contest would fall upon the English; and as he expected reinforcements from England, which were to disembark at Corunna, and join him on the Douro, he resolved to move his army in that direction, and make the north the base of his future operations. He therefore left at Madrid two divisions of the British army, which had been the most exposed, and stood the most in need of repose; directed lord Hill to occupy Aranjuez, for the purpose of covering the capital; and ordered the British and Portuguese troops, who were at Cadiz, to proceed by sea to Lisbon, and from thence to march to the north, to co-operate with his army and the guards, and other reinforcements which were expected from England. His lordship himself, with four divisions, left Madrid on the 1st of September, for Valladolid.

Clausel had succeeded, by collecting the garrisons of Benavente, Zamora, and Toro, and the numerous stragglers that had wandered all over the country, in rendering the army of Portugal once more efficient, though still weak in numbers; and he had advanced some way in the direction of the capital. But he found himself unequal to contend with the British; and as Wellington pushed on to the south, he fell back successively upon Valladolid, Burgos, Briviesca, and the Ebro. Wellington arrived at Valladolid on the 7th of September; the rear-guard of the French being driven out by the advanced guard of the British. The latter followed the retiring enemy; and at Palencia, 114 miles north-west of Madrid, Wellington was joined by the Spanish army of Santocildes. His lordship had been promised 30,000 men from this source; but only 12,000, badly disciplined and badly clothed, joined the army; not more than 350 being cavalry—an arm especially wanted.

From Valladolid, Wellington directed his march on Burgos—a fine old city, formerly the capital of Old Castile, 130 miles north of Madrid. Clausel, who had broken down all the bridges which cross the numerous mountain streams in that part of Spain, and thus considerably retarded the progress of the British, at first evinced an intention to make a stand before Burgos; but not deeming his force sufficient to give battle, he continued his route, and Wellington determined to take the castle of Burgos; as, that fortress in his possession, he could have taken up his winter quarters on the banks of the Ebro. The castle was an ancient edifice, going back to the days of Moorish supremacy. It stood upon a height, at the foot of which the city was built. Two strongly intrenched lines, armed with numerous heavy cannon, had been constructed round the walls; and, on a height, called St. Michael, a hornwork was raised, which commanded the position of the castle. If Wellington had had a siege-train with him, this fortress would soon have been in his possession; but he had only some 16-pounders, which the guerillas of Avila and Biscay had received from the English fleet, and conveyed, with great labour, to Burgos. When operations were commenced, these guns were soon dismounted and silenced by the heavy artillery of the castle; and though the hornwork of St. Michael was carried in the night of the 19th of September, several assaults, made between the 22nd of that month and the 19th of October, were repulsed with great loss to the assailants.

Wellington now learned, not only that the army of Clausel had been reinforced by general

Souham and 10,000 men—which general took the command, Clausel being compelled to retire, from the effects of an old wound—but that general Caffarelli had also arrived with 12,000; and that the armies of the centre and the south were marching on Madrid. His lordship, therefore, after well weighing the difficulties of his position, resolved to retire behind the Douro; sending orders to Hill to evacuate Madrid, and join him at Salamanca, if he found that he could not defend the capital against the large French force advancing upon it. If Ballasteros, who was at the head of one of the finest set of men, and the best equipped that Spain could boast, had acted cordially with Wellington, this backward movement might have been avoided; but he refused to serve under the orders of the English general, for which the cortes deprived him of his command. But the mischief was done. His inactivity had permitted the junction of the two armies, which, 60,000 strong, were advancing from the south; and the army of Portugal consisted of 45,000 men. Wellington could not stand against the enormous odds; and, on the 21st of October, the siege of Burgos was raised.

Madrid was evacuated by the British on the 2nd of November, “amidst,” we are told, “the frequent tears and mournful silence of the inhabitants; a dense mass of whom—men, women, and children—followed the troops for miles, bewailing their departure.” On the same day, Joseph and marshal Jourdain, whose army had reached the Tagus on the 30th of October, re-entered the capital; and the French authorities say, that the inhabitants, “disgusted by the pride of the English,” received Joseph well and favourably. Most likely the feasting, bull-fighting gentry had received some intimations from the English, that their conduct was not what might have been expected. Jealousies may have arisen with them; and they, probably, were glad to see the easily-pleased king return; whilst those who followed the British, mourning their departure, were the poor, who had been preserved from starvation by their benevolence. However this may be, Joseph had no difficulty in re-establishing his authority; and on the 4th, at the head of 60,000 men, he left Madrid in pursuit of the British, taking the route of the Guadarama pass, the same that Hill had followed. L’Empecinado, and two other guerilla chiefs, immediately seized the capital, driving out the garrison, which, with all the helpless dependents of the army, had to follow the route of the king. Joseph, on the 7th, in the environs of the Douro, effected a junction with the army of Portugal—lessened by the withdrawal of Caffarelli, with his 10,000 men, whose services were necessary against Mina, De Longa, Merino, Porlier, and other guerilla chiefs, now again in activity. The force under Joseph’s command, however, numbered 95,000 men*—"the best troops in the world," according to Thiers; whilst Wellington, even when reinforced by Hill, had not more than 80,000, British, Spaniards, and Portuguese, to oppose him. The large French force, confident of victory, advanced against the British by the route followed by Marmont previously to the battle of Salamanca; the object being, to turn the Salamanca position, and to place themselves upon the British commander's line of communications.

Wellington's retreat from Burgos had been attended with great hardships; and in its course, several sharp affairs between the cavalry of his army, and that of the army of Portugal, took place. But he succeeded, on the 8th of November, in effecting a junction with Hill's corps; and, whilst the latter was posted at Alba de Tormes, a small town on the Tormes, fourteen miles south-west of Salamanca, Wellington took post on the famous position of the Arapeiles. According to Thiers, the French generals again disputed as to the best mode of attack. There was only a feeble detachment at Calvarossa de Ariba, to connect the main army with Hill. The latter had 15,000 men at Alba; and Wellington had 52,000 British and Portuguese, including 4,000 cavalry, at the Arapeiles. There were also 14,000 Spaniards, upon whom, as experience had unfortunately shown, no reliance could be placed. His lordship had, also, in that position, eighty-nine guns. Jourdain, who had reconnoitred this position, advised the king to advance between the English generals, and cut off Hill and his 15,000; whilst Soult was for crossing the Tormes above Alba, and, turning the English position, compel them to resign it. The king, and most of the generals, approved of Jourdain's suggestion; but, ultimately, out of respect to Soult, his was adopted, and he was ordered to carry it into execution; the command of the army of the centre, that he might have ample force, being placed in his hands; and that of Portugal in the hands of the count d'Erlon. "On the 13th of November," says Thiers, "the French crossed the Tormes above Alba, and advanced as far as Nuestra Senora de Retiro. Marshal Soult had 50,000 men with him, and expected, on the following day, to pursue the forward movement uninterruptedly." That day the British commenced their retreat. They had waited some days; but, not being attacked, Wellington had sent the baggage through Salamanca; and, in the morning of the 14th, the British defiled nearly within cannon-shot of the enemy, their flank, several miles in length, being as exposed as Marmont's left wing was on the day of the battle of Salamanca. But whilst the two armies were in this position, a violent storm of rain, accompanied by a thick mist, came on, and continued for two hours. During that time no objects could be distinguished at the distance of more than a few yards: when it cleared off, the British had safely passed the spot of danger; and the French, then attained to their full strength, saw them en route for Ciudad Rodrigo. Then there was mingled confusion and irritation amongst the troops under Soult, each general blaming the other for the escape of the enemy. A pursuit was made, and continued till the 16th. It produced nothing but the capture of 3,000 or 4,000 stragglers. Joseph, on the 17th, re-entered Madrid, the guerillas retiring on his approach; and, soon after, he placed his army in cantonments for the winter; the army of Portugal, in Castile; that of the centre, in the environs of Madrid; and that of Andalusia, on the Tagus, between Aranjuez and Talavera.

The retreat of the British from the Arapeiles to Ciudad Rodrigo, occupied three days, during which the distress of the troops was very great, the disorders frightful, and the loss considerable. The weather continued extremely inclement; storms of wind and rain succeeding each other the entire way. The men always yielded to intoxication at night; and, when at Ciudad Rodrigo, lord Wellington issued a very severe order on the subject. Shortly after his arrival the troops were put into winter cantonments, on the Coa and the Agueda, the left being at Lamego; the right (under Hill) at Bejar, holding the pass of Banos; and the head-quarters at Frenada.

"Such" says Thiers, "was the disastrous Spanish campaign of 1812, which, after having begun by the loss of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz, was signalised by the loss of the battle of Salamanca, and ended with the retreat from Madrid, the evacuation of Andalusia, and the disgrace of permitting 40,000 or 50,000 English to escape from 85,000 or 90,000 French troops, posted on their line of communication." But this was not the entire result of the operations, which, as the English had eventually to retire to the frontiers, at a first glance, might have appeared disastrous to them. The ground lost by the French in this campaign was never recovered. Not only was Andalusia evacuated, but Murcia and Granada also. Asturias and Estremadura, from that time, remained undisturbed in the possession of the Spaniards; the imperial standards no more crossed the Sierra Morena; and we heard no more of "driving the English out of Portugal, and into the sea." The whole coast, from Corunna to Guetario, was in the hands of the allies; and the fame of the British army and of their general resounded through all Europe. The effect in Germany was electric. It revived, in connection with the events in the north, both hope and courage; and on all sides was heard the exclamation, that the star of Napoleon had set. But there were greater disasters yet in store for him and for France.

SOON after Wellington had fixed his head-quarters at Frenada, the cortes at Cadiz offered to invest him with the supreme command of all the Spanish armies. His brother, the honourable Henry Wellesley, then ambassador at Cadiz, strongly urged him not to accept the offer, as the troops were all in such an inefficient state of discipline, and the officers had never acted cordially together. Having, however, so long experienced the evils resulting from divided command, and being well aware of what might have been effected if he could have directed the movements of the Spanish forces, his lordship resolved to accept the highly responsible trust, provided the cortes would agree to his demands. These were—"That officers should be appointed to command solely on his recommendation; that he should be invested with the absolute power of dismissal; and that the resources of the state, which were applicable to the pay and support of the troops, should be applied as he might direct." As the cortes demurred, and seemed inclined to refuse to acquiesce in these terms, Wellington went to Cadiz, where he arrived on the 24th of December, 1812. Soon afterwards, the news of the French disasters in Russia arrived, which inspired the Spanish legislature and people with fresh hopes. The former at once agreed to invest Wellington with the authority he demanded; and, by his advice, the Spanish forces were divided into four armies and two reserves. The first, comprising from 6,000 to 8,000 men, under general Copons, was stationed in Andalusia. The second, 20,000 strong, under Elio, in Murcia. The third, Ballasteros' army of the Sierra Morena, numbering 12,000 men, was placed under the duke del Parque. The fourth, comprising the divisions of Murillo and Carlos d'Espana, under the command of Castanos, was attached to the British and Portuguese army on the Ebro. It was, in numbers (40,000) and discipline, decidedly the most effective Spanish force in the field. The first reserve, nominally of 15,000 men, under the conde d'Abisbal (created captain-general of Andalusia), was stationed in that province and in Granada. The second reserve, of about 10,000 men, under Lacy, was stationed near San Roque. The Spaniards were to be supported by the Anglo-Sicilian army (10,000 English troops, and the German legion of 6,000), under Sir John Murray, which was shortly expected, and was to be stationed near Alicante. These arrangements completed, Wellington sailed for Lisbon, and from thence repaired to his head-quarters, where he arrived at the end of January, 1813.

There was a revolutionary democratic party in Spain, who did not look upon Wellington's elevation with complacency. They made the most ridiculous charges against him; even intimating that he wanted to make himself king of Spain; and doing all in their power to impede his operations. His lordship, however, disregarded all the malice of his enemies; and, ably aided by marshal Beresford and Sir Charles Stuart (subsequently lord Stuart de Rothesay), he applied himself to improving the condition of his army. In May, the Anglo-Portuguese army on the Coa, comprised 38,000 British infantry, 6,000 cavalry, and 90 guns; and 31,000 Portuguese. Thus Wellington had nearly 200,000 men under his command.

The king, though his army had been considerably reduced by drafts into Germany, had, under the command of himself and the marshals, in the spring of 1813, 202,000 infantry and artillery, and 29,000 cavalry; but, deducting invalids, there were only 197,000 in the field. They had lost, perhaps, their best general, Soult being ordered to Germany by the emperor in February, in consequence of the representations of Joseph, who wrote to his brother, saying, that either the duke of Dalmatia or himself must quit Spain. The marshals who remained, however, do not appear to have acted more harmoniously with the king; as we find him, when writing, on the 1st of April, to the minister of war, still complaining that they would not obey him. Of these marshals, Suchet had the largest division of the French force (68,000 men) with him in Aragon, Valencia, and Catalonia. That general himself, at the head of 40,000 men, occupied an intrenched camp behind the Xucar, or Jucar; his principal magazines and military stores being transferred to Saguntum. The camp was constructed in a double range of mountains at Xativa and Moxente; and, from its position, was very strong.

The campaign of 1813 commenced in this part of the Peninsula. Sir John Murray had landed at Alicante in February, and formed a junction with Elio, with whom he marched to Suchet's camp, which they found too strong to attack. A division was therefore dispatched under general Roche, with orders to sail from Alicante to Valencia, and endeavour to take that city, and concentrate the bulk of his troops at Castalla, twenty-four miles north-west of Alicante. Before any attempt could be made on Valencia, however, lord William Bentinck—who had returned to Sicily, after his ineffective descent on the Spanish coast in the previous year—alarmed at the state of that island, and apprehensive of an invasion by Murat—recalled that part of the force which had been detached under Roche. Suchet then determined to take the offensive; and after several days spent in marching and counter-marching, he defeated the advanced guard of Elio's army at Yecla, making 1,500 prisoners, and killing 200. The same day, the garrison of Villena, twelve miles from Alicante, was made prisoners, Elio having refused to evacuate the place, though strongly advised to do so by Sir John Murray. The latter then withdrew his army through the rugged defile of Biar, near the town of that name. There they were followed by Suchet. The rear-guard, under colonel Adams, which was stationed in front of the pass, was attacked, and obliged to fall back, which it did fighting bravely, with the loss of two guns. The British main body crossed the heights; but the defeat of his rear-guard, and the superior number of the French, alarmed Murray, who gave orders to retreat. Before those orders could be carried out, the French commenced an attack; the assailants were repulsed, with immense loss, by the bravery of the English and Germans; and Suchet withdrew his men, who retreated by the pass through which they had advanced, in great confusion. They were vigorously attacked by quartermaster-general (afterwards Sir Rufane) Donkin; but, for some unaccountable reason, Murray arrested the pursuit, and Suchet was enabled to carry off his guns and ammunition waggons; but he left 1,800 dead behind him. Murray's force being much reduced by the recall of Roche's division, he did not resume offensive operations till June. In May, admiral Hallowell arrived off Alicante; and having secured his co-operation, Sir John Murray embarked his troops on the 31st of May, landed near Tarragona on the 3rd of June, and commenced the siege of that fortress. A detachment of his force, under colonel Prevost, at the same time invested San Felipe de Balaguer, a strong fort, on a lofty rock, commanding the carriage-road from Tortosa to Tarragona. This fort was surrendered immediately, and its garrison of 260 men were made prisoners. But Murray, though personally brave, wanted the genius to plan, and the daring to execute, great things. The siege of Tarragona languished; and hearing that 8,000 French, under Maurice Mathieu, were advancing from Barcelona, and that Suchet was approaching from Valencia, he resolved to raise the siege, though he had 20,000 troops with him, more than 10,000 of whom were British and Germans. The movement was made with such precipitation on the 12th and 13th of June, that the fine siege-train of nineteen guns was abandoned, greatly to the disgust of the soldiers. The British landed at Alicante; and, on the 27th of June, lord William Bentinck arrived and took the command.

While these events were taking place in Valencia, Clausel, recovered from his wound, took the command of about 20,000 men, detached from the army of Portugal, and proceeded into Biscay, where the guerillas had obtained great successes; having completely intercepted the communication from Bayonne to Madrid, occupied Castro, and besieged Bilbao. Napoleon, notwithstanding the difficulties in which the events of 1812 had involved him, and the many affairs in connection with the approaching campaign in Germany that engaged his attention, found time to write to both Joseph and Clausel, and give them directions as to the course they should adopt against the guerillas—or “the brigands” as the French termed them—and the allied army. He ordered Joseph to “hold Madrid and Valencia only as points of observation;” to “fix his head-quarters, not as monarch, but as general of the French forces, at Valladolid;” and “to concentrate the armies of the centre, of Portugal, and the south, around him.” The allies, he said, “could not make any serious offensive movement for several months; and he must avail himself of their forced inactivity, to put down the insurrection in the northern provinces.” To Clausel, he wrote—“Attack suddenly; pursue rapidly; aim at the Spaniards' magazines, depôts of arms, and hospitals; disorganise the insurrection, and one or two successes will pacify the whole country.” Clausel acted upon this advice, and succeeded in raising the siege of Bilbao, dispersing Mina's corps, and carrying Castro by storm. Mina, however, soon rallied again, and destroyed two regiments of French cavalry near Lerina; and though Foy, by attacking the depôts and magazines of the Biscayan guerillas, succeeded in destroying three numerous and effective battalions, the success was counterbalanced in another quarter—the guerillas being enabled, by the absence of the main body of the French army engaged in the above operations, to capture most of the blockhouses on the high-road from Bayonne to Burgos, putting their garrisons to the sword.

Joseph was not idle whilst Clausel and Foy were engaged in Biscay and Navarre. As directed by his brother, he left Madrid, and established his head-quarters at Valladolid, from whence he sent large detachments to those generals; thus weakening his own army, at a time when Wellington was preparing for his offensive movement. That general put his army in motion on the 1st of May. Five divisions, under Sir Thomas Graham, were ordered to cross the Douro, and move through the Tras-os-Montes upon Zamora, 31 miles N.N.W. of Salamanca. Sir Rowland Hill was sent to cross the mountains of Estremadura, and descend on the Tormes; whilst Wellington, with two divisions of British troops, a corps of Spaniards, and a strong cavalry brigade, advanced upon Salamanca. All these movements were successfully executed, notwithstanding the difficulties of the route, especially that by the Tras-os-Montes. That district is wild and mountainous. The roads, at the time, were bad and narrow, the ravines of great depth, and the ascents from many of the streams which intersect the country, were so steep, that the artillery could only be drawn up with ropes. All difficulties, however, were overcome by the spirit and enterprise of the men; the line of the Douro was turned—which the French had believed impracticable; and the troops who occupied the defensive works on that river, were obliged to retire; they fell back upon Morales, after destroying the bridges at Zamora and Toro. Colonel Grant overtook the rear-guard, broke it, and besides killing many, took 200 prisoners.—On the 3rd of June, the allied army was united on the right bank of the Douro. When the marquis of Wellington passed this stream—which, in that direction, is the frontier of the two countries—he felt so confident of ultimate success, that, as soon as his horse stepped on Spanish ground, he rose in his stirrups, took off his hat, and waving an adieu to the land he had left, exclaimed, “Farewell Portugal!”—Simultaneously with the advance of the British, the Spaniards, under the duke del Parque, advanced from the Sierra Morena, into La Mancha; and the Andalusian reserve marched to the bridge of Almaraz, in order to threaten Madrid. Thus the attention of the French was divided, and that concentration of their forces, which could alone have prevented Wellington’s strategy from being carried out, was rendered impossible.

These movements, planned by the British general, and effectively performed, are classed amongst the most brilliant operations of the war. The appearance of the allies on the right bank of the Douro startled the French generals, and Valladolid was immediately evacuated. The army fell back on Burgos, where it halted for a few days.—On the 4th of June, the allies entered Valladolid; on the 7th and 8th they crossed the Carrion, in pursuit of the enemy, whom Hill’s division and the cavalry encountered on the 12th, on the heights of Harmoza. They were commanded by count Reille; and being obliged to retire, on the 13th Burgos was evacuated; the entire French army retreating on Miranda, forty miles to the north-east of the former place. Before they left, they sprung mines and lighted matches, expecting they would explode as the British entered; but, writes an officer who was present, “the hurry, and fear, and confusion with which their preparations were made, defeated this malignant purpose. The explosion took place sooner than was expected; and the consequences fell upon the French, and not the British. Many who remained to plunder, perished, as they were lingering to load their horses in the streets and squares: 300 or 400 were blown up in the fort; and the castle was entirely destroyed.” So many of the mines failed, that the town escaped.

Wellington continued his march on the 14th and 15th of June. The enemy had retired to strong positions on the Ebro. Avoiding this route, he made a detour to their left, and conducted his army by a road the French deemed impracticable, therefore left undefended. By this road he reached Puente de Arenas, near the sources of the river; and on the 18th, before Joseph had the least idea of the approach of the allies, he learned that two of his brigades had been attacked, and lost 300 men, with their arms and baggage. The same day, Jourdain attacked Sir Thomas Graham at Osma; but he was driven back. That night the French took up a strong position behind the river Bayas, with their right on the village of Sabijana, and their left on the heights. This position Wellington attacked on the 19th, at the head of two divisions of his army. He forced the French posted there to retire upon the main body; and Joseph gave orders to fall still further back, concentrating all the men he had about him, or to whom he could dispatch messengers, on Vittoria.

Vittoria, the capital of the province of Alava, is situated in a valley, surrounded, on every side, by high grounds; and, in the distance, the Pyrenees are visible. Joseph posted his army in front of this city. It occupied a line nearly eight miles in extent; the centre covering a range of hills on the left bank of the Zadorra; the right being posted on elevated ground, overlooking the villages of Abechucho and Gamarra Mayor; and their extreme left on the lofty heights of La Puebla. Part of this wing—touching the left centre—occupied formidable ridges above the village of Sabijana de Alava. In the rear of the centre, at the village of Gomecha, a strong reserve was posted: in front of the centre ran the Zadorra, the banks of which were lined with light troops. The bridges across that river were fortified; and a wood between the centre and the right wing was also occupied by light troops. The centre was defended by enormous batteries of field artillery; and earthworks were thrown up and armed with guns, to defend many points of this position, the importance of which may be estimated, from the fact, that there the three great roads from Logrono, Madrid, and Bilbao united, and from thence extended, in one uninterrupted line, to Bayonne. The position was in itself strong; and marshal Jourdain had taken advantage of every salient point; but it was too extensive for the number of men under his command. The immense convoys which accompanied the army—the enormous trains of equipage and baggage—and the grand dépôt which was planted there—all calling for protection, also lessened the means of defence.

The 20th of June was spent by the French in strengthening their position: by Wellington in making a careful reconnaissance. This done, the plan of attack for the next day was arranged. The army was ordered to be formed into three divisions. The right—comprising Sir William Stewart's division, the Portuguese division, under the conde d'Amarante, and a Spanish division, under Murillo—was commanded by Sir Rowland Hill: the centre, composed of the divisions of Sir Lowry Cole, the earl of Dalhousie, Sir Thomas Picton, and baron Alten, was led by Wellington himself: the left included the first division, general Oswald's, Longa's Spaniards, and two brigades of cavalry. This wing was under Sir Thomas Graham. The right wing was destined to storm the heights of La Puebla; the centre, to attack Vittoria in front and flank; and the left wing, to turn the French right, cross the Zadorra, and occupy the Bayonne road. That night the British army bivouacked on the Bayas. The next morning, the troops on both sides were in motion with the dawn. The French had 70,000 men in position: the allies numbered about 75,000. Wellington took his post, as soon as the allies began to move, on a lofty hill in front of the village of Arinez; from whence, with his glass, he could survey the entire field of battle, and direct the movements of the troops as circumstances might require: and Joseph, about the same time, attended by a numerous staff, and protected by his body-guard, placed himself on an eminence which commanded his right and centre. He nominally commanded; but all the dispositions had been made by marshal Jourdain, who chose the ground on which the stand was to be made.

The "battle of Vittoria" was commenced by the Spanish division, under Murillo, ascending the heights of La Puebla. They pressed forward gallantly, and many fell. Murillo was wounded; and Sir Rowland Hill ordered colonel Cadogan and the 71st regiment to support him. That gallant officer fell at the head of his corps, of whom 400 were put hors de combat; but they carried the heights. Colonel O'Callaghan's brigade then assaulted the village of Sabijana, and carried it after a determined resistance. As it covered the left of their centre, the French made many attempts to retake that post; but all failed, though the British were greatly annoyed from the enemy's tirailleurs, who lined the ravines in the heights above, and the wood to the left of the village. Shortly after the right wing was in action, the divisions of the centre crossed the Zadorra—some by the bridge of Nanclures, others by those of Tres Puentes and Mendoza; and forming rapidly on the left bank of the river, advanced against the right of the French centre, while its left was exposed to a flank attack by a part of the allied right, led by Sir Rowland Hill. The attack on this part of the enemy's line was also successful, and it fell back on Vittoria. The only point where the allies received a check was at the village of Arinez, where the 88th regiment was repulsed in an attempt to storm it. The French fought desperately; and, for a brief space, the fortune of the day in that spot alone was in suspense. But Wellington ordered up the 45th and 74th, who ascended the height on which the village stood, drove out the French at the point of the bayonet, and Arinez was won. At another point of this attack, a British brigade (Colville's) had defeated and thrown back a French corps quite equal in numbers, and was pushing on, flushed with victory, and with great impetuosity, when two lines of French infantry arrested their progress. It was supposed they must be crushed; but the men rushed on—the French could not withstand their onset; and they swept "before them the formidable array that, circumstanced as they were, appeared calculated to produce annihilation." The left wing was equally successful in carrying out the movement entrusted to it. Two villages, Gamarra Mayor and Abechicho, were assaulted and carried, and the bridges they commanded left in possession of the victors. The entire French line was now driven back on Vittoria; but it was not yet broken: on the contrary, it presented an imposing front, protected by upwards of eighty pieces of artillery. For an hour the battle raged; the tremendous discharges from the enemy's artillery checking the advance of the allies—the great brunt of the action falling on the division known as Picton's "fighting 3rd." But though the French fought well, they were eventually obliged to retire; and when they did give way, intense confusion soon prevailed. No sooner did they begin to fall back a second time, and the allies were seen to have passed Vittoria in pursuit, than Sir Thomas Graham crossed the Zadorra, and occupied the road to Bayonne, leaving that to Pampeluna alone open for the fugitives, who, driven through Vittoria, never made an attempt to rally. Many of the infantry, throwing away their muskets, fled to Pampeluna, which they reached, utterly broken and completely routed. Joseph himself escaped with difficulty. He had entered his coach; and being recognised, captain Wyndham made a dash at the vehicle, at the head of a squadron of the 10th hussars. Before they reached it, Joseph got out; and throwing himself into the midst of a body of horse, rode off at full speed, and distanced his pursuers. His coach was taken.

The pursuit was kept up till dark; and as the horse artillery joined in it, and fired upon the enemy when they had an opportunity, many fell. Two leagues from Vittoria, lord Wellington, who had followed the flying foe with his advanced guard, ordered a halt for the night; and the allied troops, who had been sixteen hours under arms, were able to form some estimate of the victory they had won. Never was an army so completely beaten; never, probably, did victors in a battle-field ever attain so valuable a booty. The French were enabled to carry off with them only one gun and one howitzer: 151 pieces of cannon were captured, with twenty tons of powder, 12,000 rounds of ammunition for artillery, 2,000,000 musket cartridges; the military chest, containing more than £1,000,000 in coined money (a larger sum than Joseph had ever possessed before); an immense quantity of baggage, augmented by the plunder of Madrid, Salamanca, and other places, and comprising pictures, tapestry, plate, jewellery—in fact, everything that was valuable and portable. Joseph's carriage was filled with choice pictures, collected from the Escorial, and other royal palaces. These Wellington would have restored to Ferdinand when he returned to his kingdom; but his majesty refused to receive them, and they now adorn the walls of Apsley House. There were also many ladies with the army; who, falling into the hands of the British, were at once set at liberty; but their baggage was despoiled, and their "well-stocked trunks were ransacked by many a marvelling trooper and camp-follower, who had never before had unfolded to their view the various resources in which ladies at times confide, 'to make them beautiful, or keep them neat:'" and the common soldiers were seen making a somewhat curious use of the articles which had furnished the toilette-tables of the fair captives. The countess Gazan, and many wives of the French officers, were amongst the prisoners. Their carriages were rescued from the spoil, and they were sent, next day, with a flag of truce, to Pampeluna. In men, the French lost, according to their own returns, more than 8,000; 1,000 of whom were prisoners. The allied loss was as follows:—

	Killed.	Wounded.
British	500	2,800
Portuguese	150	900
Spaniards	89	460

The battle of Vittoria, though it did not put an end to the war, entirely destroyed any hopes that Joseph might have entertained of establishing himself on the throne of Spain; and some of its immediate results were of great significance. Six days after the battle, on the 27th of June, Madrid was finally evacuated by the French; and all the authorities of that nation, with those few Spaniards who had become Joseph's partisans, abandoned Old and New Castile, transporting themselves to the other side of the Ebro with the least possible delay. General Clausel had left Logrono, on the 21st, with 14,000 men, and arrived at Vittoria after the battle, when it was in possession of the British. He immediately retired by Logrono, Calahorra, and Tudela, upon Saragossa, pursued by 18,000 of the allies, under Wellington, who marched by Tafalla, upon Logrono; whilst 12,000 made for that town, on the side of Salvatierra. Clausel, by making a forced march of sixty miles in forty hours, escaped entire destruction, though a Spanish force, under Mina, hung upon his rear, and obliged him to abandon a considerable portion of his artillery and baggage; also the garrison of a redoubt, who were made prisoners. At length he succeeded, passing by Jaca, the frontier town of Spain in that direction, in threading the passes of the Pyrenees, and re-entering France. The fugitives from Vittoria—leaving a garrison of 6,000 men in Pampeluna, which was immediately blockaded by the British—retreated into France by the pass of Roncesvalles. They were pursued by a division of the allied force, under Sir Rowland Hill; and with only one gun, scarcely any ammunition, no baggage, no military chest, and all their papers of every description lost, no troops ever made a more melancholy retreat. After suffering some loss on the way, they also succeeded in re-entering their native country. On the 7th, Joseph Bonaparte, who, with a part of the force from Vittoria, had halted in the valley of San Estevan, was driven from that position by Hill and lord Dalhousie, and also retired into France, establishing his head-quarters at St. Jean Pied-de-Port. General Foy, who was in the neighbourhood of Durango when the battle of Vittoria was fought, no sooner heard of that event, than he collected all the small garrisons in Lower Biscay, and retreated in the direction of San Sebastian. Sir Thomas Graham was sent in pursuit; and both armies arrived at Tolosa on the same day. The French entered first. Foy was thus enabled to barricade the streets before the British appeared, and to make a defence of several hours; which gave time for his convoys to cross the Bidassoa, and escape into France. At nightfall Foy abandoned Tolosa, retreating to Irun; and, a day or two after, he followed his convoys. In the same early days of July, the forts of Passages surrendered to Longa; Castro and Guetario were evacuated; and Pancorvo was stormed and taken by the conde d'Abisbal, who had come to the scene of action with the army of reserve from Andalusia. Thus the campaign of Vittoria had been attended with the most brilliant results. The invaders had, in three months, been deprived of all their advantages; all their strongholds, except Santona, Pampeluna, and San Sebastian, and the fortresses in Catalonia, which Napoleon ordered Suchet not to give up, had been taken, or had surrendered; the wreck of the splendid armies which had invaded the Peninsula, with the exception of the garrisons of those places, and a small force, still under Suchet on the Ebro, had retired into France; and Wellington held the passes of the Pyrenees on the side of Spain.—At this time—fearful lest the cortes should resort to rash measures of confiscating the property of the Afrancesados or Juramentados, as the adherents of Joseph were called—the British general, in an eloquent letter to Don Juan O'Donju, the Spanish minister of war, forcibly urged the government to consider the circumstances of the contest, during which “all men must have imagined that it was impossible for the powers of the Peninsula, although aided by Great Britain, to withstand the colossal power by which they were assailed, and nearly overcome;” and recommended that a general amnesty, with certain exceptions, should be granted.

The siege of Pampeluna and San Sebastian now occupied the attention of lord Wellington. The blockade of the former, commenced immediately after the battle of Vittoria, was continued, and entrusted to the conde d'Abisbal—redoubts being thrown up within 1,500 yards of the fortress, and armed with the cannon taken at Vittoria. San Sebastian, on the 7th of July, was invested by Sir Thomas Graham. It was the strongest place in Spain. A low sandy peninsula curves nearly round the bay, which forms the harbour of San Sebastian, one side being washed by the river Urumea. The peninsula is terminated, next the sea, by a craggy conical hill, called Mount Orgullo, whose base is washed by the ocean; and, on its summit, is an old castle, called La Mota. At the foot of this hill, extending to the coast, the town is built; and, at high water, the Urumea covers four feet of the scarp, being only fordable for a short time before the tide reaches its height, and for an equally brief period after it has receded. Naturally difficult to approach, the artificial defences rendered San Sebastian, when the British general, with 10,000 men, set down before it, nearly impregnable. It was not till the 14th of July that an effective bombardment could take place. On the 17th, two of the outworks were carried by assault; on the 25th, two breaches were effected; and a mine, driven under the glacis, being exploded, an assault took place. The storming parties, during the confusion caused by the explosion of the mine, gained the breaches; but the garrison were enabled to pour upon them such an overwhelming fire of grape and musketry, that they were obliged to retire, after losing 600 men, killed and wounded. Two days after—the losses of the British and Portuguese then amounting to 204 killed, 774 wounded, and 300 missing—Wellington raised the siege, converting it into a blockade.

He took this step because another French army was approaching, with a view to force the passes of the Pyrenees. Napoleon was at Dresden when he received the intelligence of the defeat of Jourdain at Vittoria; and he ordered Soult to repair to Bayonne, to take the command of all the French forces which could be collected there, as lieutenant-general of the emperor, and, if possible, force his way back into Spain. He arrived at Bayonne on the 13th of July, and soon took measures for reorganising the débris of the discomfited armies assembled there, and for throwing up strong redoubts and bastions round the town. While Wellington was staying at Lezaca, superintending the blockade of Pampeluna, and Sir Thomas Graham was besieging San Sebastian, Soult succeeded in collecting and concentrating a numerous army, which he divided into the right wing, under count Reille, of 21,330 men; the centre (23,935) under Drouet, count d'Erlon; the left wing (20,265) under lieutenant-general Clausel; a reserve (17,929), under general Villatte; and 7,621 cavalry, under general Pierre Soult: here was a force of 91,080 men, to which eighty-six guns were attached. There were also several small detached corps: raising the entire force to 122,016 men, of whom, 104,710 were returned “effective.” These were exclusive of Suchet's army, estimated at more than 60,000. With this force—having provided for the defence of Bayonne—Soult occupied all the northern outlets of the passes of the Pyrenees, from that of Roncesvalles on the east, to the Bidassoa on the west; establishing his head-quarters at Ascaïn. He then, on the 22nd of July, issued a proclamation to his army, quite in the style of the emperor—in which he attributed all their disasters to the faults of the commanders, whose “timorous and pusillanimous counsels were followed:” thus, “the blame of the present situation of the army was imputable to others; the glory of repairing it should be their own.” Paying a well-deserved compliment to the “prompt, skilful, and consecutive arrangements” of the English general, and to "the valour and steadiness of his troops," who, "however," he added, "owed to the benefit of the example of the French their present military character;" the lieutenant-general thus concluded his proclamation:—"The emperor's instructions are to drive the enemy from yonder lofty heights, which enable him proudly to survey our fertile valleys, and chase him beyond the Ebro. If won, the Spanish soil must bear your tents, and from thence your resources be drawn. No difficulties are insurmountable to your valour and devotion."

Soult put his army in motion on the 25th of July, the day that the assault on San Sebastian failed; and that night a report was brought to Wellington, that the French had been successful in defeating the allies at two of the passes, and were advancing in force on Pampeluna. "We must do the best we can to stop them," was the reply; and his lordship immediately applied himself to repair any errors that might have been committed, and make the best of his position, which was a very hazardous one—two points having to be covered at least sixty miles from each other, and the intermediate passes defended; whilst the communication was difficult and circuitous, and the nature of the country did not allow of the concentration of a strong reserve in the rear. Wellington's strategy, and the valour of his troops, enabled him to combat successfully with all these disadvantages.

His lordship had under his command only 6,750 cavalry, and 34,581 infantry, British and Germans; 1,492 Portuguese horse, and 23,459 foot; and 4,000 artillerymen and drivers: making a total of 70,282. These were exclusive of the blockading forces at San Sebastian and Pampeluna, and the Spanish corps of Longa, Murillo, and Giron. He arranged this force so as to defend the Roncesvalles pass, where a brigade of British infantry, under general Byng, and Murillo with his corps, were stationed; and the valley of Bastan, where Sir R. Hill was posted with the brigade of general Walker; a part of the second division being in the valley in reserve. Sir Lowry Cole's division was stationed at Biscaret, to support general Byng; Sir Thomas Picton was in reserve at Olaque; the conde d'Amarante, with his Portuguese, occupied the passes eastward of Maya, five leagues from Roncesvalles; general Campbell, with another Portuguese brigade, was detached to Los Alduides, in the French territory: the light and 7th divisions occupied the heights of Santa Barbara, the town of Vera, and the Puerto-de-Echellar; keeping, from the latter points, the communication open with the valley of Bastan; the 6th division was in reserve at San Estevan. The two Spanish divisions of Longa and Giron were stationed so as to communicate with each other from Vera, and also with Sir Thomas Graham.

Greater bravery was not displayed during the war, than was now called forth on both sides, in the "battles of the Pyrenees." Soult's first enterprise was to relieve Pampeluna. He attacked, in force, on the 25th of July, the passes of Roncesvalles and Maya; Soult leading the troops directed against the former, and count Reille and general Clausel those which assailed Maya. The fighting began at noon, and continued till nightfall. "The French gained ground," said Napier, "until six o'clock; for the British, shrunk in numbers, also wanted ammunition; and a part of the 82nd, under major Fitzgerald, were forced to roll down stones, to defend the rock on which they were placed. In this desperate condition, Stewart was on the point of abandoning the mountain entirely, when a brigade of the 7th division, commanded by general Barnes, arrived from Echellar; and that officer, charging at the head of the 6th regiment, drove the French back to the Maya ridge." This was a sanguinary affair. The allies, though in the end they maintained their ground, lost 1,600 men killed and wounded; and 140 prisoners, with four pieces of cannon, were taken by the French. Whilst this animated engagement was going on, Soult, at the head of 38,000 men, attacked the pass of Roncesvalles; and though obstinately resisted, Byng was driven upon the mountains, and Murillo was obliged to fall back on Cole's division, which retreated to Lizoain. The advantage of the day was, therefore, with the French.

The English continued fighting and falling back on the 26th and 27th. On the latter day Hill was at Irurita, and Picton had taken up a position in front of Pampeluna, to cover the blockade. Lord Wellington ordered up reinforcements on the 28th; and there was hard fighting on that day, with alternate success. The British were outnumbered; but when repulsed, they generally succeeded in regaining their ground; and in the course of the day some very gallant affairs took place. On the 29th Soult manœuvred, with a view to take the allies en flank; which extended and weakened his positions so much, that, on the 30th, Wellington took the offensive. He attacked the French along their entire line, and, though they fought with great gallantry and resolution, entirely defeated them. Soult, throughout the day, was seen wherever danger called, and narrowly escaped being made prisoner. His officers imitated his example; but in vain. Slight successes were followed by decided repulses; and at last retreat was found inevitable. In the three days, they lost at least 10,000 killed and wounded. The allies had 574 killed, 3,534 wounded, and 465 missing: two generals, six colonels, and eight majors were among the wounded.—The French continued their retreat towards their own territory on the 31st; the British pressing the pursuit vigorously by the Roncesvalles, Maya, and Donna Maria passes, and making many prisoners. "Nothing," writes a British officer, "could equal the distress of the enemy. They were completely worn down; and fatigued and disheartened as they were, the only wonder is that multitudes did not perish in the wild and rugged passes through which they had to retire." Towards the close of the day, the British light division came up with the retreating foe near the bridge of Yanzi, over the Bidassoa. A skirmish took place, and continued till night put an end to it. It ended by the French retreating over the bridge, of which the British took possession, as they did of a large portion of the enemy's baggage. Both sides lost many men.

From that time Soult made no further attempt to drive the British from the Pyrenees, and Wellington turned his attention to prosecuting the sieges of San Sebastian and Pampeluna. The former was bombarded throughout the month of August; but not with much effect till the 27th. On that day, and the three following, the old breach was reopened, and a new one made. On the 31st the assault took place. The French had prepared a mine to spring when the British entered the breach; but a shell from one of the mortars in the besiegers' batteries fell on the train, and a terrible explosion followed, at the very moment when 300 of the élite of the garrison stood over the spot. Thus, instead of annoying and dispersing the storming party, this mine cleared the way for their advance. The works were not yet won, however, and hundreds fell before they were. Fierce fighting continued till night, when the French were completely expelled from the town, which remained in the hands of the allies, and the usual disgraceful scenes took place.—Soult, hearing how the garrison was pushed, had resolved to make an effort to relieve them. He had, during the month, reorganised his army to a certain extent; and, on the 30th of August, he crossed the Bidassoa with about 18,000 men, composed of Villatte's and Reille's corps. Clausel, with 20,000 men, crossed the river near Vera on the 31st. On that day Soult made an attack upon a Spanish force which occupied the heights of San Marcial, on the Spanish side of the Bidassoa. They were completely defeated before an English regiment—the 85th—which Wellington had sent to assist its allies, arrived. Clausel was also beaten, though he succeeded, at first, in driving back a Portuguese brigade near Vera. Both divisions with difficulty regained the French side of the river, a heavy tempest impeding their progress, and adding to their loss, which amounted to 3,600 killed and wounded: that of the allies was 2,683—of whom 1,680 were Spaniards.—Thus the attempt to relieve San Sebastian failed. But only the town fell on the 31st. Part of the garrison and the governor were enabled to reach the castle on Mount Orgullo, where they defended themselves till the 8th of September. On that day they surrendered; when eighty officers, and 1,736 non-commissioned officers and privates, were taken prisoners: ninety-three pieces of cannon, and a large quantity of ammunition, were found in the town and castle. In this renewed siege, the allies lost forty-four officers and 711 non-commissioned officers and privates killed; the number of wounded was 105 officers, and 1,553 privates: one officer and forty-four rank and file were missing.

On the 7th of October, the allies gallantly forced the passage of the Bidassoa, in front of Vera, losing 900 men, and the French as many. The latter were driven from the intrenched position of Puerto-de-Vera: the British bivouacked on the ground from whence they had drove the enemy; and, for the first time, slept under a French sky. Wellington established himself at Puerto-de-Vera, to await the fall of Pampeluna, which did not take place till the 31st, when the governor capitulated. It is a pleasant feature, amidst the details of carnage and strife, to find that the French garrison, who became prisoners of war, were particularly well treated, because, as the authorities stated, "their conduct towards the Spaniards had been conformable to strict discipline; and that the measures adopted by the governor during the scarcity occasioned by the blockade, had been so excellent, that not one single inhabitant died."

The fall of Pampeluna left lord Wellington at liberty to pursue such offensive measures as he thought necessary; and he resolved to advance into France, as his position could scarcely be rendered tenable against a determined attack. He had nothing to apprehend from an enemy in his rear or upon his flank: for though much was said of Suchet's army, and Soult had applied to that general for support, he was really unable to make any effective offensive movement. He was compelled, by the express command of Napoleon, to garrison so many fortresses, that, soon after the return of lord William Bentinck, he found himself obliged to break up his camp on the Xucar, which he did on the 6th of July, and retired on the Ebro. He withdrew the garrison from Tarragona, having blown up the fortifications; but he left garrisons in Lerida, Mequinenza, Monzon, Tortosa, Saguntum, Barcelona, Figueras, Morilla, Denia, and Peniscola. Elio (who, with the duke del Parque, had suffered a sad defeat at the hands of the French general Hubert shortly before), when Soult retired, occupied Valencia; and the British took possession of Tarragona. No offensive movements took place on either side for several weeks, the British and Spaniards keeping Suchet in check. Early in September, lord William Bentinck moved from Tarragona on Villa Franca, 27 miles N.E. of that town. His advanced guard was pushed on to the pass of Ordal, twelve miles in advance of Villa Franca; and there, on the 12th, Soult attacked it with superior numbers, compelling the British to fall back, with the loss of four guns taken, and 1,000 men killed and wounded. Suchet was unable, however, to follow up this success. The French cavalry were signally beaten, a few days after, by lord Frederick Bentinck, at the head of the 28th dragoons and the German horse; and the French fell back to cantonments on the river Llobregat, one of the Catalonian streams. Part of the British returned to Tarragona; the remainder of the force, with the Spaniards, invested all the forts where Suchet had left garrisons; and thus prevented their concentration to annoy Wellington. Before the year closed, lord William Bentinck—fearing that Murat would make a descent on the island, not knowing that that intrusive sovereign of Napoleon's creation had entered into arrangements with the allies—returned to Sicily, and general William Clinton succeeded him in the command of the allies in Catalonia.

Soult had occupied the delay he gained by the long defence made by the garrison of Pampeluna in reinforcing his army, and fortifying his position on the northern bank of the Bidasoa, which was, by nature, well calculated for defence. From Bayonne, as an apex, on the north, two sides of a triangle extended to Irun and St. Jean de Luz on the sea-coast, and to St. Jean Pied-de-Port on the Nivelle. The line between these two places formed the base, and was protected by a ridge of immense rugged rocks. Three lines of works were formed in this position; one behind the other, and they are said to "have equalled those of Torres Vedras in strength and solidity." The first line ran from St. Jean de Luz to Mount Daren, and thence to St. Jean Pied-de-Port. A second was carried from St. Jean de Luz to Cambo, and it took in three camps—Espelette, Suraide, and Sarre—where the mass of the army was concentrated. A third was commenced behind Santa Pé, on the road to Ustaritz. When November came in, the works on this line were just commenced: the first and second were completed, and armed with a number of heavy cannon, which had been furnished by the arsenal at Bayonne. Many conscripts and other recruits having arrived, Soult had at least 70,000 effective men in this position. He placed them in four divisions: one, under Reille, formed the right wing, near St. Jean de Luz; a second, the centre, under Clausel, at the redoubts, behind Sarre; a third, the left, under D'Erlon, behind Ainhoué, on the right bank of the Nivelle; the fourth, under Foy, occupied the extreme left, between St. Jean Pied-de-Port and Bidarray. Thus both as far as the nature of the position he occupied, and the number of men by whom that position was defended, Soult expected to be able to defy any attack. Indeed, he calculated upon making another inroad into Spain; and he again sent a messenger to Suchet, entreating him to put his troops in motion to join him, which that general was unable to do.

For a week after the surrender of Pampeluna, the weather was so bad that nothing could be attempted. As soon as it cleared up, Wellington reconnoitred, in person, the French position, and determined to make an attempt to carry it. The centre appeared the weakest point—near the Rhune mountains, and the bridge of Amotz, over the Nivelle; and he ordered the attack to be made in the following order:—His left wing, under Sir John Hope, who had succeeded Graham, was to make a feint on the enemy's right, in front of St. Jean de Luz; whilst Hill's and Beresford's divisions (comprising about 40,000 infantry, more than 30,000 of whom were British and Portuguese) assailed the centre at Sarre, and the left at Ainhoué. Giron's Spaniards attacked the slopes on the west of Sarre; and the light division, under Alten, with Longa's Spaniards, attacked the Lesser Rhune. The 6th division formed a reserve. The weather prevented the troops from moving till the 10th of November, when fighting commenced, at daylight, with the assault on the Lesser Rhune; and the British light division, ably supported by their allies, climbed the hill; stormed and took three redoubts which stood one beyond the other, the third on the summit; expelled the French from the elevated plateau from which the Lesser Rhune springs, and forced them to fall back in great confusion on the main body. The attacks on the enemy's left were equally successful. A battery of eighteen guns was brought to bear on the Sarre redoubts with such effect, that the garrison leaped from their intrenchments, and made off as soon as they saw the British advancing with their scaling-ladders. Hill had a long march to make before he reached the enemy's position near the bridge of Amotz: when he did, the French were seen making a rapid retreat into the low grounds near the Nivelle. General Clinton, at the head of his corps, broke through all the works guarded by D'Erlon's division, and carried the redoubts behind Ainhoué; whilst the Portuguese division and Byng's brigade stormed those in front. The French general Abbé for a time kept his ground; but he was shortly compelled to follow the other fugitives. Clausel's right wing stood firm longer than any other portion of the French; but, charged by the light division after it had won the Lesser Rhune, that also broke and fled—leaving only one redoubt in the first line, called the "signal redoubt," and stronger than any of the others, uncaptured. This was twice assailed by the 32nd; and they were preparing for a third assault, when the garrison surrendered at discretion. Soult then hurried from St. Jean de Luz, with all his reserves, to support his flying troops; and Wellington held his men in hand, till the 6th division, which had not been engaged, came up: then he crossed the Nivelle, and drove the enemy from their second line, which induced their right, under Reille, also to fall back. Before nightfall, St. Jean de Luz and Ascain were evacuated; and the first and second lines of the enemy's works, forming six miles of intrenchments, were in possession of the British.

Looking at what the conquerors really achieved in this battle, few have surpassed it. Clausel complained, says Pellot, in La Guerre des Pyrénées, "that the divisions under his orders had not, in all cases, done their duty:" if they had, the British, in his opinion, could not have forced the lines without the loss of 15,000 or 20,000 men. According to colonel Batty, "the successful result of the battle was owing, in no inconsiderable degree, to the able direction of the artillery, under colonel Dickson." The French had supposed the heights were impracticable for cannon; but "mountain guns, on swivel carriages, harnessed on the backs of mules purposely trained for the service, ascended the rugged ridges, and showered destruction on the intrenchments below. The foot and horse artillery displayed a facility of movement which must have astonished the French; the artillerymen dragging the guns, with ropes, up steep precipices, or lowering them down to positions from whence they could, with more certain aim, pour out their fatal volleys." No doubt this admirable service of the artillery had great effect. It enabled the infantry to scale the heights with much less loss than they would otherwise have incurred.

The victory of the 10th was followed up by the abandonment of the third line of the French position on the next day, and Soult retired into an intrenched camp in front of Bayonne. Thus the strong position which he had employed himself for three months in completing, in order to prevent the advance of the allies into France, with fifty-one pieces of cannon, and all the field magazines, were abandoned; besides leaving 1,400 men prisoners, and having 4,265 killed and wounded. The loss of the allies, in killed and wounded, was 2,694.

Wellington cantoned his troops two miles in front of the French, his right extending to Cambo, and his left to the coast. Here the weather compelled him to remain inactive nearly a month; during which time he had great difficulty in repressing the plundering disposition of the men. The British merely wanted to obtain the means of intoxication, to which, unfortunately, they were too much addicted; but the Spaniards and Portuguese acted from a spirit of revenge, and frequently committed murders among the peasants. Wellington had every offender hung who was detected; and at last he sent all the Spaniards, except Murillo's division, out of France. By his firmness he restored discipline; and the French peasantry, who had fled, returned to their homes, and an amicable intercourse was soon established between them and the allies.

The weather having become more favourable, Wellington, on the 9th of December, resolved to force the passage of the Nive, and throw the enemy entirely back on the cannon of Bayonne. The movement was successfully carried out. The left wing, under generals Hope and Alten, advanced from St. Jean de Luz, and carried, after a vigorous resistance, all the enemy's advanced posts connected with their camp, and established themselves on heights which commanded that camp. Hill, on the right, crossed the Nive above and below Cambo; drove the French before him to Villefranche; and ultimately expelled them from that place, establishing his troops on the heights adjoining. Clinton crossed the Nive at Ustaritz by a bridge of boats; and the French who were in that neighbourhood fell back on Bayonne. Thus the passage of the Nive was effected; and Wellington cantoned his army in a position where he could intercept the navigation of the Upper Adour, by which the greater part of the supplies for the French army reached the camp. But his position was by no means a safe one. The Nive, running obliquely from south-east to north-west, divided his army; and the bad roads rendered speedy communication impracticable. Soult was aware of this, and attempted to turn it to advantage. On the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th of December, he made repeated assaults on the allied positions, attacking the left on the two former days, the right on the two latter. He had, on all occasions, nearly the advantage of two to one in the number of men, lord Wellington not being able to bring up supports in time, from the distance of one wing from the other, and the almost impassable condition of the roads. But the French were repulsed in all their attacks; the battle on the 13th being as desperate as any that was fought during the war. There was great loss on both sides. The allies, in the various engagements, had 650 killed, 3,907 wounded (including generals Hope, Robinson, Barnes, Le Cor, and Ashworth), and 504 prisoners; total, 5,061. The French lost at least 6,000 in the field; and in the night of the 10th, two German regiments came over to the allies, thus increasing the French loss to at least 8,500.

What was of more consequence, they had lost all the objects for which they fought. Wellington established himself in a position from which he was enabled to intercept the navigation of the Adour; and Soult—his army cantoned on the right bank of that river—was cut off from his principal line of communication, and compelled to depend, for forage and support, upon the vast and desolate landes of Bordeaux. Though in an enemy's country, the allies were in a much better condition. They were established at Urrugue, St. Jean de Luz, and other towns on the coast; and were thus not only enabled to obtain supplies by sea, but by land they got almost everything they wanted, from the rich fields of Béarn. St. Jean de Luz was declared a free port, and the most complete protection to person and property established. Telegraphs were put up in convenient positions, so that intelligence was transmitted instantaneously from post to post; and except an occasional want of money—(Wellington, on one occasion, had to borrow the sum necessary to defray the expenses of a courier he wanted to send to general Sir W. Clinton, in Catalonia)—the British, during the two months they spent in this position, had nothing to complain of.—During this period, the English and French officers became intimate, and used to meet at a narrow part of the river to talk over the campaign; the men, also, in their way, exchanged frequent courtesies with each other. For the order that prevailed—for the extinction of the system of plundering—and for the re-establishment of discipline—Wellington is entitled to by far the largest share of the credit. His other generals, and the officers of all ranks, no doubt supported him firmly and ably; but it was owing to his “noble and heroic system of protection to others, and self-denial to himself,” that, in the words of an eye-witness, “order and tranquillity profound, on the edge of the very battle-field, attended the march of the civilised army which passed the Bidassoa.”

Soult spent his season of respite in diligently training the conscripts which had reached his camp; but as the emperor made a large draft from his regular troops, his effective force, after deducting the garrisons of Bayonne and some other forts, which he dared not abandon, was reduced to 40,000 men. The allies, at the same time—though a part of the reinforcements at first destined for Wellington, were turned aside to Holland—English, Portuguese, and Spaniards, had raised their number to near 100,000, with 140 pieces of cannon. The partisans of the Bourbons in the Vendée and the western provinces of France, also made overtures to Wellington; and in January, 1814, the duke d'Angoulême arrived at his head-quarters. The British general, however, insisted upon his preserving his incognito; and refused to give any encouragement to these movements of the disaffected, till he knew what were the intentions of the allied sovereigns. His own advice to lord Bathurst was, to make peace with Napoleon if all the objects could be acquired which the allies had a right to expect.

Soult occupied a formidable position, his right being protected by Bayonne, which was strongly fortified; and could be rendered, to a certain extent, inaccessible, by cutting the dykes of the Lower Adour, and inundating the country. But he did not believe he could maintain his ground; and he wrote to the emperor, proposing, that Clausel should be left in the Pyrenees with two divisions, to act on the rear of the allies; that Bayonne should be left with a garrison of 14,000 men; and he himself, with the remainder of his army, should march to Paris, where he strongly recommended the entire disposable force of the French army should be concentrated, to prevent the allies from entering the capital. Napoleon, however, would not listen to this sound advice, but commanded Soult to defend himself as long as he could on the banks of the Adour. It soon appeared that he could make no effectual resistance to the force brought against him. On the 14th of February—a hard frost having succeeded to much damp weather, and rendered the roads practicable—the allies began their advance into France. General Hill advanced against Harispe (who was at Hellette with 5,000 men) with a part of his division—another part moving to the Joyeuse streamlet; and Beresford marched against the French centre, under Clausel. It was impossible for the enemy to resist; they fell back, and the town of Jaca, which commands the pass into Aragon, capitulated. Harispe took up a strong position on the Garris mountain, in front of the Bidouze, from which he was driven by the 28th and 30th regiments the same evening, with the loss of 300 killed and wounded, and 200 prisoners; the British loss being 160. The French continued retreating; and, on the 17th, they intrenched themselves near Sauveterre, on the north side of the Gave d'Oleron, a river formed by the junction, near Oleron, of two streams which rise in the Lower Pyrenees. On the 22nd, the allies attempted the passage of the Adour. Soult had destroyed, or rendered quite impassable, all the bridges over that river; but the guards, under colonel Stopford, passed over in the morning by means of a few small boats and a raft. They were instantly attacked by a detachment from Bayonne, and were in some danger, as the tide turned, and no more troops could cross for the time. But colonel Stopford had a rocket troop with him—the use of that missile having been introduced into the British army the previous summer. Two or three discharges so startled the French, that they ran off; and Stopford's men were enabled to defend their position, where they were soon joined by more of their comrades when the tide again came in. A British squadron, under admiral Penrose, appeared that morning off the mouth of the Adour; and difficult as it was to cross the bar in that river, a number of light luggers, called chasse-marées, effected a passage, but not till three or four were lost, and captain Elliot and several seamen drowned. With twenty-six of these vessels, lashed to each other, and moored at head and stern to resist the effect of the current, a perfect bridge was carried across the river before night. Over this bridge Hope's division passed, drove back the troops from all the villages in front of Bayonne, and closely invested that important fortress.

In the meantime Hill had crossed the Gave d'Oleron unopposed, followed by Picton, Clinton, and Beresford. Soult, finding his position at Sauveterre untenable, fell back to Orthes, a town in the department of the Basses-Pyrénées, on the Gave de Pau. There, on the 27th of February, he was attacked by the allies, marshal Beresford charging the French right at St. Boes; while the centre was assailed by the 3rd and 6th divisions under Picton, and lord Edward Somerset's cavalry; and Hill, with the 2nd British and Le Cor's Portuguese brigade, forced the passage of the Gave de Pau at Orthes, and attacked the left. The first movements of Beresford's and Picton's divisions, who were a mile and a-half from each other, were successful; but the French opposed to the former had a park of artillery, so effectively posted, that it for some time checked the allies; and a Portuguese brigade which suffered greatly, broke up, and made a disorderly retreat. At the same time, Picton's division was repulsed in its endeavour to take up a position at the base of an eminence on which the French centre was stationed. Soult saw both these disasters; and striking his thigh, we are told, in great exultation, exclaimed, "At last, I have him!" Wellington, however, who was posted on a hill, from whence he commanded the entire field, also saw the temporary mishap which had occurred, and ordered up reinforcements, whose arrival changed the aspect of affairs. The enemy were checked where they were gaining advantages, and were ultimately driven from one point to another, till at last Soult found himself compelled to order a general retreat. At first it was made in admirable order; but as the retiring force approached a stream, called the Luy de Béarn, which was crossed by a bridge accessible only by one road, the British under Hill, with Sir Stapleton Cotton's and lord Edward Somerset's dragoons, began to press upon them. A division under general Paris made a stand, and held the pursuers in check for some time, while the main body made for the bridge. But Hill's infantry was seen to take a direction that they feared would anticipate them at that important point; and they began to run. Hill's men ran also: the French had the advantage of being somewhat ahead; and being, also, swifter of foot, they reached the bridge first; and thus the greater part of their army crossed: but the dragoons charged three battalions, which were broken—300 being made prisoners; and 2,000 more threw down their arms. A number of scattered bands waded through the stream; and whilst they drew up on the other side, the victorious and exhausted British bivouacked on the southern shore. In this engagement, the loss of the French, in killed, wounded, prisoners, and deserters, must have been very great. The British captured six guns; they had 277 killed, 1,923 wounded, and seventy missing: total, 2,270.

Soult found that he must not remain long in the vicinity of the allies; therefore, having refreshed his army with a few hours' sleep at Sault de Navailles, on the right bank of the Luy de Béarn; and having been joined by the garrison of Dax, he fell back, first on St. Sever, on the Adour, then on Agen, and from thence he took the road to Tarbes, by both banks of the Adour. He was favoured by heavy rains, which impeded the march of the allies; but, on the 2nd of March, Hill, who commanded Wellington's advanced guard, overtook him in front of Aire, on the Adour, where he had taken up a post on an eminence, to reach which, a rocky ridge had to be surmounted. This was not an easy operation. Stewart's division took the road to Aire, and attacked the right; and Da Costa's Portuguese brigade attacked the ridge, which they won; but the French rallied, drove them down the height, and followed in force, threatening utter destruction to this division. The success of general Stewart enabled Hill to send Byng to support Da Costa; and the French were, in their turn, beaten, and driven from the field and the town. In this affair, a number of prisoners were taken, independent of the killed and wounded. Soult then took the right bank of the Adour, and retreated to Plaisance and Malbourget, where, at first, he intended again to wait and give the allies battle. Lord Wellington's movements, however, rendered this plan abortive.

Bordeaux, and the district in which it was situated, had always been distinguished for royalist predilections; and since March, 1813, a royalist committee had been formed in that town, to take advantage of any circumstance that might occur, likely to advance the interest of the Bourbons. As already remarked, advances had been made to Wellington, which, as he was ignorant of the views of the allies, he could not meet. After the battle of Orthes, however, the enthusiasm of the friends of Louis XVIII., who had been joined by M. Lynch, the mayor of the city, led them to send M. Larochejaquelein to Wellington, to ask him to occupy the city with 3,000 men. His grace resolved to send Beresford with 12,000; but instructed the gallant marshal not to take any part in political movements, but, contenting himself with stating, that the British government, though favourable to Louis XVIII., was negotiating with Bonaparte, to remain quiet and watch events. Beresford left the main army with the 4th and 7th divisions on the 8th of March, and, on the 12th, arrived before Bordeaux, which had been abandoned by the military authorities and some of the troops—the rest, conscripts, laying down their arms. The mayor and civic authorities, attended by a number of the townspeople, met the British a short distance from the city, and M. Lynch expressed his joy at their arrival. Though the authorities wore the imperial insignia, they had white cockades concealed. No sooner had the mayor concluded his few words of welcome, than shouts of “A bas les Aigles!” “Vivent les Bourbons!” arose on all sides; the tricolour was replaced by the white riband of the ancient régime; the English troops were invited triumphantly to Bordeaux; the duke d’Angoulême arrived shortly after, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm; and the mayor issued a proclamation calling on the people to rally round the lilies of France—telling them, that “it was not to subject their country, that the English, Spaniards, and Portuguese had approached their walls;” but, “they had united in the south, as others had in the north, to destroy the scourge of nations, and replace him by a monarch, the father of his people.” And “possibly,” added the municipal chief, “it is reserved for the great captain, who has already merited the glorious title of the ‘liberator of nations,’ to give his name to the glorious epoch which will produce such a happy result!”

As Wellington was quite ignorant, at that time, of the course which the allies were likely to take, he was not pleased with this movement, which, however, he could not repress. He therefore recalled Beresford; and, leaving earl Dalhousie at Bordeaux, followed Soult. That general, as soon as he learned the events at Bordeaux, addressed an impassioned and energetic proclamation to his troops. “Soldiers!” he said, “at the battle of Orthes you did your duty; the enemy’s losses surpassed yours, and his blood moistened the ground he gained. He has had the indecency, since, to provoke you and your countrymen to revolt and sedition.” * * * “Thanks to him for making known his intentions, our forces are thereby multiplied a hundredfold.” * * * “No peace with that disloyal and perfidious nation! No peace with the English and their auxiliaries, till they quit the French territories! They have dared to insult the national honour: they have had the infamy to incite Frenchmen to become perjured towards the emperor. Wash out the offence in blood!” This proclamation had a considerable effect upon the old soldiers of the army, who were still attached to the emperor, under whom many of them had fought; and as they were eager to give battle, Soult made a movement on the right bank of the Adour, towards Tarbes, in which town his advanced pickets were placed. The troops of the two armies came in contact again on the 19th of March, near Vic Bigorre, when two French divisions, under D’Armagnac and Paris, were compelled to fall back, the loss on each side amounting to 250 men. The next day there was a more serious affair at Tarbes, when Hill’s division was ordered to drive the French outposts out of that town, and then attack Soult’s left wing; whilst Clinton, with the 6th division, and lord Edward Somerset’s and Ponsonby’s cavalry, crossed the river between Vic Bigorre and Rabestens, and assailed the right. The French fought well, but were beaten, and driven over the plain beyond Tarbes, in a state of great confusion—Hill’s division and the cavalry only being engaged; the state of the roads preventing Clinton’s division from getting up in time. Clausel’s four divisions were the only part of the French army which was not retreating: they were formed in line to arrest the pursuit; and when Clinton’s division got up, they found their advance arrested. There was no more fighting that day, as night came on; and, before morning, Soult was in full retreat for Toulouse, which he reached in four days. Wellington did not arrive till the 27th—two days after the French had gained the town; and thus Soult had been enabled to take measures both for reorganisation and defence.

He appears, up to this time, to have expected to receive support from Suchet, who was unable to afford him any, as he was closely observed by the allies. After the departure of lord William Bentinck, no more offensive movements took place in 1813. Early in the following year, a Spaniard, Van Halen—who had obtained employment on the staff of Suchet, and, by constant practice, gained the power of imitating his handwriting—addressed forged orders, purporting to come from the marshal, directing the governors of the towns held by French troops, to withdraw them, and join him, in order to concentrate themselves with the emperor’s army in France. These orders deceived the governors of Lerida, Mequinenza, and Monzon, which fortresses were evacuated and occupied by the Spaniards. Their garrisons, being waylaid on their way to Soult, had to surrender themselves prisoners. In the meantime, Napoleon had twice drafted men from Suchet, who found himself obliged to draw the remainder of his army together, and retire to Figueras. All hostilities were terminated in this quarter by the arrival of Ferdinand on the frontier, on the 20th of March. On the 11th of December, 1813, he had signed a treaty at Valençay with Napoleon, by which, on the latter recognising him as king of Spain and the Indies, he agreed that the English troops should retire from Spain; that Port Mahon and Ceuta should never be ceded to Great Britain; that the contracting parties should mutually guarantee each other's dominions and the rights of their flags; and that pensions should be paid to Charles IV. and the queen; £300,000 to the former, and £20,000 to the latter if she survived her husband. The cortes refused to ratify this treaty, and the fortresses with French garrisons remained blockaded. But there was no more fighting in the field, and Ferdinand went to Madrid, where he resumed his authority. Clinton broke up his army—part joining lord William Bentinck, then before Genoa; and part marched to join Wellington, on the Garonne. Suchet, soon after, joined Soult, whom he did not reach, however, till after the battle of Toulouse.

Wellington's determination was to attack Soult; but he could not effect his object for several days after his arrival before Toulouse. That city stands on the right bank of the Garonne, and its suburb of St. Cyprien lies on the left bank of that river. The canal of Languedoc incloses the east and north sides of the city, joining the river a mile below it. On the east lies the suburb of St. Etienne; on the south that of St. Michael. The defences were all antiquated; and Soult knew that they could not withstand a heavy bombardment; he therefore intrenched the suburb of St. Cyprien; constructed têtes-de-pont on all the bridges of the canal; threw up redoubts and breastworks, and destroyed most of the bridges over the Ers, a stream which communicates with the Garonne, running through a valley bearing its name. On the 28th of March, lord Wellington attempted to place a pontoon bridge across the Garonne, but the current was rendered so strong by the heavy rains, that it was found impracticable. On the 31st, flanking batteries being established on the left bank of the stream, the engineers effected the task of laying down a bridge near Pensaguel, seven miles below Toulouse; and Hill, with two British divisions and Murillo's Spaniards, crossed over to the right bank. The roads, however, were found impassable; and the troops, the next day, re-crossed the river, and broke up the bridge. On the 3rd of April, the pontoons were placed across the river at Grenade, fifteen miles from the city. Beresford passed over with three divisions of infantry and three of cavalry, and captured a large drove of oxen, on their way to Soult's army. But the river again rose, the rapid torrent carried away the bridge, and, till the 8th, the allies remained in their isolated position, exposed to an attack from the entire French army, which might have been marched down upon them. Soult, however, who had thrown up strong fortifications on Mount Rave, either thought it injudicious to leave them, or did not know the strength of the English force which had passed over to his side of the river; for he remained perfectly quiet behind his intrenchments. On the 8th the river subsided, the bridge was again laid down, and various divisions of the allies passed over. Wellington, taking the command in person, advanced up the valley of the Ers to Fenouillet, five miles below Toulouse; and the battle of Toulouse began by an engagement of cavalry at the bridge of Croix d'Auraote, one of those left over the Ers, where Vial's dragoons were beaten by the 18th hussars, under major Hughes, and 100 prisoners taken. It was not, however, till the 10th that the main action was fought.

On that day, Wellington had a force of 51,724 officers and privates under his command, 12,000 of whom were Spaniards. Soult's army was, in number, only 28,480; the superiority, therefore, was with the allies. When, however, the position of Soult is considered, and its many capabilities of defence, the two armies, in a military point of view, were pretty equal. Soult had with him some excellent officers—Reille, who defended St. Cyprien against Hill; D'Erlon, who was near the mouth of the canal; Daricau, at the bridge of Matabian; Villatte, on the hill of Pujade; Harispe, at the works in the centre; Jaupin, on the extreme right; and D'Armagnac, in reserve, behind Mount Rave. Fighting began at 7 o'clock A.M., by Picton and Alten's divisions driving the French advanced posts between the river and the Pujade hill, back to their redoubts on the canal, the Spaniards establishing themselves on the hill; whilst Hill forced the exterior line at St. Cyprien; and Beresford, with Clinton and Cole's divisions, crossed the bridge of Croix d'Auraote, drove the enemy out of the village of Mont Blanc, and took a flank march round their right, greatly annoyed by the cannon from Mount Rave. The principal point on the mount was the summit of Calvinet: and leaving some Portuguese artillery on the Pujade hill, Freyre and his Spaniards advanced to assault the northern angle of the redoubts thrown up there. They pressed on with great resolution till they came within range of the grapeshot, which mowed them down in vast numbers. One regiment gained a hollow way under the redoubts; but the others broke and fled, and the French leaped out of their works and pursued them. Freyre and the officers tried most gallantly to rally their men, and probably would have succeeded had not a French brigade taken them en flank; they then fled in wild confusion, making for the bridge of Croix d'Auraote; and Wellington was only just in time, with the reserve artillery and Ponsonby's horse, to prevent the French from gaining possession of that bridge, which would have completely isolated Beresford's division. His lordship himself then rallied some of the Spaniards, and Freyre again led them into the battle. At the same time, Picton, who was only to have made a feigned attack upon a bridge over the canal, close to the city, converted it into a real one, and was repulsed. But on all other points where the battle raged, success sat on the banners of the allies. Redoubt after redoubt was captured; and a movement on which Soult had depended for victory, brought defeat. As the divisions of Cole and Clinton advanced, they unavoidably became separated. Soult observed this, and he thought it possible to destroy one of these divisions in detail—one being beaten before the other could join it. He therefore directed Taupin to take the 6th division (Clinton's), which was furthest in advance, in front, and general Leseur, at the head of his cavalry, to charge it in flank. Clinton, however, saw the advance of the enemy: without waiting for the attack, he met it, and, with a most gallant charge of bayonets, broke and dispersed the French infantry, Taupin being killed. The cavalry, who made a furious charge, were also repulsed; and the victorious troops, pressing on, captured the redoubt of Sypiere. Cole's division directly after came up, and Soult's communication in that quarter, with Toulouse, was threatened. He then changed his line of defence, and completely re-formed his right wing. While he was thus occupied, Beresford was waiting for his artillery, which was impeded by the bad state of the roads. When it arrived, the most desperate fighting of the day commenced in the centre of the enemy's works on the Calvinet. Here the French fought most gallantly; and four Highland regiments, the 42nd, 71st, 79th, and 92nd, for a long time sustained the brunt of the engagement on this summit of Mount Rave, where Soult had reared his strongest redoubts. Formidable in themselves, they were also defended by ditches full of water, which made them still more difficult of access. The British, however, surmounted all difficulties, captured the redoubts, and were driven out. They were thus taken and retaken several times; but at last British determination prevailed: the French were finally expelled, forced over the ridge of Mount Rave, and down the hill towards Toulouse. Wellington's troops were equally successful on the right and left; and, before nightfall, the French were driven from all their exterior works, and cooped up within the walls of the city.

The battle of Toulouse was one of the most bloody fought during the war; and the French regained something of the prestige they had lost at Vittoria and the Pyrenees, by the determined stand they made against superior numbers. Three days before the battle was fought, Soult received the intelligence that the allies had entered Paris; but this only determined him to defend Toulouse to the utmost, because as it contained establishments of all kinds, it was of the last importance to prevent it from falling into the hands of the allies. He took his measures for defence well; was most heroically supported by his troops; and some French historians claim for them the victory. But, as Vaudoncourt says, "the battle was, unquestionably, lost by Soult," who was driven from all his exterior works, of which the allies took possession. The loss on both sides was great. That of the allies, in killed, wounded, and missing, amounted to 4,669, distributed amongst the three nations as follows:—

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
British	312	1,795	17	2,124
Spanish	205	1,722	1	1,928
Portuguese	78	539	—	617

The French loss was not so great; it was given as 3,200 killed, wounded, and prisoners: and Soult had still 35,000 men. With these he remained quiet on the 11th, while Wellington was engaged getting up his artillery to attack the city; but, in the night, he marched out with all his men, leaving 1,600 wounded, including Harispe and two other generals, to the mercy of the victors. On the 12th, Wellington entered Toulouse in triumph, and found that a large proportion of the inhabitants had mounted the white cockade. Soult retreated on Carcassonne; and moved so rapidly, that he reached Villefranche, twenty-two miles from Toulouse, early on the 12th. At Carcassonne, he was joined by Suchet.

The battle of Toulouse was not the last blood that was shed in connection with the Peninsular war. When Wellington marched with the main body of the allies in pursuit of Soult, general Hope was left to carry on the siege of Bayonne; and he had got up his siege matériel, and thrown up the requisite works ready to open the bombardment, when, on the 7th of April, he heard rumours of the fall of Paris. Soon official accounts of the events of March reached the British camp, and were communicated to Thouvenot, the commander at Bayonne; who returned for answer, that "the besiegers should hear from him." He contemplated a sortie, of which the British were informed by two deserters who left the town on the night of the 13th. It took place at 3 A.M. on the 14th, when 3,000 men sallied from the place, and carried the village of St. Etienne; major-general Hay, who defended it, being killed. Sir John Hope and his staff, unaware that the village was taken, were on their way there, when they were fired upon, Sir John's horse killed, he himself wounded, and, as two of his staff dismounted to extricate him from his horse, all were taken prisoners. The fighting continued for some time in the dark, the enemy having the advantage, as they knew where they were, and what they purposed doing; whilst the British, surprised, were in a state of confusion. But when day dawned, the guards came to the rescue, and they soon compelled the French to retreat into Bayonne. A small party of the 38th, under captain Forster, had defended themselves in a house in St. Etienne, against all attempts made to dislodge them. Whilst the guards were driving the enemy back to the city, a brigade of Germans, under general Hinuber, recovered the village, and rescued this heroic little band.—What object Thouvenot expected to attain by this sortie, it is impossible to say. The result was defeat—and a great and unnecessary slaughter on both sides. On that of the French it was estimated at 850; the British had 150 killed, 457 wounded, and 236 missing. Four days after this battle, intelligence of the recent events not having reached Barcelona, Hubert, the French commandant there, endeavoured to cut his way through the Spanish besieging force. He was defeated, and compelled to retire within the walls again; but the Spaniards lost 800 men.

It is greatly to be regretted that the events at Paris, which will be found described in another chapter, were not earlier known, as they might have been, at Toulouse and Bayonne, that the loss of life in the two last engagements might not have been incurred. The very day that Wellington entered Toulouse, at 5 P.M., a messenger arrived with intelligence of the restoration of the Bourbons. Then the English general was able to lay aside that restraint he had hitherto been obliged to assume; and he, with his officers, displayed the white cockade amidst the most enthusiastic cheers of the inhabitants. A courier was sent to inform Soult of what had taken place; who at first refused to do anything more than accede to an armistice, which Wellington refused to grant. But having received official intimation of the abdication of Napoleon, he agreed to send an officer to Toulouse, to arrange a formal convention on his part, and that of Suchet, with Wellington. This convention was signed at Toulouse on the 18th of April. By its conditions, hostilities were immediately to cease, and not to be recommenced, on either side, without a previous notice of five days. Hostilities were also to cease at Bayonne, Navarreins, and Bordeaux; the French garrisons were to be withdrawn from the places they still occupied in Spain; and an undertaking was given, by Soult and Suchet, not to remove from those fortresses any artillery, arms, ammunition, or any other military effects, belonging to the Spanish government.

Thus ended the Peninsular war. Wellington remained at Toulouse till the 30th of April, when he left for Paris, where he arrived on the 4th of May. On the 10th, he left that city for Madrid, viâ Toulouse; and when he arrived at the Spanish capital, Ferdinand, restored to the throne of his ancestors, confirmed all the honours which the provisional government had granted to the hero, and added to them that of captain-general of Spain. On the 23rd of June he landed in England, and soon after took his seat in the House of Lords as duke of Wellington, having been raised to the highest rank in the peerage.

We have not mentioned Joseph since he was superseded by Soult, after the battle of Vittoria. As soon as the marshal reached headquarters, Joseph retired, first to the Château de Payanne, and afterwards to Mortefontaine, where he laid down both his regal and military rank, and enjoyed greater tranquillity than he had known for many years—a tranquillity soon embittered by the disasters which befel his brother. On the 29th of December he wrote to Napoleon, telling him that, as events had brought him back to France, he should be happy to make himself of use. He knew, also, he said, what he owed to Spain; and was willing to surrender his rights to the good of humanity—happy if, by their sacrifice, he could contribute to the peace of Europe. The emperor told him, in reply, that he would be no more king of Spain; but he could come, as a prince of France, and take his place by his throne; or he could retire to his château in the provinces, and live in obscurity—being of no use to his family, or to France: he must decide promptly, and take his part. He did decide, and went to Paris; and, from that moment, Napoleon appears to have restored to him all his affection and confidence.

WE left Napoleon* busily preparing for the Russian war, which Alexander was so anxious to avert, that he had resolved to send M. Nesselrode—then a young man of great promise—on a special mission to Paris, with a view to remove the existing causes for difference and disunion between the two powers. When this was made known to the emperor Napoleon, he evinced an indisposition to receive the envoy; and, at the diplomatic levée on the 1st of January, 1812, he scarcely addressed a word to prince Kourakin, the Russian ambassador. At the same time he was taking measures to send troops secretly to the north, it being necessary, we are told by a French authority, “that he should glide, as it were, as far as the Vistula, gaining not only ground, but also time, without provoking a rupture.” Secretly, however, as he thought his orders were given, the Russian ambassador, through a spy in the war-office, obtained a knowledge of all of them, except those for the march of the troops from Spain, and others for the departure of the army of Italy to the north, which were given in sealed despatches sent to marshals Soult and Suchet, and the prince Eugene. Prince Kourakin transmitted to St. Petersburg the information he had received: and resolved as the Russians were to brave the worst, and not to submit to any further dictation from France, the certainty that war was imminent, caused great consternation at St. Petersburg. Alexander, however, soon formed his plans, which were—to assemble two considerable armies, one on the Dwina, the other on the Dnieper, with advanced posts on the Niemen. These armies were to retreat on the approach of the French, only fighting when the latter were exhausted by hunger or fatigue. A third army, of 40,000 men, was to observe Austria, and to be united to that of the Danube; and the Russian war minister, general Barclay de Tolly, calculated, that, with the reserve, there would be 400,000 men in arms for the defence of the empire. The emperor also resolved not to make a single offensive movement; but to place Napoleon completely in the wrong, by compelling him, if he would have war, to take the initiative; and he refused offers of alliance from England and Sweden, though he manifested the utmost willingness to keep on friendly terms with both. The idea of Nesselrode's mission to Paris was of course abandoned upon receipt of prince Kourakin's information.

Napoleon, besides giving orders, secret, as he supposed, for the march of various corps to the line on the Vistula, occupied by marshal Davoust, signed, on the 24th of February, a treaty with Prussia, by which, in consequence of his guaranteeing to the king of Prussia the territory he then had, and agreeing to give him an extension of frontier in the event of a favourable issue of the war with Russia, the king agreed to furnish 20,000 Prussian troops, under a Prussian general, but bound to obey the orders of France; and to pay 48,000,000 francs as the remainder of his war contribution; of which sum, 26,000,000 francs were to be paid in bills; 8,000,000 francs in silver, at the conclusion of the war; and, for the remaining 14,000,000 francs, he was to furnish immediately, 15,000 horses, 44,000 cattle, and a quantity of wheat, oats, and forage, according to a stipulated price. The emperor also insisted that Austria should enter into an alliance with him; but he consented, at the express wish of his ally, that it should remain secret. It was signed on the 16th of March; and, by its conditions, the two powers agreed reciprocally to guarantee each other's territories; and Austria was to furnish a corps of 30,000 men, under prince Schwartzemberg, to be ready on the 15th of May. Overtures were shortly after made to the United States of America, Napoleon wishing to draw the government of Washington into a more decisive manifestation against England; and to Sweden, at the instance of the wife of Bernadotte, who was in Paris, and intimated that the misunderstanding between the two countries was owing to M. Alquier's (the Swedish ambassador) want of address. Whilst these steps were taking, in order further to mislead Russia, M. de Lauriston was instructed to keep up an understanding at St. Petersburg; to ascribe the movement of troops solely to a desire to prevent the Russians from appropriating the rich granaries of Poland and Old Prussia; positively to deny the march of the army of Italy, except in the case of a few Tuscan and Piedmontese conscripts, who were about to rejoin their corps in Germany; and when it was impossible any longer to deny the concentration of the French army on the Oder, he was to intimate that it did not necessarily imply war; to hint at the possibility of an armed negotiation, if Russia wished; and to offer an interview between the two emperors on the Vistula. "Finally"—we copy from M. Thiers, who had all the documents under his inspection—"to prevent premature hostilities, M. de Lauriston was authorised to engage that the French armies should pause on the banks of the Vistula; but to do this only with the appearance of a negotiator so anxious for peace, that he exceeded his instructions. And, should all the artifices fail of their intended effect, M. Lauriston was to declare immediate war, demand his passports, and compel the representatives of the allied courts also to demand theirs." The emperor even went further than this. A Russian diplomatist, M. Czernicheff, was at Paris; and this person, continues M. Thiers, was requested to return to St. Petersburg, by Napoleon, to make to Alexander "an earnest declaration of his pacific intentions;" to inform the czar "that he desired only the fulfilment of the treaty of Tilsit, and was perfectly ready to substitute negotiation for war." The historian has not one word of condemnation to offer of this artfully-planned, and probably unparalleled, attempt to deceive; although he also tells us, that, on the same day that M. de Czernicheff received his pacific communication, M. de Bassano addressed a fresh despatch to M. de Lauriston; in which he informed that minister, that "Napoleon was as little desirous of an interview with Alexander, as he was of any negotiation, save that which might be conducted by the 450,000 men whom he had set in motion, and whose march would probably induce the Russian cabinet to return to the system established at Tilsit, and would replace Russia in the state of inferiority in which she was before that treaty was concluded."

Napoleon had calculated that his troops would not be able to commence the war till the middle of June; and till that time, therefore, he was most desirous that the outward relations of amity with Russia should be kept up; and that Alexander should not take any steps likely to thwart his plans, which were, to cross the Niemen, and penetrate into Russia before any effectual resistance could be made. But Alexander, in consequence of his knowledge of the real meaning of the movements of the French troops, was not to be deceived; and although he still resolved not to take the initiative in the war, he opened negotiations with England; and —thinking it advisable to accept the offers of Bernadotte, which he had before rejected—on the 5th of April he concluded a treaty with Sweden, by which it was agreed that the czar should retain possession of Finland, and that Sweden should take possession of Norway; to enable her to do which, she was to assemble an army of 30,000 men; and Russia was to lend her one of 20,000. Norway occupied, the Swedish army was to take the French in the rear, as they advanced into Russia. Denmark was to be informed of this arrangement, and an equivalent offered her in Germany; and, if she refused her consent, war was to be declared against that power. This treaty was kept secret at the time; and it reflected no credit on Bernadotte. He wanted to get possession of Norway, and cared not, as afterwards appeared, whether it was through France or Russia that he obtained it. Soon after the treaty was signed, on the 21st of April, Alexander set out for Wilna, that he might be with his troops. M. de Lauriston, when it was announced at St. Petersburg that the emperor intended to go to Wilna, sent a courier to inform Napoleon, who instructed him to apply for leave to accompany the Russian court. He went further in his duplicity. He sent M. de Narbonne to Wilna, as a special envoy, to bear his compliments to the czar; and whilst he was to avoid all discussions foreign to his mission, he was instructed to "express a desire and even a hope, that an armed negotiation between the two sovereigns on the Niemen, would not only put an end to the existing complications, but renew the alliance between them." After hearing of the fall of Badajoz, Napoleon also offered to treat with England. He proposed to restore Sicily to the house of Bourbon, Portugal to that of Braganza, and Spain to Ferdinand VII. "France," he said, in his communication to the British government, "shall renounce all idea of extending her dominion beyond the Pyrenees. The present dynasty shall be declared independent, and Spain shall be governed by a national constitution of her cortes." Not believing in the sincerity of the overture, England would not entertain it, especially as no definite reply was given to a question put by lord Castlereagh, then secretary of state for foreign affairs—whether, by "the present dynasty" of Spain, was meant that of Joseph? Soon after, in consequence of the arrest of one of his servants, who was alleged to be engaged in a conspiracy, prince Kourakin demanded his passports; but the duke de Bassano persuaded him to recall the demand; and M. de Lauriston was instructed to remonstrate at Wilna with the emperor, upon this "menacing act" of his ambassador.

After his arrival at Wilna, Alexander made a last effort, in reply to the messages received by MM. Czernicheff and De Narbonne, to come to a definite understanding with Napoleon; and he sent instructions to the prince Kourakin for that purpose. A note addressed to the latter by the duke of Bassano, afforded the Russian ambassador an opportunity of stating the terms proposed by his imperial master. They were, that, in order to establish a neutral country between France and Russia, Prussia should be released from all engagements which bound her to act against the latter; and that the emperor should enter into a formal engagement to evacuate Prussia, and give up the strong places he held there; to diminish the garrison of Dantzic, to evacuate Swedish Pomerania, and to negotiate a treaty with Sweden. If these terms were agreed to, then the czar was willing to meet the emperor, with a view to a modification of the tariff of 1810, to the obtaining an equivalent for the duchy of Oldenburg, and for the introduction of the licensing system into Russia. This note was sent to the duke of Bassano on the 30th of April; and up to the 7th of May prince Kourakin pressed for an answer, but none was given him.

Napoleon, by that period, had brought his preparations into a sufficient state of forwardness, and he resolved to leave Paris for the north. At that time there was great discontent throughout the country, partly arising from the distress which prevailed, and partly from the burthens under which the people groaned, and which they attributed to the expensive and unnecessary wars in which the emperor's "mad ambition" prompted him to indulge. Murmurs, both loud and deep, were heard in Paris, and in every town in France, against the conscription, and the levy of the national guard, which the senate had ordered to be made, by a decree of the 13th of March, to the extent of 120,000 men. The carrying out that decree occasioned, not only complaints, but absolute riots in some towns. The taxes were also found to press heavily on the resources of the people, notwithstanding the sums raised by the issue of licenses to deal in the produce of the British colonies, the contributions drawn from foreign countries, and other extra resources. This pressure of the public burdens, and the other evils arising from the acts of the government, were greatly increased by a frightful drought which prevailed, and destroyed the crops of cereals, upon which the people mainly depended for subsistence. The price of wheat was nearly £5 per quarter, an immense price for France; and the emperor, before he left Paris, found it necessary to issue decrees, empowering the prefects to fix tariffs for the sale of wheat; and to compel farmers and others, holding that grain, to bring it to market. If these measures did something to allay popular discontent, they increased it amongst the agriculturists and corn-dealers.

However, the time had arrived when Napoleon felt it was imperative that he should depart for the army; and, on the 9th of May, he set out en route to the north, having placed the arch-chancellor, Cambacérès, at the head of the government; ordered the pope to be removed to Fontainebleau, lest he should make his escape, or be carried off from Savona; and organised several hundreds of the imperial guard, who were too old for active service, into a body-guard, for the protection of the empress and the imperial prince. The former, however, accompanied him to Dresden, where he arrived on the 16th. There he received his allies and tributary princes, and formed his plans for carrying his arms from the Vistula to the Niemen, between the 1st and 15th of June—resolving to proceed himself to that river, when he left Dresden, by Posen, Thorn, Dantzic, and Königsberg. Napoleon had collected an enormous army, which was, when he was at Dresden, nearly all concentrated on the Vistula. It was divided into eight corps, comprising about 340,000 men. Of these corps, the 4th was composed of the Italian army; the 5th of Poles; the 8th, in two divisions, of Bavarians and Germans. Besides the above corps, which were to pass the Niemen, a 9th was collecting, at the head of which, marshal Victor, who had been recalled from Spain, was to be placed. It consisted, when all the troops had joined, of 39,000 men, and was appointed to guard Germany from the Elbe to the Oder. There were, also, in detached troops, at Stettin, Cüstrin, Glogau, and Erfurth, 10,000 men; an immense cavalry depôt at Hanover; a reserve corps, under marshal Augereau, of 37,000 men; a division of 5,000, furnished by the smaller German princes; 10,000 men promised by Denmark; detachments scattered through various small posts, amounting to at least 12,000; and the men engaged in the services called for by the continental blockade, estimated at 40,000: making a total of about 490,000 troops of all arms. Besides these corps, there were, attached to the army of the Niemen, six pontoon trains; a corps of engineers; a great body of sappers, miners, pontonniers, and other workmen; with 18,000 men, who conducted the baggage train. In addition, Austria and Prussia promised to furnish, between them, from 45,000 to 50,000 men.

Napoleon left Dresden on the 29th of May, and arrived at Thorn on the 2nd of June. He then resolved, that the general movement of the army from the Vistula to the Niemen, should take place on the 6th; and that the advance should be made in the following order:—"The Saxons, under Regnier, the Poles under Poniatowski, and the Westphalians, under king Jerome—the whole under his majesty's command—were to form the right wing, and to march by the towns of Pultusk and Ostrolenka, to Grodno. The Bavarians, and the army of Italy, were to form the centre, under prince Eugene, and, traversing Poland, were to approach the river in the environs of Prenn. The corps of Oudinot, Ney, and Davoust, and the guard, forming the left, and the great body of the army, were to follow the course of the Niemen, from Tilsit to Kowno. The artillery was to bring up the rear; and the emperor calculated, that all would be in a line along the Niemen on the 15th of June. He proposed to allow a rest there for three or four days, and then to commence active operations.

Having given the necessary orders for carrying out these arrangements, Napoleon left Thorn for Dantzic, where he arrived on the 7th; and from thence he proceeded to Königsberg, which he reached on the 12th of June. At the former place he received a communication from Bernadotte, which proved him to be as insincere and untrustworthy as Napoleon. Notwithstanding his treaty of the 5th of April with Russia, the crown-prince of Sweden offered to join his old master if Norway was secured to Sweden, and a subsidy of 20,000,000 francs paid him. Napoleon returned no answer to this communication. "Le misérable!" he exclaimed; "he is untrue to himself, to Sweden, and to his native country:" not seeing, that, however untrue and insincere Bernadotte was, those bad qualities were equally fertile in himself.

At Königsberg, a declaration was drawn up, and soon after published, giving Napoleon's reasons for the war; and M. Lauriston was ordered to demand his passports, but not before the 22nd of June, on which day, or the 23rd, Napoleon expected to cross the Niemen. In this declaration, the blame of the war was laid upon Russia, who, it was alleged, amongst other things, had demanded the evacuation of Prussia, as a preliminary to negotiation, which was a dishonourable condition France could not accede to. The truth was, however, that the evacuation was not demanded as a preliminary to, but as a consequence of, negotiations. Great stress was also laid on prince Kourakin's demanding his passports. "Some plausible pretext," says Thiers, "was needed for the immediate commencement of hostilities, and these were adopted for the want of better."* The plan of the campaign was also arranged at Königsberg. Napoleon's object was, to penetrate by the plains which leave the Dwina on the one side, and the Dnieper on the other, to Moscow. The army being arrived on the Niemen, he therefore determined to take under his own command the corps of Davoust, Oudinot, and Ney, the imperial guard, and two of the four corps of cavalry reserve (the whole amounting to about 200,000 men), and, crossing the river at Kowno, to advance on Wilna. Marshal Macdonald, with 30,000 men, was to cross at Tilsit, take possession of the two banks of the river, and ensure its free navigation for the convoys. Prince Eugene, at the head of 80,000, was to cross on the right, at Prenn; and king Jerome, with 70,000, at Grodno. Before any of the corps crossed the river, the following address was read to them:—

"Soldiers! The second Polish war has commenced. The first ended at Friedland and at Tilsit! At Tilsit, Russia swore an eternal alliance with France, and war against England. She now violates her oaths, and refuses any explanation of her strange conduct. Russia is constrained by a fatality; she is about to meet her fate. Does she suppose that we are degenerate?—that we are no longer the soldiers of Austerlitz? She offered us the choice of war or dishonour, and we made our choice without hesitation. Let us march, then; let us pass the Niemen—let us carry the war into her own territory. The second Polish war shall bring glory to the French arms; and when we conclude peace, it shall be a peace which shall destroy the ill-omened influence which Russia has exercised on the affairs of Europe during the last fifty years."

It was on the 23rd of June that Napoleon, having issued his orders to Jerome, Eugene, and Macdonald, debouched from the forest of Wilkowitz with his large army, and led them about a league and a-half above Kowno, to a spot where general Haxo had just discovered great facilities for crossing the river. Three bridges were thrown from one side to the other that night, and, before dawn, the light cavalry were on the opposite bank. The next day the infantry was formed in three columns, and crossed in fine order. They are described—when descending from the heights of the left bank, and pouring down in long files upon three points—as "resembling three irresistible torrents, filling with their waters the plain into which they poured." A few Polish lancers, who heedlessly dashed into the stream—twenty or

* In the Mémoires of his own reign, dictated at St. Helena, by Napoleon, to the generals who shared his captivity, he declared, that the Russian war was undertaken from the consideration, that the French empire, which he had created by so many victories, would certainly be dismembered at his death, and the sceptre of Europe would pass into the hands of a czar, unless he drove the Russians back beyond the Borysthènes, and raised up the throne of Poland, the natural barrier of the empire. The war became a necessary consequence after the violations of the treaty of Tilsit by the emperor Alexander; but it was the before-mentioned consideration which induced him (Napoleon) to commence it. Austria, Prussia, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy then marched under the French eagles; and, he asked, was it not natural he should think of consolidating the vast empire he had raised, but on the summit of which Russia would bear with the whole weight of her power, so long as she was able to send her numerous armies, at pleasure, on the Oder? This, he asserted, was the entire secret of that war, with which no personal feelings were mixed up.

thirty in number—were drowned; but that was the only mischance; and Napoleon, his division being safe on the opposite shore of the river to that on which it stood in the morning, ordered marshal Davoust to place an advanced guard on the route to Wilna; and went himself to sleep at Kowno.

Napoleon did not give his troops the rest he at first anticipated; but, Wilna being their ultimate destination, Macdonald was ordered to advance upon Rosiena, in order to cover the navigation of the Niemen, with orders, if the Russians fell back upon the Dwina, to penetrate into Courland. Marshals Ney and Oudinot were ordered to cross the Wilia—a river which, falling into the Niemen at Kowno, flows past Wilna—and advance to that town; whilst Murat and Davoust, with their infantry and cavalry, were dispatched on the high road to Wilna, by Riconti, which place they reached on the 27th of June. Prince Eugene and king Jerome were not so forward as the corps under Napoleon and Macdonald. They did not arrive at the Niemen and commence its passage till the 28th of June—a few days after Schwartzenberg, with the Austrian auxiliary, crossed the Bug at Moguil-nica. Napoleon did not leave Kowno with his troops. He remained a few days to organise the establishment of hospitals and magazines, for the throwing up effective defensive works near the town, and for carrying bridges across the Wilia, to keep open the communications. He then followed the army to Wilna.

Before Napoleon arrived at the Niemen, the main Russian army—with Alexander nominally at its head, but whose movements were really directed by general Barclay de Tolly, a brave, intelligent officer, the scion of an old Scotch family, settled in Courland—was stationed in a semicircle round Wilna, the capital of Russian Poland, and formerly the capital of Lithuania. It stands near the confluence of the Vilička and the Wilia; in 54° 41' N. lat., 25° 18' E. long., and 58 miles to the E.S.E. of Kowno, with which it communicates by the Wilia. This army was divided into six corps. One (the 1st), under Wittgenstein, formed the extreme right at Rosiena; the 5th, under count Schouvaloff, was at Olkeniki; and the 6th, under general Doctoroff, at Lida, formed the extreme left; the 2nd, under general Bagawouth; the 3rd (the Russian guard) and the 4th, under general Tonizkoff, formed the centre of the army. This army, by a chain of Cossack posts, was connected with that of prince Bagrathion, at Grodno, the capital of the province of that name, situated on a hill on the right bank of the Niemen, 90 miles S.S.W. of Wilna. Both these armies were well appointed, and composed of effective, able men; but the two did not amount to more than 130,000 in number.

We have already stated, that Alexander's plan was to retreat as the French advanced; and the route which it was determined to take from Wilna, was adopted by the advice of general Pfuhl, a Prussian, described as being "more of a savant than a military man." His plan was, to fall back on the transverse line of the Dwina and the Dnieper; an intrenched camp having been constructed at Drissa, on the former river. When the news arrived at Wilna that the French were crossing the Niemen, Alexander was attending a ball, given by general Benningsen at his country-house, in the neighbourhood of the capital. He put the despatches in his pocket; but the same night, on his return to Wilna, he sent M. de Balachoff, one of his aides-de-camp, with a message to Napoleon, which, if it did not produce peace—and he did not expect that result—would put the invader further in the wrong. In this message, after stating that the demand of his passports by prince Kourakin was a very insufficient cause of war, as it was entirely unauthorised by him—and denying that the evacuation of Prussia had been demanded, as a preliminary, before negotiations could commence—the czar offered, if the French did not pass the Niemen, to enter immediately into negotiations, on the basis of previous communications. The messenger dispatched, he penned a proclamation to his army, which was distributed early the next day. Having mentioned the hope he had entertained of preserving peace, notwithstanding the hostile disposition shown by the French emperor—the conciliatory measures he adopted, and their failure—he said—"Seeing, therefore, that nothing can induce the French emperor to remain at peace, all that is left for us is, to invoke the succour of the Most High, and oppose our forces to the enemy. I need not, to excite their valour, remind the officers and soldiers of their duty; for the blood of the brave Slavonians flows in their veins. Soldiers! you defend your religion, your country, and your liberty. I am with you: God is against the aggressor." Alexander also wrote a letter to the governor of St. Petersburg, informing him that the war had commenced; expressing his confidence in the zeal of his people and the bravery of his soldiers; and declaring that, as the defence of the country and of the national honour had compelled him to draw the sword, he would not return it to the scabbard as long as a single enemy remained on the Russian territory.

Barclay de Tolly, as soon as it was known that the enemy had passed the Niemen, ordered his army to fall back in the direction of the camp at Drissa. He himself remained with the rear-guard, with which he determined, should the French come up, to dispute the ground inch by inch. An order was sent, at the same time, to prince Bagrathion, to fall back on the Dnieper, keeping the course of the Minsk, in order to render a junction with the main army easy; and the Cossacks, who had bivouacked between the armies, were to form a flying corps, under the hetman Platoff, and to harass the flank and rear of the invaders, whilst still connecting the two armies of De Tolly and Bagrathion.

Those invaders found their difficulties commence on their first march, from Kowno to Wilna. The men outstripped the provision waggons, and could get nothing to eat but what they obtained by plunder; and they committed great excesses. Murat's and Davoust's division was in advance; and was encountered, after it left Riconti, on the 28th of June, by Alexander's messenger, M. de Balachoff, who communicated his mission to those officers. He was received with great courtesy by the former, very coldly by the latter; and a courier having been dispatched to Napoleon with an account of his arrival, orders were received, that he should be detained till the French entered Wilna, when the emperor promised to grant him an interview. The receipt of the Russian message caused no delay in the march; and in the afternoon of the 28th, a corps of Murat's cavalry, under general Bruyère, dashed into the Polish capital, and were soon followed by that division of the army. A detachment of Russian infantry, cavalry, and artillery, had remained after the main army left. They received the first shock of Bruyère's corps, and then, having previously set fire to the magazines of stores and ammunition in the town, they crossed the Wilia, destroying the bridges as soon as they reached the opposite bank.

Up to this time the weather had been favourable; suddenly, however, in the evening of the 28th of June, before all the army of Davoust had entered Wilna, and when not more than half that of Italy had crossed the Niemen, they had some terrible symptoms of the "war of elements" which they would have to encounter in that climate. The sky became enveloped in thick clouds; the country was swept by heavy gales; the atmosphere, on the 29th of June, and the 1st and 2nd of July, was intensely cold: the scene which presented itself is described as being "frightful;" and to those strangers it no doubt was. The corps of marshal Ney and Oudinot appear to have suffered the least: in Davoust's army, numbers died from dysentery, brought on by having to sleep in the mud; but the army of Italy had to sustain the most fearful visitations. The troops were on both sides of the Niemen; and those on the left bank had, on the 29th of June, pitched their tents for the night, as they were not to penetrate into the interior till all had crossed. Before night came on, a dreadful storm of hail and rain, accompanied by a violent wind, and rendered more fearful by repeated flashes of lightning, swept across the country, overturning the tents, and creating a perfect panic amongst the troops. The soldiers could get no shelter; they could not lie down on the inundated soil; and it is difficult to imagine what they had to endure for forty-eight hours. Many men died; but the storm was particularly destructive to the horses, of which thousands were destroyed; and the road was covered with their dead bodies, and with waggons abandoned in consequence of their loss. The army at length completed the passage of the river, and advanced upon Nowoi-Troki; but there were many deserters: so there were from the army under Davoust; and not less than from 25,000 to 35,000 Bavarians, Italians, Würtembergers, Spanish and French, left their colours, and pillaged alike the abandoned waggons and the castles of the nobles of Poland, which stood in their route.

Oudinot's corps was the first that came into action. That corps and Ney's were somewhat in advance of the rest of the army; and, when they crossed the Wilia, in the neighbourhood of Wilna, the latter followed in the route which they understood the corps of Bagawouth had taken; the former proceeding to Janow. On the road from that place to Wilkomir, the French came up with Wittgenstein's division, and an action took place, in which the Russians were defeated with the loss of 400 men. The fighting was going on while Davoust's and Murat's division was entering Wilna. Napoleon arrived at that town on the 29th of June, and his arrival was the signal for general enthusiasm amongst the Poles. The diet assembled at Warsaw declared the re-establishment of the kingdom of Poland; called upon all Poles in the Russian army to quit the ranks of their country's enemy; and sent an address to Napoleon, in which they exulted, that "the day of their restoration was arrived—that the land of the Jagellons and the Sobieskis was to resume all its glory." Napoleon's reply somewhat damped their ardour. He approved of their efforts; authorised their continuance; and hoped that Lithuania, Samogitia, Volhynia, Podolia, and the Ukraine, would imitate the grand-duchy of Warsaw. But, he added, "I have guaranteed the integrity of the Austrian dominions, and can sanction no movement which can endanger the peaceable possession of her Polish provinces." He, however, gave to Lithuania a distinct and independent government, under a Saxon officer, count Hogendorp. It was divided into four secondary governments—viz., Wilna, Grodno, Minsk, and Bialystok; over each of which was placed a commission of three members, with an intendant—all subordinate to the governor-general. These commissions were charged with the levying of troops, the raising of taxes, and the maintenance of order throughout the province. The emperor detained M. de Balachoff at Wilna while he made these arrangements; and, when they were concluded, he gave the envoy the promised interview. He received him courteously, but rejected his propositions. Indeed, remarks Thiers, "neither Alexander nor Napoleon could now spare time for negotiations—the questions between them had arrived at that state, in which they could only be resolved by the sword." The interview between the emperor and the envoy was prolonged; and the latter, having partaken of the imperial hospitality, left Wilna.

Before we follow Napoleon and his devoted troops in that enterprise which ended so disastrously, we will, from the best authority—the papers in the war-office at Paris, giving the state of the troops at the various "morning calls"—place before our readers the number of men who, at various points, entered Russia between the 23rd of June, when the 1st division, under Napoleon, crossed the Niemen, and the 3rd of July, when the corps of prince Eugene and king Jerome were all on its right bank.* The different divisions are given as follows:—

	Infantry.	Cavalry.	Horses.†
Imperial Guard	41,094	6,279	16,322
1st Corps—Davoust	68,627	3,424	11,417
3rd " Ney	35,755	3,587	8,039
4th " Eugene	42,430	2,368	10,057
5th " Poniatowski	32,159	4,152	9,438
8th " Vandamme	15,885	2,050	3,477
1st " of Cavalry—Nansouty	—	12,077	13,014
2nd " " Montbrun	—	10,436	11,125
3rd " " Grouchy	—	9,676	10,451

General Staff—Berthier	3,075	908	1,748
Total	239,025	62,951	103,854

Thus the total number of men that crossed the Niemen was 301,976; and they had with them about 1,000 pieces of cannon, and an enormous quantity of baggage.

Napoleon calculated that the Russians would concentrate at the camp at Drissa, of the existence of which he was well aware. He formed his plans accordingly. They were—to send Davoust, with a part of his division, and king Jerome, against Bagrathion; whilst the remainder of Davoust's troops, those of prince Eugene, and Murat's cavalry, advanced on Drissa, taking the intrenched camp on both flanks; thus cutting off the routes to St. Petersburg and Moscow, surrounding the Russian position, and leaving the occupants no option, but to surrender. Possibly, had the Russians remained at Drissa, this might have been the result; and had Jerome properly supported Davoust, Bagrathion's army must have suffered severely. But so slow were the movements of the king of Westphalia, that the Russian general was enabled to pursue his route nearly unmolested. His rear-guard only came in contact with the French, who were beaten on two successive days: and he arrived at Bobrinsk, on the Beresina, on the 8th of July. On that day Davoust was at Minsk; and, shortly after, Jerome, being ordered by Napoleon to put himself under the marshal's orders, quitted the army, rather than submit to what he considered an indignity. Davoust then pushed on to Mohilow, where Bagrathion was also hastening. The French reached the town first, and, strongly intrenching themselves in the neighbourhood, awaited the arrival of the Russians. They were about 30,000 in number, and were attacked, on the 23rd of July, by 20,000 Russians, under general Raefskoi. The French occupied a strong position in the defiles of a forest, between Saltanowka bridge and Fatowa mill, on the banks of the Mischowska, and were defended by earthworks, and a considerable number of guns. The Russians could make no impression upon them, and were obliged to retreat, after losing about 3,000 men: the French loss was quite as great; but, in their accounts, they say they had only 28,000 men opposed to 60,000. The day after the battle, Bagrathion was joined by a large body of Cossacks, under the hetman Platoff: he did not, however, renew his attack on the French. Continuing his retreat by Nov-Bichow (a circuitous route), he crossed the Dnieper, and joined the main army at Smolensko, on the 3rd of August.

That army reached the camp at Drissa without any interruption. The camp had been prepared with the utmost care. It was defended by ten redoubts, and 354 pieces of cannon, and could accommodate 100,000 men. But when it was taken possession of, it was found, that should an assault of the French be successful, there were so many impediments to a retreat, that it was considered unadvisable to remain there. On the 14th of July, therefore, Barclay de Tolly began to retire by the banks of the Dwina, to Witepsk. The troops reached Polotsk on the 16th; and there Alexander, by the advice of his generals, left the army, and proceeded to Moscow, where he was received with the most loyal affection. The nobles at once voted a levy of one man in ten from their serfs; and the commercial body furnished 24,000 men, with money enough to support them. From Moscow, Alexander went to St. Petersburg, where he found the old Russian nobles very indignant against Barclay de Tolly. The retreat of the army vexed and annoyed them; and they loudly expressed their opinion, that a Russian general would have led the troops to victory.

Napoleon left Wilna on the 16th of July, having been gratified, before his departure, by the receipt of intelligence, that the United States had declared war against Great Britain. He had nearly 200,000 men with him; and, on arriving at Drissa, was surprised to find the camp deserted. Remaining a few days at Glubokoe, by which the Russians gained time that was very precious to them, he then took the road to Witepsk, reaching the Dwina on the 24th of July. The Russian head-quarters had been established at Witepsk the previous day; and when the French advanced guard arrived at Ostrowno on the 25th, it was found that the Russian general had assembled all his forces, about 80,000 in number, in the neighbourhood of the former city; the advanced guard, of 12,000 men, being strongly posted on the wooded heights, near Ostrowno. On the 25th, 26th, and 27th, there was hard fighting between detached corps of both armies, in which the Russians were beaten; losing nearly 4,000 men killed and wounded, from 700 to 800 prisoners, and eight pieces of cannon. Notwithstanding the inferiority of his force, Barclay de Tolly had resolved to give battle on the 28th; but, in the afternoon of the 27th, he received the intelligence of Bagrathion's change of route, in consequence of the check at Mohilow; and that his intention was to join the main army at Smolensko. Barclay de Tolly resolved, therefore, to retire in the night; and so well was the movement effected, that not a gun, a baggage waggon, or a straggler was left behind; and when the French, the next morning, discovered that the camp was evacuated, they found it impossible, for some time, to tell whether the enemy had taken the road to St. Petersburg or Moscow, so well had De Tolly masked his movements. At length the rear-guard was seen retiring, in excellent order, across the plain towards Smolensko. It was attacked by the French chasseurs, who were driven back, and many killed.

The French were now suffering as much from the heat, as they subsequently did from the cold; and they were also short of food. They occupied Witepsk on the 28th of July, and the emperor would have immediately advanced on Smolensko; but the march had scarcely commenced, when men and horses fell exhausted, the want of nourishment causing both to be overpowered by the heat. The march was therefore arrested; a few days' repose resolved upon; and the army returned to Witepsk, where the emperor established himself in the palace of the governor. He immediately employed his cavalry to scour the neighbourhood, and get provisions for themselves and the rest of the army; ordered a reserve of food for eight or ten days to be collected; and, resolving to make Orcha and Witepsk his points d'appui on the Dwina and the Dnieper, he directed hospitals and magazines to be established at both those places. A detailed inspection of his army, made at this time, established the fact, that his loss of men had been very great.

All the French troops did not remain inactive at Witepsk. De Tolly, on his route to Smolensko, detached Wittgenstein, with 25,000 men, to take up a position on the Dwina, so as to cover the road to St. Petersburg. Oudinot, with 27,000, was sent to oppose him; and, on the 30th of July, a severe action took place at the village of Jakoubowo, in which the Russians, at first defeated, were ultimately victorious, Oudinot losing 4,000 men. Joined, shortly after, by St. Cyr and 12,000 Bavarians, Oudinot resumed offensive operations, and Alexander ordered Wittgenstein to be reinforced by 16,000 men from Finland, as he considered it of the first importance that the road to the capital should be protected. In another direction, Macdonald entered Courland, took Mitau, and invested Riga with Prussian troops. The Austrians, under Schwartzenberg, had hitherto been idle. They were now ordered to head-quarters, as the emperor Francis wished them either to be independent, or to be commanded by Napoleon himself, who did not feel it safe to entrust his rear solely to an Austrian corps.

At Witepsk, Napoleon, almost for the first time, assembled his generals together in a council of war; and the question, whether the army should winter there, or advance? was seriously discussed. The majority—Berthier, Lobau, Caulaincourt, Duroc, and Daru—were for establishing winter quarters at that town; Murat and Davoust were for going forward. This was Napoleon's own wish, and he resolved to march on Smolensko, and from thence to Moscow. Whilst at Witepsk, the emperor learnt that peace had been concluded at Bucharest between Russia and Turkey; that by a convention with England, that power agreed to pay the czar a subsidy of £800,000; and Alexander undertook, if the successes of the French endangered his fleet, to send it to England for security. At Witepsk, Napoleon was also first informed of the treaty, concluded in the previous April, between Russia and Sweden. Though these events were all against him, they did not cause him to falter in his resolution: Moscow was still the goal of his ambition.

At the same time that Napoleon resolved to advance on Smolensko, the Russians—the armies of Barclay de Tolly and Bagrathion having formed a junction—emboldened by the scattered position of the French, resolved to take offensive operations. They commenced on the 7th of August, by advancing, in three columns, on the French positions. At Inkowa, Platoff, with his Cossacks, defeated the advanced guard of Murat's cavalry, under Sebastiani, taking 500 prisoners. This appears to have been the first warning Napoleon received of their approach. He instantly sent couriers to all his commanders, ordering them to concentrate round his head-quarters; and on the 13th he commenced his march from Witepsk, crossing the Dnieper by three pontoon bridges, with a view to turn the left of the enemy. Ney and Murat, with the leading column, almost as soon as they landed, came up with a Russian corps of 6,000 foot and 1,200 horse, under general Newerofskoi, which was falling back on Smolensko. This corps was attacked by 18,000 French cavalry, and it showed how the Russians could fight. Formed into two hollow squares at first, and as the numbers decreased, into one, they slowly retreated, though charged during the day at least forty times, and reached Kortinia, with the loss of 1,200 killed and wounded, and five pieces of cannon. The next day a junction was formed with general Raefskoi, and the united body reached Smolensko, where, on the 15th of August, the French army also arrived; the Russian main army, under Barclay de Tolly and Bagrathion, being then at Krasnoi, twenty-eight miles distant.

Smolensko is a venerable old city, of about 20,000 inhabitants, built on two hills, between which a narrow channel of the Dnieper runs, the communication being kept up by two bridges across the stream. It was defended by an old wall, thirty-five feet high, and eighteen feet thick; in which were thirty lofty towers; and in front was a shallow dry ditch, a covered way, and a glacis. Three gates gave access to the town, which were well protected, and a great many cannon were mounted on the walls. On the 16th of September, early in the morning, Ney's corps, by order of the emperor, attacked the principal tower, called the citadel, but was repulsed by Raefskoi, with considerable loss. The French were now rapidly collecting on one side of the town, while the Russian main army was advancing from Krasnoi on the other. Anxiously was the arrival of the latter expected by the gallant little band withinside the town: and when it reached the gates, and began to defile into Smolensko, great was the joy of the beleaguered troops and inhabitants. The defenders of Smolensko now numbered nearly 140,000 men; the assailants amounted to 150,000.

When Barclay de Tolly ascertained the amount of the force which was collected in front of Smolensko, he again, in opposition to the advice of Bagrathion and the principal officers, resolved not to hazard a general battle; and placing a strong rear-guard in Smolensko, at 4 A.M. on the 17th of August the troops began to defile out of the city, taking the road to Moscow. Bagrathion commanded the retiring force; De Tolly, with the corps of Doctoroff and Bagawouth, remained at Smolensko. Napoleon, when he saw the army was retreating, and unable to find a ford by which he could cross the river and reach them, ordered an attack to be made on the town. It commenced at 2 P.M., and the French, under Ney, Davoust, and Lobau, soon established themselves in the suburbs. But though about 150 cannon were emitting their showers of ball upon the ramparts, no impression was made upon them; and the assailants were unable to drive the defenders from the gates. Evening came, and interrupted the bombardment; when the darkness of night was dispersed by the flames from the burning houses in the city. Before the firing had ceased, the houses near the ramparts had been ignited by the shells of the besiegers; and the greater part of the edifices in the city being of wood, the flames spread rapidly. During the night, the garrison and many of the inhabitants retired; and the French, the next day, took possession of a ruined city, from which everything living appeared to have fled; all the wounded having been withdrawn, the magazines destroyed, and the bridges over the Dnieper broken down. On both sides a number of men—several thousand on each—had been sacrificed in the attack and defence of the previous day.

The Russians, under Bagrathion, took the road to Moscow; the corps which left Smolensko, under De Tolly, started along that to St. Petersburg, finding that the former was commanded by the French artillery; and, on the 18th of August, by a circular flank march, succeeded in joining Bagrathion. On the 19th, bridges being re-established across the Dnieper, Ney passed over and advanced, on the Moscow road, as far as Valtelina, where De Tolly had left a rear-guard of 5,000 men, to cover his movement from the St. Petersburg road. They were strongly posted on the side of a ravine—a little stream, called the Kolodnia, flowing in their front. Attacked by 25,000 French troops, the Russian general, Tonizkoff, who commanded, was compelled to retire. He was soon reinforced by fresh troops, and eight pieces of heavy artillery; Ney was also joined by general Gudin, with 12,000 men: thus, though the Russian force was raised to 25,000, the French were greatly superior in strength. The former, however, successfully defended their position, but with the loss of 6,000 men. The French lost 8,000, general Gudin being amongst the killed. The Russian general was taken prisoner during the heat of the battle, but his men stuck to their posts—thus enabling De Tolly to join Bagrathion; and all took the road to Moscow.

Napoleon had taken Smolensko, and advanced 400 miles from Kowno; but he was surrounded with difficulties. He wanted food for the able-bodied—hospitals and medicines for the wounded and the sick: Wilna and Witepsk are described as being little better than charnel-houses; and the convents at Smolensko—which, being built of stone, had escaped the flames—were filled with his disabled men, who were dying faster than they could be buried. He was still eighty leagues—about 250 miles—from Moscow; yet, though even now Murat was in favour of not venturing further into a country where they had suffered so much, Napoleon determined to advance. He confessed that the condition of the army was frightful, and rendered peace necessary; but that, he said, could only be obtained at Moscow. There he was determined to proceed—concluding that the Russians would defend the city, and, as a matter of course, be beaten; and that he should be enabled to dictate his own terms of peace from the palace of the Russian emperor, within the walls of the ancient capital of his empire. News that he received from the corps on his flanks, confirmed him in his resolution.—Early in July, Bagrathion had detached general Tormazoff, with about 30,000 men, to threaten the French right; and he marched to the Upper Bug, defeating a Saxon detachment, under Regnier, at Kobrin, on the 27th, with the loss of 2,000 killed and wounded. This alarmed the Poles at Warsaw, many of whom fled; and the abbé de Pradt wrote earnestly to Napoleon, soliciting reinforcements. Schwartzberg was ordered to support Regnier; and on the 12th of August, the Austrians and Saxons, nearly 40,000 in number, attacked and defeated the Russians, who had to retire behind the Styr, with the loss of 4,000 men and some guns. This preserved the duchy of Warsaw from invasion, and Napoleon's right from attack.—On the left, Oudinot, reinforced, as already stated, by the Bavarians—reduced by fatigue, sickness, and want of food, from 30,000 to 12,000 men, without having been in action—had, since his defeat, again sought the enemy, with a view to retrieve his disaster. On the 12th of August, his advanced guard was attacked by the Russians, under Wittgenstein, and driven back, with the loss of 1,500 men. Oudinot retired to Polotsk, which stands at the confluence of the Dwina and the Polota, and established himself in front of that city. There he was attacked by Wittgenstein on the 17th of August; and that day neither side had any material advantage: but Oudinot was seriously wounded, and St. Cyr had to take the command. The next day the Russians resumed the fight, and at one time the victory seemed in their hands, the French being driven back to the walls of Polotsk. They rallied, however—the fight continued till dark, and then the Russians retired with the loss of 2,000 men and seven guns. Wittgenstein retired to Sewokhino; and St. Cyr sent the Bavarians, under general Wrede, in pursuit. They encountered the rear-guard of the Russians on the 22nd, were defeated, and returned to Polotsk. For the battle of the 18th, the emperor made St. Cyr a marshal: and these successes on his right and left, with the arrival of Victor at the Dwina, somewhat revived the spirits of the troops; which were greatly damped by the fatigue and privations they had to undergo, and the very different result of the campaign, to that of those which, in former years, had been carried on so triumphantly in Italy and Germany.

Napoleon did not resolve to advance on Moscow without well considering his position, and taking measures which, he concluded, if he did not meet with success, would enable him to secure a safe retreat. He made Smolensko the base of his operations, summoning there marshal Victor, with his corps of 30,000 men. He also ordered, that various Polish, Saxon, Westphalian, and Hanseatic regiments, at Wilna, Dantzic, and Königsberg, should be marched to Smolensko and Minsk, for the purpose of providing such garrisons and detachments as might be necessary—his aim being, that Victor's corps should remain intact, to face any Russian troops which might return from Turkey. A division of marshal Augereau's was also ordered from Italy to Dantzic. Thus, when the French army set forward to Moscow, there were 50,000 men between Berlin and Dantzic; strong garrisons at the latter town, Königsberg, Memel, Kowno, Wilna, and Witepsk; marshals Macdonald and St. Cyr, the former with 24,000, the latter with 20,000 men, were posted on the Dwina; prince Schwartzberg was on the Dnieper; and there was a Polish corps at Mohikow, to connect the prince with Victor at Smolensko. With these precautions, the emperor persuaded himself that he was safe; and in order that the communications might not be interrupted, he constructed a line of small citadels, placing in each a hundred infantry, fifteen cavalry, and two pieces of cannon—thus securing the uninterrupted transmission of information and orders.

On the 24th of August the army left Smolensko. The advance was made in three columns, forming an extended line. In the centre was the light cavalry of Davoust and Ney, the cavalry reserve of Nausouty and Montbrun, a considerable force of artillery, the infantry of Davoust and Ney, and the guard. On the right, were prince Poniatowski's corps, and Latour-Maubourg's cavalry; and on the left, prince Eugene and the army of Italy, with Grouchy's horse. The quartier-general brought up the rear, with the parks of artillery, the engineers, and 1,000 waggons, laden with provisions for the guard, amongst whom the emperor did not wish to introduce habits of pillage: also for the general supply of the army, on any day when the troops might be concentrated to engage the enemy in battle. Davoust's corps carried eight days' provisions on their backs; but the other troops had to procure their subsistence as they marched onwards, from the districts through which they passed. The gross number of men on their march to the Russian capital, is estimated at between 145,000 and 150,000 men—all excellent troops. When put in motion, the rumour spread that they were going to Moscow. "To Moscow!" then, cried the soldiers—"To Moscow!" "And they followed Napoleon, as, in olden times, the Macedonian phalanx had followed Alexander to Babylon." They took the route of the retreating Russians, by Dowgobouge and Wiasma, to Gjatsk; finding, as they made their way through the deserted country, that all provisions and stores—everything which could have been made useful to the invaders, had been carried off or destroyed, and all the villages and towns were burnt.

At Gjatsk, where Napoleon arrived on the 1st of September, he learned that Barclay de Tolly had been superseded by Kutusoff in the command of the Russian army. As we have already stated, the Fabian system of the commander-in-chief had disgusted the officers; and it was not much more palatable to the soldiers. After Alexander left the army for Moscow, the generals had frequent discussions; and at last—as we learn from the *Narrative of Events during the Invasion of Russia by Napoleon—they drew up a declaration, not only embodying "the request of the army for a 'new chief,' but a declaration in the name of that army, 'that, if any order came from St. Petersburg, to suspend hostilities and treat the invaders as friends (which was apprehended to be the true motive of the retrograde movements, in deference to the policy of count Romanzoff), such an order would be regarded as one which did not express his majesty's real sentiments and wishes, but had been extracted from his majesty under false representations or external control; and that the army would continue to maintain his pledge, and pursue the contest till the invader was driven beyond the frontier.'" Sir Robert Wilson was the British commissioner at the head-quarters of the Russian army; and, being also an intimate personal friend of the czar, the generals requested that he would be the bearer of the declaration, and place it in the imperial hands. Sir Robert was induced to undertake the not very agreeable task; and he was, at the same time, solicited to inform Alexander, that the dismissal of his minister, Romanzoff, would be very acceptable to the troops. His excellency proceeded to St. Petersburg, where the czar received him courteously; and when he learned the object of his visit, good humouredly styled him "l'ambassadeur des rebelles." His majesty told Sir Robert, that he "was the only person from whom he could or would have received such a communication;" and after some consideration—though he would not dismiss Romanzoff, respecting whom, he said, the army was quite mistaken—he agreed to supersede Barclay de Tolly; and he said to Sir Robert Wilson—"You shall carry back to the army pledges of my determination to continue the war against Napoleon, whilst a Frenchman is in arms this side the frontier."

The Russian generals would have liked to have seen Bagrathion at their head; but the wishes of the Russian nobility, which Alexander felt bound to comply with, were directed to Kutusoff, an officer whose only defect appeared to be his age; as he was in his seventy-fifth year. He was descended from a noble family; connected by marriage with the principal houses of Moscow; had just returned from a fortunate campaign on the Danube, and was a favourite with the soldiers. He joined the army at Gjatsk, where he was received with enthusiasm. He did not immediately arrest the retrograde movement of the army, but continued to retire till he reached Borodino, a village seventy-five miles W.S.W. of Moscow, on the Kolotza. Here he resolved to take up a position, and await the attack of the French. He posted his army with its right on the Moskwa, and its left extending to the little village of Semenowskoi. The centre was at Borodino; and the Kolotza, flowing past the right centre, covered the line as far as that place. The approach to this position was intersected by broken ravines: intrenchments were thrown up on the left, where the line was weakest; a wood, which flanked the right, was strengthened by field-works; two heavy batteries were erected in the centre; a formidable redoubt, on an eminence between the centre and the left, commanded the whole plain beneath; three redoubts were placed on the left, whose fire crossed that of the great redoubts; and on a neighbouring eminence rose another redoubt, commanding the road by which the French must advance. This position had been selected by colonel Toll, the quartermaster-general; and not one more eligible for defence presented itself on the road from Smolensko to Moscow.

The French continued their march from Gjatsk on the 2nd of September. On the 3rd, so inclement had been the weather, and such were the sufferings of the troops, that again urgent representations were made, by Murat and Ney, against any further advance. Napoleon, more moved than usual, replied—"Ah! well, if the weather have not changed by to-morrow, we will halt." The weather did change. The sun, on the 4th of September, shone brightly, and there was a lively drying breeze. "The lot is cast!" said the emperor, as soon as he ascertained the state of the atmosphere; "let us advance!" The army did march; and passed that night at Gridnewa. On the 5th, it renewed its advance towards the plain of Borodino. "On the line," writes the historian, "stood a celebrated abbey—that of Kolotskoi—a great building flanked with towers; the roofs of which, formed of coloured tiles, contrasted vividly with the sombre hues of the surrounding landscape. During many days, the troops had been advancing along the elevated plateaux which separate the waters of the Baltic from those of the Black Sea and the Caspian. On setting out from Gjatsk they began to descend the slopes, from which the Moskwa on the left, and the Protwa on the right, flow by the Oka into the Volga, by the Volga into the Caspian Sea. The landscape seemed to sink towards the horizon, and to be covered with thick forests; whilst a sky, half veiled with the light autumnal clouds, served to increase its sad and savage aspect. All the villages were either burned or deserted, and there remained only a few monks at the abbey of Kolotskoi."

The Kolotza (only a small stream) runs along the plain to Borodino, where it turns to the left. The army marched by the course of this river; and a redoubt, constructed upon a mamelon on its right, was the first point of attack. Murat and Cambray were ordered to carry it. They did so in the evening of the 5th of September, with great loss on both sides. The French say that they had 4,000 or 5,000 men, the Russians 6,000 or 7,000, killed and wounded.

The 6th of September, it is remarked, "by a species of mutual consent, had been allowed to pass by without even the discharge of a musket." The French passed the day in repose, indulging in cheerful discourse, and as cheerful songs. The Russians were on their knees, amidst 1,000 flambeaux, before an image of the Madonna of Smolensko, which, it was reported, had been saved, on the wings of angels, from the conflagration of that unfortunate city, and was now carried by the Greek priests through the bivouacs of the camp of Borodino. Kutusoff accompanied the procession in the midst of his staff. Napoleon, in his tent, completed his arrangements; received from colonel Fabvier, who arrived that day, an account of the battle of Salamanca; and when he had finished his narrative, dismissed him with the words, that he (Napoleon) would repair on the morrow, on the banks of the Moskwa, the faults committed at Arapiles. M. de Bossuet arrived, also, during the day. He was prefect of the palace, and brought a picture of the king of Rome, painted by Gerard. The emperor gazed at it earnestly before he returned it to its case. When he had finished for the day, and convinced himself that the Russians did not intend to retreat, he retired to take a brief repose. The troops in both armies were at rest. They slept round huge fires, lighted to protect them from the chill of the night, and the damp arising from a shower of rain which had fallen during the evening. All was still! And, for several hours, the most profound silence—the most intense calm—prevailed.

When, as the morning of the 7th of September dawned, the French found that the Russian army remained in the positions of the previous day, and that, therefore, a battle must take place, but one spirit appeared to animate the entire host—that of emulating those heroic deeds which had conferred such honour on the French name. The men appeared to forget all they had gone through, and to be equally indifferent to what they might have to encounter: they only thought of the enemy in front, and were animated by a most eager desire to defeat Kutusoff and his army, and push on to Moscow. The officers evinced no less enthusiasm than the men. They also assembled very early in the morning; and soon after, Napoleon, on horseback, rode in amongst them. He surveyed the Russian position—saw that it was weakest on the left; and there he resolved that the principal attack should be made. Just then the sun broke out clear and bright. "It is the sun of Austerlitz!" was the emperor's exclamation. But, though there was a brilliance in the light, there was a cheerless coldness in the atmosphere: that, however, no one appeared to regard; and the drums and trumpets sounding the "call," the following proclamation was read to the troops:—"Soldiers! the battle is at hand, which you have so long desired; henceforth, the victory depends on yourselves. It has become necessary, and will give you abundance; good winter quarters, and a speedy return to your country! Conduct yourselves as you did at Austerlitz, Friedland, Witepsk, and Smolensko; and let the remotest posterity recount your actions on this day; let your countrymen say of you all—'He was in that great battle, under the walls of Moscow!'" In the Russian army there were similar notes of preparation: and, if less excited, Kutusoff's troops were, perhaps, more firm and determined than the French.

The numbers on both sides were pretty equal. The Russian army comprised 132,000 troops and 640 pieces of artillery: of the men, 7,000 were Cossacks, and 10,000 militia, who were, for the first time, about to fire a gun at an enemy. There was a strong body of the imperial guard, which occupied Borodino. Bagawouth's and Ostermann's divisions were posted on the plateau, in front of which the Kolotza ran; Doctoroff's defended the great redoubt; beyond which was Raefskoi and his corps, their right on the redoubt, their left on the village of Semenowskoi. The corps of Borosdin, and the division of Newerofskoi, held the redoubts, whose cross-fire aided that from the principal one; Touczkoff was posted on the Smolensko road, at the village of Ulitza; and another corps of the imperial guard was in reserve in the centre. Barclay de Tolly commanded the right, Benningsen the centre, and Bagrathion the left; Kutusoff giving orders to the whole. The French had 103,000 infantry, 30,000 cavalry, and 590 cannon. Besides the old and new guard, the army comprised the corps of marshals Davoust, Ney, and Junot; prince Eugene, and prince Poniatowski; the cavalry being commanded by generals Nansouty, Montbrun, Grouchy, and Latour-Maubourg—all those officers receiving their orders from the king of Naples, who had the supreme command of the horse, as Napoleon had of the entire army. He placed Eugene's corps, with the heavy cavalry of Grouchy, on the extreme left. Then came two corps of Davoust's division; next Ney's corps, with Junot's in its rear; and, on the right, were the other three corps of Davoust's division, with the division of Poniatowski. The imperial guard was in reserve.

The signal for the attack was given at six o'clock, by the discharge of a gun from one of the French batteries; and the French columns advanced en échelon from the right, Davoust leading. The whole line was soon brought into action; but it was the batteries on the enemy's left which were, at first, the chief objects of attack. They were as bravely defended as they were gallantly assailed; and the French made no impression. General Compans, who commanded the first corps of Davoust's division, and led the attack, was wounded; Rapp succeeded him, and he also fell, as did Desaix, who next took the command. Davoust was also wounded, and the division wavered, but only for a brief space. They rallied, and, resuming the attack, one of the redoubts was taken, and, though the French were almost immediately driven out, they were in such force, that Kutusoff saw his left could not resist much longer, and he ordered Bagrathion's division up to its support. The battle continued to rage in this quarter with great fury; while Eugene, who had carried the village of Borodino, on the left bank of the Kolotza, crossed over, and attacked the great redoubt. Ney's three corps charged bravely on the enemy, opposite to them, supported by Murat, at the head of 10,000 cavalry: they entered the Russian intrenchments, from which they were driven by Bagrathion, and pursued some way across the plain; Poniatowski, also, having carried the village of Ulitza, was driven out again by Touczkoff. But the fate of the day soon changed. Davoust was reinforced by the young guard and a large body of the reserve cavalry; and the fire of 400 cannon was opened on the redoubts. The return fire from the Russians was terrific, and literally mowed down the French as they advanced; but they pressed on over the dead bodies, and ultimately success was theirs. The great redoubt was carried by Eugene's division, assisted by general Bonami: one after the other the remainder fell into the hands of the assailants; and then Bagrathion brought up the entire left wing to meet the French in the plain. There, for upwards of an hour, more than 80,000 men and 400 cannon kept up their murderous work. The slaughter on both sides was immense; but Bagrathion, and the chief of his staff being wounded, and a corps of Davoust's appearing on the Russian flank, general Konownitsyn, who had succeeded Bagrathion in the command, withdrew behind the ravine of Semenskoi; and, though charged by the French cavalry under Nansouty, and exposed to the fire from the guns in their captured works, the Russians maintained that position during the day. While this contest was going on in the plain, the great redoubt was recaptured; and Platoff, having discovered a ford over the Kolotza, to the left of the French, they were attacked in flank, by 2,300 cavalry of the Russian guard, under Ouvaroff, and thrown into great confusion. But Napoleon directed more than 200 cannon against the great redoubt. Under their terrific discharge, Caulaincourt, at the head of Montbrun's cuirassiers—that general having been struck down by a cannon-ball—charged the Russian line; and the gallant fellows cut their way to the important work, just as prince Eugene and his infantry were again advancing up its slopes. Caulaincourt was killed at its entrance, but his men pressed on. The Russian artillerymen refused to surrender, and were nearly all killed at their guns; and the redoubt was again, and this time permanently, in possession of the French. The Russians had now all fallen back; but the batteries originally in their rear, now in their front, kept up a fierce fire on the French; and Kutusoff ordered a forward movement, with the object of regaining the ground they had lost. For near two hours longer the strife was carried on; then they were again driven back, and established themselves on the heights immediately in the rear of their original position—Poniatowski finishing the fight by driving Bagawouth's corps from the old Smolensko road, which it then occupied, and forcing it to retire and join Bagrathion's in the rear.

The French had thus obtained possession of the field of battle; but the Russians were drawn up in close array, in a strong position, with an immense park of artillery. It was a question whether they should be attacked? That would have required the 18,000 men of the guard, who had not yet been engaged; Napoleon having resisted all entreaties to let them take part in the action. After much thought, his mind was made up. "I will not destroy my guard," said he, "at a distance of 800 leagues from France; it would be scarcely wise to risk our last remaining resource." The attack, therefore, was not made; but as the Russian masses presented a wide mark for the French cannon, the emperor remarked, with what the historian of his wars terms "the cruel jocosity of the battlefield"—"Since they are still anxious for it, let them have it!" And a murderous fire was opened upon them from nearly 400 cannon—an act for which there was no necessity; and the thought of which fills one with horror. The Russians returned the fire; but for every Frenchman struck, at least six Russians fell. After the sun sank, the cannonading gradually subsided; both armies, crushed by fatigue, sought repose, to rise in the morning to witness the horrors of the battle-field. Those horrors were never exceeded. Thousands of bodies, dead and wounded, covered the plain; whilst from 15,000 to 20,000 horses were either stretched on the ground, dead or dying, or were wandering about, giving vent to the most frightful cries. In the neighbourhood of the ravines, where the wounded had instinctively drawn themselves to escape fresh wounds, thousands of all the various nations engaged were lying together, without sense or motion. It was indeed a fearful sight! When an investigation was made into details, it was found that the French had generals Plausonne, Montbrun, Caulaincourt, Romeuf, Chastel, Lambert, Compère, Bessières, Dumas, and Canonville killed; thirty were wounded; and the loss of the other officers was in proportion. Napoleon, in his bulletin of the battle, dated from Ojask, on the 19th of September, stated his total loss at 2,500 killed, and 7,500 wounded: in all, 10,000. At St. Helena, he admitted that double that number was put hors de combat; but officers, who were on the ground, and who had ample means of obtaining information, say, that the total loss was very considerably greater even than 20,000. The Russians lost two generals, Kaitaisoff and Touczkoff, killed; thirty were wounded; and, of officers and privates, 15,000 were killed, 30,000 wounded, and 2,000 made prisoners. They lost thirteen pieces of cannon, and took ten from the French.

The next morning, Kutusoff—who had sent off what Sir Robert Wilson calls an “uncandid” account of the battle, which procured him the rank of marshal-general of the Russian army, and a donation of 100,000 roubles—having still 70,000 effective men, and 600 pieces of cannon, withdrew in excellent order upon the high-road to Moscow. The Russians carried off everything with them; not leaving any baggage or guns behind. They were pursued by the French cavalry; and their rear-guard being overtaken at Mojaisk, an engagement ensued, which ended with no decided advantage to either, but with about equal loss to each. Kutusoff then continued his retreat to Moscow, where his appearance surprised the inhabitants, who were induced to believe, from his bulletin, that he had won a victory. The French did not move on the 8th, except the division sent in pursuit of the Russians. The state of the army was fearful; though, as the enemy had retreated, it certainly had won the victory in the battle of the Moskwa—so the French call it: the Russians name it the battle of Borodino. The surgeons were unable to take care of the wounded; it was impossible to procure anything like adequate accommodation for them; and many hundreds lay for days neglected on the field. Food was scarce; both the able-bodied and the wounded had to eat the flesh of the dead horses; and there was a want of almost everything in provisions, forage, medicine, and ammunition. Even Ney, hitherto the first to cry “Forward!” now advocated retreat. But the emperor thought retreat would be quite as disastrous as an advance, without any of the glory that might attend the latter; and being joined, that day, by the Italian division Pino, and the division Delaborde, of the young guard, which repaired much of the loss of men sustained in the battle, he resolved to go on to Moscow, where he still calculated upon dictating terms of peace. It was a hazardous experiment; and, had Kutusoff known the condition of his enemy, he need not have retreated beyond that city.

The Russians fell back, as the French advanced, very leisurely. On the 12th, the former bivouacked on the Worobiewo heights, immediately before Moscow; and there Kutusoff held a council of war, the majority of which decided upon continuing the retreat; the route adopted being to pass through Moscow, and then take the direction of Kolomna, with the view of cutting off all the French communications by a flank movement, and taking them in the rear. On the 14th the army defiled through Moscow, to the great dismay of the inhabitants, and the soldiers seemed to be impressed with grief as they passed through the streets. Milaradovitch was left in command of the rear-guard, which was not to leave the city till the main body was clear off. The French reached Worobiewo on the 13th; and, in the feeling of glory at approaching Moscow, all sense of their past privations, sufferings, and loss of life, was, for the moment, lost. Many, both officers and privates, had been in Egypt, in the Pyrenees, at Rome, Milan, Madrid, Vienna, and Berlin; and they now were wonderfully excited at the prospect of entering the grand metropolis of the east. With the feeling of joy at the sense of victory, doubtless were intermixed the confidence of obtaining plenty, and the hope of something like repose and ease for a short time at least. Still the honour that the capture of Moscow conferred, was the more vivid feature in the imagination, which already pictured still further and more brilliant successes in the distance. Under the influence of these feelings, the army, on the 13th, moved on the Russian capital, following the great Smolenske road. Davoust’s and Ney’s corps were in the centre; prince Eugene’s on the left; prince Poniatowski on the right; the guard in the rear; Murat at the head; and Napoleon in the midst. As they advanced, a messenger brought a proposal from Milaradovitch, that all hostilities should be suspended till the evacuation had taken place. The emperor assented, as he did not wish to destroy Moscow; and it was agreed, that not a shot should be fired till the Russian army had left it—on condition that it defiled immediately across the city, without halting, which was just what Kutusoff wanted to do. The French army, however, continued its march; till at length—and here we again quote Thiers—"having reached the summit of a hill, they beheld beneath it an immense city, brilliant with a thousand colours, crowned with a multitude of domes, gleaming in the sunlight; and, altogether, with its mingled Gothic and Byzantine aspect, realising what is told in Oriental tales of the marvels of Asia. Monasteries, flanked with towers, formed its girdle; and, in its centre, on an eminence, rose a strong citadel—a species of capitol, where, side by side, stood temples reared to God, and imperial palaces; where, above embattled walls, arose majestic domes, bearing the emblem which is the epitome of the whole of Russian history and Russian ambition—the cross above the reversed crescent. This citadel was the Kremlin, the ancient dwelling-place of the czars!" The sight threw the soldiers into perfect ecstasies. "Moscow! Moscow!" they shouted; and seemed lost in a delirium of joy. Napoleon was more moved than was his wont: and his generals, thinking again that rash daring had achieved success, forgot their discontent, and overwhelmed him with congratulations.

Soon all this was at an end. The height was descended, the city reached; and the first who entered, Murat being among them, found nothing but silence and solitude. The Russian rear-guard had just cleared the walls on one side, when the French entered on the other. Murat, attended by his staff, and followed by a detachment of cavalry, dashed through the streets; but whether in the richest or the poorest quarters, met no one, till they encountered a few Frenchmen, with some Germans and Italians, who had been established in Moscow, and now implored the protection of the French soldiers from a number of brigands, who, they said, Rostopchin had let loose to massacre and to plunder. Of course, protection was assured. That bandits were loose, was soon ascertained: as the Kremlin was passed, several shots were fired from it; and it was found that some of those ruffians had taken possession of that palace. There was no difficulty in clearing it out, and in freeing that august building from their presence. All this time Napoleon was waiting outside the city, expecting deputations to offer him the keys, to make their submission, and to implore protection. Bitter was his disappointment. He would not enter Moscow that day, but remained in the Drogomilow suburb;

the troops being disposed around the walls, to prevent surprise, and there being, in the hospitals, 15,000 wounded Russians, whom Kutusoff left to the mercy of the conquerors. Had he been aware what was to take place, he would have spared no toil or trouble to remove them.

When Kutusoff, after he took the command of the army, marched to the east, he sent to count Rostopchin, the governor, to inform him that he intended to approach Moscow, with the object of "covering and defending that city, the loss of which he could not hazard." He also promised, that if anything should occur to induce him to change his purpose, he would give three days' notice of his intention to do so. Rostopchin had resolved, that, if Moscow could not be defended by the Russians, it should not be occupied by the French; and he informed those around him of his determination, in the event of the enforced retreat of the Russian army, "to convoke all the authorities and inhabitants, for the purpose of arranging a general and municipally-regulated conflagration; a sacrifice which he was confident would be unhesitatingly made by their patriotism, excited by their horror of the invader." The retreat was made without any notice to Rostopchin, who never forgave Kutusoff his breach of faith. Unable, from this circumstance, to arrange the methodic plan he contemplated for the destruction of the city, he still resolved that it should be destroyed. As soon as he was aware that the army would not defend it, he ordered all the inhabitants to leave, and to carry with them whatever part of their property it was in their power to remove. At the same time he liberated several hundred prisoners, confined for various offences; who agreed, as the price of their liberty, to obey his orders—which were, to remove or destroy the fire-engines and apparatus; to cut off the supply of water as much as possible; and to spread combustibles about in various directions. Upwards of 300,000 of the inhabitants quitted their homes; and whilst the nobles appear to have left their hotels perfectly furnished, the rooms being prepared as if they expected visitors, the middle classes carried away all they possibly could. The shopkeepers also, to a considerable extent, removed their goods; but much property was left behind; and most of the private cellars, and those belonging to tradesmen, were found well-stocked with spirits and wine; the provision-stores were, generally, in the same condition.

On the 14th of September Napoleon entered Moscow. On reaching the Kremlin, he ascended the tower, to view his conquest; but he was only greeted by the crows and ravens, which flew about in immense numbers. Descending, he distributed his army through the various quarters of the city; and as the men met with abundance of provisions in the shops, whilst the officers found plenty of wine and stores in the abandoned mansions of the nobles, all appear to have given themselves up to pleasure—probably as intense as it was brief. In the afternoon, two fires occurred—one in a capacious building, containing a vast quantity of spirits; the other, in a bazaar to the north-east of the Kremlin, filled with rich silks. “No engines,” writes Sir Robert Wilson, “could be procured—no carts, no conveyance, not even buckets for the carriage of water: all had been carried off, or destroyed by the orders of Rostopchin. Still Napoleon flattered himself that these fires were occasioned by incidental occurrences, or too-prevalent irregularities. He entertained no suspicion that it was the initiative of a systematic conflagration, planned with the most daring conception, and executed with a persevering audacity unparalleled in history.”

On the 15th there were more fires; and, in the night, the whole city appeared to be in flames, the violence of which was increased, and they were spread into every quarter, by the high equinoctial gale which raged at the same time. After the fire had been burning many hours—spreading the utmost alarm and anxiety amongst the French, the sick and wounded, and the few inhabitants who had ventured to disobey Rostopchin, and had secreted themselves in out-of-the-way places, instead of leaving the city—a fellow was apprehended, who was evidently endeavouring to extend the ravages of the destroying element. From him was extracted the secret of Rostopchin’s orders to fire the city; and Napoleon directed, first, that every exertion should be made to subdue the flames, and to prevent their spreading; and then, that military commissions should sit, before whom incendiaries taken in the act were to be brought, for the purpose of being shot or hung; under these orders, 200 or 300 Russians were taken, and almost immediately executed.

Napoleon had established himself in the Kremlin, where he was in the midst of danger, for there were more than 400 ammunition wag-gons in its court, and about 400,000 lbs. of powder in its arsenal. At first he displayed no intention of leaving; but at length, on the 16th, he yielded to the desire of his officers; and descending to the quay, he there found his horses ready for him. He had great difficulty in threading the streets; and it was in the utmost confusion that the army quitted Moscow: all their dreams of glory, their anticipations of pleasure, “vanished into thin air.” As soon as anything like order could be restored, the divisions of prince Eugene and marshal Ney fell back upon the Zwenigarod and St. Petersburg roads. Those of marshal Davoust took the Smolensko route; Napoleon took up his quarters at the château of Petrowskoie, a league distant from Moscow, on the St. Petersburg road, in the centre of the cantonments of prince Eugene. Early on the morning of the 17th he was abroad, and gazing upon the burning city. After watching the flames for some time, he exclaimed—“This sad event is the presage of a long train of disasters!”

The fire continued burning; and, on the 18th, the spectacle was sublime, though appalling: the entire city appeared enveloped in flames. It was not subdued till the evening of the 20th—not more than one-fifth of the capital having been saved. During the conflagration, the inhabitants who remained, and the French troops, daringly braved the flames, in order to ransack the cellars, the shops, and the houses, when they could get into them. Although much property had been removed, many valuables of all kinds remained: and the French and the Russians plundered alike—many of them drinking in the cellars till they were in a state of intoxication; and others attiring themselves in the various costumes which fell into their hands—laughing and shouting in riotous merriment, amidst the terrible scenes that were going on around them. Those scenes were more terrific from the loss of life as well as property which was the result of the fire: the estimate is, that more than 20,000 sick and wounded perished in the flames.

The destruction stayed, Napoleon, on the 20th of September, returned to the Kremlin; from whence he dispatched count Lauriston to Kutusoff’s head-quarters, with instructions to demand an armistice. That general, on leaving Moscow, had taken the road to Kolomna. But he made only two marches in that direction; and then, by a semicircular movement, he reached Kalonga, ninety-five miles south-west of Moscow, in the neighbourhood of the Smolensko road; and resolving to make that city the base of his future operations, he encamped at Tarutino, on the old central route between Kalonga and the capital; where he had an abundance of resources, and was enabled to procure ample supplies for the ensuing campaign. His men, aware of the burning of Moscow, are represented, by Karamsin, to have been filled alike with grief and indignation. Tears trickled down their cheeks, as they thought of the ruined city; but, with bitter sorrow at its destruction, was mingled the resolve to avenge it. It was at Tarutino that Kutusoff received a messenger, conveying to him the announcement that Lauriston was on the road from Moscow, and sought an interview with him,* for the purpose of conferring on the terms of a convention, “for the immediate retreat of the whole of the invading army from the territories of Russia;" that "convention also to serve as the basis of a peace, to which it was to be the preliminary." Kutusoff agreed to give the French plenipotentiary a meeting on the night of the 4th of October, at a station several miles from his most advanced videttes. General Benningsen, and the other generals, sent for Sir Robert Wilson, as soon as they were aware of Kutusoff's engagement, and urged him to induce the marshal to relinquish it; Benningsen informing the English commissioner, that himself and his brother officers "wished to avoid extreme measures; but their minds were made up; and it was the resolve of the chiefs, which would be sustained by the army, not to allow Kutusoff to return to the camp and resume the command, if once he quitted it for the midnight interview." Sir Robert immediately went to the commander-in-chief; and had some difficulty in getting him to give up his own arrangements for what were the commands of the emperor—not to treat with the enemy. In the course of the conversation, he told Sir Robert, that he knew the propositions which would be made were "of a pacific character;" and intimated, that "perhaps they might lead to an arrangement satisfactory and honourable to Russia." This avowal of Kutusoff, which seems to indicate that he must have received confidential communications from Napoleon—a declaration he made to Sir Robert Wilson, that he did not think it would be for the interest of Europe that Napoleon should be entirely ruined—and some other parts of his subsequent conduct, lead to the belief, that he was not so patriotic as has been generally imagined. However, at last he yielded, and agreed not to go to Lauriston: if the French envoy wished to make his communication, he must, he was informed, come to the camp. He did come—arriving about eleven at night. On his reaching the advanced posts, he was blindfolded, and conducted to the marshal's hut, where he was "introduced to a circle of the Russian generals, and to the English general by name." That introduction, as he afterwards said, caused him "immediately to comprehend from what quarter the obstacle had come to the execution of the original agreement." He made his proposals, which were forwarded to St. Petersburg. The emperor refused to take them into consideration, and severely censured Kutusoff for having consented for one moment to entertain them; giving him his absolute command, for the future, "to admit of no negotiation whatever, or any relation tending towards peace with the enemy." The czar was bound to take this course, by a more recent engagement with Bernadotte, with whom he had had a personal interview at Abo; and by his alliance with England.

was waiting impatiently at Moscow, where his army was suffering from great privations, and rapidly falling into habits of insubordination. Provisions of all sorts, when those found after the abandonment of the capital had been exhausted, were difficult to procure; and the soldiers who had enriched themselves by pillage, eagerly gave the most costly valuables for the commonest necessities. "Miserable horse-flesh was eaten out of golden dishes," says the historian, "by the officers, who were arrayed in the finest furs and silks of the east; and the common men, dressed in the spoils of Muscovite riches, were often on the point of starving." The Russians had established parties of Cossacks and other light troops all round the French cantonments. They occupied every road, cut off all communication, and prevented any supplies from reaching the invaders, whose advanced posts were destroyed. Thus, in the midst of much splendour, and some luxuries—for wine and brandy continued abundant, notwithstanding the quantities consumed—the army was suffering the pangs of hunger, and insubordination naturally increased. Yet, for some time, Napoleon would not hear of a retreat, which, he said, "would appear a flight, and Europe would re-echo with the news."—The weather had, up to the 13th of October, been very mild, for that time of the year, in Russia; but on that day snow began to fall. This was considered the sign of an early winter; and again the necessity of an immediate removal was urged upon the emperor, who seemed more disposed to listen to the representations of his generals. Whilst at the Kremlin he received couriers from Paris every four-and-twenty hours; and the news which one of them brought about this time, of the entry of the English into Madrid, did not tend to raise his spirits, which were much depressed by all that was passing around him. The same news also reached the Russian camp, and was hailed by Kutusoff with repeated discharges of artillery. He made it the occasion of issuing a proclamation to his soldiers, in which he said—"The campaign finished on the part of the enemy is only commencing on ours. Madrid has fallen! The hand of Providence presses on Napoleon. Moscow will be his prison or his tomb."

Napoleon determined that it should be neither; for he now made up his mind to retreat. Though he intended to make Smolensko the point to which his army should direct their march, he resolved not to take the direct road, which was completely devastated and waste; but to adopt that to Kalouga—a route that ran through the richest provinces of the empire. There were two roads, the old and the new, leading from Moscow to that town; of these, as Kutusoff was at Tarutino, on the former, Napoleon resolved to take the latter, by which he hoped to turn the

The Russians were on the alert—Kutusoff having resolved to resume offensive movements. On the 18th of October, he ordered an attack to be made upon the French advanced guard, which, 30,000 strong, under Murat and Poniatowski, occupied Winkowo and its neighbourhood, and covered Moscow. General Benningsen led the attack; and, after a severe fight, it was successful. The French were compelled to retreat with the loss of 1,500 prisoners, 38 pieces of cannon, 40 caissons, and their entire baggage. The movable kitchen of Murat was also captured; in which were found roasted cats and boiled horse-flesh—showing the straits to which the French were reduced. Napoleon was reviewing his troops in the Kremlin, previous to leaving Moscow, when he received the news of this disaster. He immediately sent out couriers to order the concentration of all the different corps: this effected, on the 19th he left the remains of the Russian capital, exclaiming, as he quitted the Kremlin—"Let us march on Kalouga; and woe to those who interrupt our passage!" His army had been considerably reinforced by the arrival of troops from the west of Europe, and the recovery of the wounded; and he started for the west, at the head of 103,000 men, with 600 pieces of cannon, and 2,000 carriages for transport, in his train. On marching, the army was greatly encumbered with its baggage. Though short of provisions, it had an immense supply of ammunition, found in the arsenal of the Kremlin, and which providentially escaped the conflagration; whilst numerous waggons, filled with the plunder and spoil rescued from the flames, followed each regiment. Amongst the spoils were the great cross of St. Ivan, Persian and Turkish standards, and other trophies carried off from the Kremlin, which citadel Mortier was left behind, with the rear-guard, to destroy. In the rear, were the French families, and the Germans and Italians, who had not left Moscow, and who, being now afraid to await the return of the Russians, asked leave to accompany the army. That leave could not be refused, but their presence added to the difficulties of the march. These fugitives, for such they really were, and the camp-followers, are said to have made up a motley host of 40,000 men, women, and children.

Kutusoff was speedily informed of the evacuation of Moscow; and he, in consequence, broke up his camp at Tarutino, being at the head of 80,000 regular troops, and 30,000 Cossacks. He also ordered general Winzingerode, who was at Klin, on the Iver road, to occupy Moscow. That officer arrived at the capital on the 21st, and advancing, in person, too incautiously to the Kremlin, with a party sent to summon the garrison to surrender, he was made prisoner.

Mortier abandoned the citadel in the night, having first laid trains to blow it up in various parts—which were only partially effective. He made all haste to join the emperor, who had adopted skilful measures to conceal his intended route, by first taking the old road to Kalouga, and then gaining the new one by cross-roads, which came out near the town of Malo-Jaroslavets, thirty-eight miles north of Kalouga, and the strongest position on the road. Kutusoff had, however, divined the views of the French emperor, and had himself taken the road to that town, dispatching Milaradovitch, with Doctoroff's corps, and some other troops, in advance, to occupy the post, if possible, before the arrival of the French. Though every exertion was made, the Russians, when they arrived, found that the place was already occupied by the advanced guard of the French, under general Delzons. Milaradovitch attacked these troops, and soon drove them out of the town. But prince Eugene, shortly after, came up with his entire division; and one of the most desperate conflicts of the campaign took place, continuing throughout the day. The object of the French was to force a defile, a little way beyond Malo-Jaroslavets, which would have brought them on the road to Kalouga; that of the Russians to defend this pass till the arrival of the main army under Kutusoff. The town was the chief scene of the fighting. It was situated on the incline of a hill, which was shut in on one side by thickets, and on the other the ground was rendered impassable by deep ravines. The place could not, therefore, be turned; and the two armies fought hand-to-hand in the streets; whilst the houses, all of wood, and set on fire by the discharges from the artillery, were burning rapidly around them. The French and Russians alternately took, and were driven out of, the place; but at night its ruins remained in the possession of prince Eugene, who lost 5,000 men. Still Milaradovitch had gained his object; though driven from Malo-Jaroslavets, he held the defile, and the advance of the French was arrested. He had, during the day, lost quite as many men as the French; and general Doctoroff, one of the bravest of the Russian commanders, fell early in the engagement.

The Russian army had arrived, towards the close of the day, on the other side of the defile, and took up its position on the surrounding heights. Napoleon, with the main body of the French army, had also arrived in the opposite direction; and passed the night near the scene of action—his head-quarters being at the village of Gorodnia; his place of shelter a miserable hut. He did not retire to rest. Parties were sent out to reconnoitre the Russian position; and he sat in consultation with his generals the greater part of the night. At daybreak, he set out himself to examine the ground, and, with general Rapp, narrowly escaped being made prisoner by a flying party of Cossacks, under Platoff himself. These irregulars made a dash at a park of artillery, consisting of forty pieces, near Gorodnia; all of which they seized, driving before them the squadrons of horse which were on service in the immediate vicinity of headquarters. Napoleon and Rapp were both in the midst of the struggle; and had the Cossacks been aware of the magnitude of the prize within their reach, they could not have escaped. But knowing nothing of the presence of the emperor, the Cossacks thought only of the guns—all of which they would have carried off if they had had horses; but they had only secured eleven, when the dragoons of the guard appeared on the ground, and those became their prize. This affair made Napoleon painfully sensible of the inferiority of his light troops, to the dashing Cossacks. His deficiencies in other respects were also evident; and, after a careful inspection of the enemy's position, and a survey of his own, he determined not to attack the Russians, but, for the first time in his career, to retire before the face of his enemy in the open field. All his generals, except Murat, were in favour of this movement; and when it was resolved upon, he and Davoust differed as to the route which should be taken. The king of Naples recommended that the route should be by Borowsk and Mojaïsk, to Smolensko; whilst Davoust contended, that the retreat should be conducted by Medyn, as the Mojaïsk road was utterly ruined. Napoleon, who was never inclined to listen to Davoust, though he was one of his most able officers, took the advice of Murat; and, at day-break on the 26th of October, the army was set in motion on the Mojaïsk road. "By a singular coincidence," remarks Alison, "the Russian troops, at the same moment, abandoned their position, and fell back in the direction of Kalouga. The reason assigned by Kutusoff for this singular measure, was, the inquietude which he felt for the road by Medyn to Kalouga; but the adoption of it was a serious fault, which had nearly endangered all the advantages of the campaign."

Kutusoff's reason was not the true one. When the Russians arrived near Malo-Jaroslavets, in the evening of the 24th, they expected to be led against the French. The next day was devoted to repose; and they employed themselves, during the night, in preparing for the coming strife. At two o'clock in the morning of the 26th, the generals were summoned to a council, which Sir Robert Wilson attended. When it was assembled, "Kutusoff, sitting in the midst of the circle, shortly acquainted them, that 'he had received information which had induced him to relinquish the intention of defending the ground in front of Malo-Jaroslavets, and determined him to retire behind the Koricza, to secure the road to Kalouga, and a communication with the Oka'"—the river on which that town is situated. "This announcement was a thunderbolt that caused a momentary stupor. It was, however, represented to him, 'that such a movement, at such a moment, and under the circumstances of darkness, and the narrow causeway on the line of retreat, could not be executed without perilous confusion: and that the enemy, seeing this, would doubtless endeavour to increase it by an attack; that the whole army would be placed in jeopardy; and the rear-guard inevitably lost, if the enemy availed himself of his advantage.' The English general, enforcing these considerations, was told by the marshal—"I don't care for your objections. I prefer giving my enemy a pont d'or, as you call it, to receiving a coup de collier; besides, I will say again, as I have told you before, that I am by no means sure, that the total destruction of the emperor Napoleon and his army, would be such a benefit to the world; his succession would not fall to Russia, or any other continental power; but to that which already commands the sea, and whose domination would then be intolerable.' The English general only replied, 'that the occasion was one for the performance of military duty, not for political altercation, which he should postpone; and that the marshal ought, in the discharge of that duty, always to respect the maxim—Fais ce que dois, advienne que pourra.' All further argument was a waste of time, and minutes were precious;"* therefore no more was said, and the retreat was commenced. The explanation of Kutusoff's conduct is, that he was the nominee of the Russian nobles, who then were jealous of England; and that he was their representative, and not the exponent of the emperor's views.

The French retired upon the great road to Smolensko, leaving Mojaïsk on their right; and, on the 27th, Napoleon had his head-quarters at Vereja, sixty-two miles from Moscow. The main body of the Russians were moving on parallel roads, under Kutusoff, who detached Milaradovitch and Platoff on the road taken by the French, to harass their rear. Had he followed them himself, he might have destroyed the entire army before it reached Smolensko; but, for several days, the French were scarcely molested on their march. The army was divided into three corps, which kept a few miles apart. Prince Eugene led the advanced guard; Davoust commanded the rear; and Napoleon, says Thiers, "instead of taking an active part in the conduct of the retreat, and bearing the brunt of the terrible evils of which he was the author, remained always considerably in advance of the rear-guard; being sometimes on horseback, and sometimes on foot, but most frequently in a carriage, between Berthier, who was plunged in consternation, and Murat, who was almost annihilated by terror. He passed whole days without uttering a word; only rising at intervals, from the abyss of gloomy reflections in which he was sunk, to utter complaints of his lieutenants, as though he could still deceive any one by blaming others than himself." The horrors of the retreat began almost as soon as the army left Malo-Jaroslavets. The guards alone had a sufficiency of food; all the other corps were compelled to get subsistence as they could; and as the country was completely desolated, sometimes they were days without food. They passed within sight of the plain of Borodino—covered with innumerable skeletons, and the débris of the two armies; and when they reached the abbey of Kolotskoi, a number of the men, wounded at Borodino, surrounded the advanced guard, and begged to be taken on with the troops. Thousands of the wounded had been left there; and notwithstanding the attention of the surgeons—especially of the surgeon-general, M. Larrey, who then and subsequently displayed a noble heroism in the performance of his duty—the great majority died. Those of the survivors who could crawl from their beds, got into the road as the army was passing, and implored their countrymen not to leave them behind. The emperor was deeply moved with their appearance, and exerted himself to arrange means for their being conveyed along with the retreating force. The troops, however, rendered selfish by suffering, were very reluctant to displace any of their spoils to accommodate the wretched invalids. At length, room was made for most of them in the baggage waggons; but all were not removed, it is believed: and as, from that time, waggons and carts had to be abandoned almost every day, the horses dropping down on the road, and being unable to proceed, most of these poor creatures perished—not a few by the hands of the Russians, by whom they were found on the roads. From the same cause—the exhaustion of the horses—ammunition waggons had to be repeatedly blown up, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy.

The French advanced guard reached Wiasma on the 31st of October. Napoleon arrived on the 1st of November. Davoust, with the rear-guard, did not approach the city till the 3rd. The emperor thought he had avoided the Russians; but, on that day, Davoust was attacked by Milaradovitch and Platoff; and his corps would have been completely annihilated, had not Eugene Beauharnais and Poniatowski returned and aided him. As it was, the battle was fierce and well-sustained on both sides for several hours. At last, Davoust got his artillery and baggage safely across some fields, and the troops pushed on for Wiasma, followed by Milaradovitch and the Cossacks, supported by prince Eugene of Würtemberg and his infantry, who came up after the fighting had continued for some time. Ney's and Campans' corps came to the support of the rear-guard and the viceroy, as they drew near Wiasma. The former was attacked by the artillery of Kutusoff's advanced guard; the main army being very near the town. The French entered in great disorder, and were soon driven out by general Paskiewitch, whose name first mingled in the affairs of the war on that occasion. The town took fire during the fight. The French—who lost, during the day, 6,000 killed and wounded, and 2,000 prisoners, the loss of the Russians not being more than 2,000—were in the greatest confusion, and their retreat might again have been cut off; but Kutusoff refused to advance. It was supposed, at the time, that he declined entering into a general engagement, to spare his men, and trusted to the destruction of the enemy by hunger and cold; and from the effects of the former, aided by fatigue, many were daily perishing. The cold had not been severe since the first fall of snow, on the 13th of October; indeed, Napoleon compared the season to that of an autumn at Fontainebleau. But, on the 6th of November, there was a heavy snow-storm. The cold from that time became intense: the roads were like sheets of ice: men and horses with great difficulty kept their feet: indeed, many of the latter could not do so, and were continually falling. The men, whose clothes were quite insufficient to protect them from the inclement weather, and who kept continually dropping their firelocks from their frozen hands, now began to despair of even reaching Smolensko, much less of ever seeing again La belle France!

On leaving Wiasma, Ney took the command of the rear. His corps was moved to that position; and the army, in the state of suffering we have described, kept the route to Smolensko, where the 1st division arrived on the 7th of November; but some corps were so much exhausted, that it was several days before all reached that city; and Napoleon did not establish his head-quarters there till the 9th. The men had, by that time, lost all sense of discipline; and, as they arrived, they rushed to the magazines, the officers setting the example. When collected at Smolensko, the army mustered about 50,000 men—scarcely half the number that had left Moscow. Reduced as they were, the magazines, collected by Napoleon's orders at Smolensko, were found insufficient for the wants of the troops; and if they had been more abundant, the intelligence which reached the emperor rendered it necessary to advance with as little delay as possible. The day before he entered the city, he was informed of a conspiracy at Paris against his authority; and he had scarcely taken up his quarters there, when he learned that he was seriously threatened on both his flanks. Wittgenstein, having been reinforced by the army of Finland, under count Steinheil, had resumed the offensive against St. Cyr and Oudinot, on the Dwina; and though he had been defeated at first, he had succeeded in forcing the French to retire from Polotsk, and had, on the 7th of November, captured Witepsk. Napoleon sent Victor to support Oudinot; and the Russians, who had taken up a strong position at Smoliantzy, were attacked on the 14th. After several hours' fighting, and the loss of about 3,000 men on each side, the French retreated, and Wittgenstein established his forces on the banks of the Oula.—In another direction, on the right, Tchichagoff, at the head of the army of the Danube, had advanced from the south, established a communication with Wittgenstein, and threatened Minsk, which fell into the hands of one of his generals of division, Lambert, on the 15th of November. Napoleon had caused to be established at that town, a dépôt of ammunition and provisions; and its capture was of the greatest importance to the Russians, who found there, according to Sir Robert Wilson, "forty days' supplies of grain and cattle, beer and spirits, for 100,000 men;" 30,000 pairs of shoes, with clothes and equipments in proportion; 27,000 muskets, a great quantity of powder, and a number of cannon, some of which had previously been taken from the Russians.

The successes of the enemy on his flanks, and without the means of sustaining his army at Smolensko, Napoleon found that the only chance of safety was in another onward move, which he hoped would enable him to reach Minsk before it fell into the hands of the Russians—a hope that, like many others formed since he first crossed the Niemen, was doomed to be disappointed. He left Smolensko on the 13th of November, stronger than he entered it. The reserves he found there, and some detachments that "dropped in" during the time the French remained, had raised the army to nearly 70,000 men; but only about 42,000 could be considered "able-bodied" and "effective." Of these, 5,100 were cavalry, the remains of the splendid corps which crossed the Niemen in June; and they were formed into one body, under Latour-Maubourg. The old and young guards, though they had never been in action, were reduced to 10,000 bayonets and 2,000 horse. The 600 cannon, brought from Moscow, were now only 250; but they were too many for the exhausted means and strength of the men, who still suffered dreadfully from the inclemency of the weather. In his 29th bulletin, Napoleon says, that "the cold increased; and, from the 14th to the 16th, the thermometer was sixteen and eighteen degrees below the freezing-point. The roads were covered with sleet; cavalry, artillery, and draught horses perished every night, not by hundreds, but by thousands; particularly the French and German horses. More than 30,000 died in a few days; the cavalry was entirely dismounted; the artillery and waggons were without horses; they were obliged to abandon and destroy a large part of their cannon, of their munitions of war, and provisions."

Their route from Smolensko was by Krasnoi, where Napoleon and the advanced guard arrived on the 15th of November. They drove out a Russian division, under Ojarowski, and bivouacked for the night. The Russian main army, still keeping their parallel march, had arrived in the same neighbourhood; Kutusoff's force—"after deducting every corps detached, and estimating the diminution from casualties of all descriptions—amounting to at least 80,000 combatants," with "every arm in high order;" and he had "600 pieces of well-horsed cannon."* Had the Russian general made the slightest effort, he might have arrived at Krasnoi certainly by the 13th—two days before the French, so greatly inferior in force, reached it.

Napoleon, on arriving at Krasnoi, felt his situation to be very critical: he had ordered Davoust to remain in the rear for the purpose of supporting Ney in his retreat; and he was not joined by Eugene till the middle of the night of the 15th. That general had been attacked by the Russians; his force was reduced to 3,500 men; and he arrived without cannon or baggage—all being taken by the enemy, or abandoned. Soon after his arrival, he was sent on to Liady, to secure that point of retreat. Davoust, who left Smolensko on the 16th, detained his troops, on the route, in pursuance of the emperor's orders, to await the arrival of Ney. The intelligence of prince Eugene's disasters, however, reached him; and he thought it best to send to Ney, informing him of that general's losses, and the necessity thus imposed upon him of immediately joining the emperor. At 3 A.M. on the 17th, he commenced his march to Krasnoi; and succeeded in effecting his junction with Napoleon, who had drawn up his little army of 12,000 infantry, 2,000 cavalry, and thirty guns, in two parallel lines, to cover the main road. He placed his right on Krasnoi, his left on the Lossneia ravine; and his centre opposite the village of Ouwarrowo, from whence two Russian battalions were expelled. Davoust joined the emperor just before Milaradovitch and prince Galitzin made an attempt to recover the village. A column of voltigeurs of the imperial guard defended it, who repulsed the first assault; but they could not stand against the renewed fierce attacks of the Russians, and were all either killed or taken. The fighting continued during the day; and had a move in advance been made by the army under Kutusoff, the entire French force must have been captured or destroyed. He, however, remained inactive; and Napoleon, after sustaining severe loss, was enabled to pursue the road to Orcha without further molestation.

"It was not," says Alison, "without anxious deliberation at the Russian head-quarters, that the resolution to let Napoleon pass without resistance was adopted." The historian, in this respect, is wrong. There was no "anxious deliberation;" but there was, as he also states, much anxious and earnest entreaty to Kutusoff, to let the army march on Krasnoi. But, says Sir Robert Wilson, that general would only make the French pass along the edge of the sword; he would never fling it across their course. In vain the Russian generals—in vain Sir Robert himself—remonstrated and entreated; in vain the soldiers demanded, with loud cries, to be let loose. Sir Robert "pledged himself, from his own observation, that, by the single word 'march!' the war would be finished within an hour. The Russian dryly replied, 'You had my answer at Malo-Jaroslavets.'" It has been hitherto supposed, that ignorance of the exact strength and position of the French, and the distance which the Russian generals were from each other, led to several escapes of the retreating army, that seemed quite unaccountable: it now appears, that those escapes were the result of Kutusoff's determination to get the French out of Russia, but not to destroy them. With this view, having at last allowed generals Tormazoff and Rosen to advance to Krasnoi, which they could not reach till Napoleon and his guards had passed, and Davoust and his corps had time to take to the woods—he detained them there, and kept his army immovable, "because Ney's corps was still at, or on the way from, Smolensko." The troops under Tormazoff and Rosen captured, at Dobroia, a mile and a-half from Krasnoi, many hundred fugitives, with abandoned cannon, tumbrils, and carriages—some of the latter with horses attached to them, so rapid had been the flight of the owners and occupants. One carriage captured was Davoust's, in which was found his marshal's bâton, with a number of maps and plans, especially one of Central Asia and India; the invasion of which was a part of Napoleon's plan for an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Alexander.

Ney had been left at Smolensko, with the French rear-guard of 7,000 men, to blow up the ramparts, and then to join Davoust, who, as we have seen, felt himself obliged to advance to support the emperor, instead of waiting for Ney. The latter evacuated Smolensko at daybreak on the 17th of November; and the French had scarcely got clear of the walls, before Platoff and his Cossacks entered. They were immediately divided into two bands, to pursue the retreating force on both banks of the Dnieper. The band under Denisoff, which took the left bank of the river, found, soon after leaving Smolensko, 112 cannon, which the French had abandoned. Though encumbered with a number of camp-followers, Ney and his corps appear to have marched unmolested on the 17th; but on the 18th, on approaching Nicolino—a village about four miles from Krasnoi, and six from the Dnieper, from which it is separated by a thick wood—it was found, that the Russians, 12,000 strong, under Milaradovitch, were posted on a hill, which overlooked the village, at the base of which ran a broad and deep ravine. They could not pass without fighting; but all hostile movements were suspended for some time by a thick fog. When it cleared away, the French had descended one side of the ravine, ascended the other, and were near the summit of the eminence on which the Russians were posted. The latter immediately opened upon them a deadly fire of grape from forty guns: the French, undismayed by the numbers that fell, rushed forward; and a part of the corps nearly reached the batteries, when the Russians charged with the bayonet. Short, but decisive was the struggle; the French were driven down the hill into the ravine—the Russian Hulus of the guard sweeping through their ranks, and capturing an eagle. Ney, ignorant that the emperor had left Krasnoi, and still desirous of reaching that town, then opened a fire on the Russians with twelve guns—all he had; and ordered colonel Bouvier to head several corps of sappers and miners, and storm the Russian batteries. They gallantly attempted to perform what was an impossible task, and, charged by the Russian grenadiers of Pawlask, nearly all perished! Sir Robert Wilson described this engagement as "a combat of giants, hand-to-hand; and, relatively to numbers, one of the most slaughterous of the campaign." Ney now found it necessary to retreat, and he withdrew his terribly shattered force into the wood which lay to the left of Nicolino.

It is difficult to consider a situation more desperate than that of this gallant but unfortunate little band. In a Russian winter night they were entangled in a wood, without either food or fire, surrounded by foes, and entirely destitute of information as to the country or the inhabitants; but sadly convinced, that wherever they met with a Russian, they encountered a bitter and relentless foe. Colonel Pelet, who had been severely wounded in the battle, urged that the retreat should be continued by crossing the Dnieper; and Ney taking his advice, collected all his remaining troops, to seek the banks of the river. Two messengers arrived from Milaradovitch—one shortly after the other, to offer him terms of capitulation: these he detained, in order that the Russian general might be kept in ignorance of his movements. The troops, in advancing to the Dnieper, had to pass within half a mile of the place where Denisoff, with his Cossacks, was bivouacking; and the lights burning in the bivouac served as guides. On arriving at the river, it was found to be frozen over; but it would not bear the guns. On the first trial, the ice gave way, and Ney was obliged to abandon all the artillery he had with him, with the baggage-carts and waggons. The men, however, were able to effect their passage, but not so silently and secretly as to escape the notice of the Cossacks, who descended to the river before all had crossed, and made several hundred prisoners. When Ney collected his men on the right bank of the river, he found that he had only 3,000 left; all the rest had been killed or taken prisoners. The camp-followers had been reduced nearly in the same proportion. Even now danger and difficulty were not over. Platoff and his band of Cossacks were on that side of the Dnieper; and they harassed the retreating troops on the 19th and 20th, and would have cut them all off, but for a wood which flanked the road where they took shelter, and which the horses could not penetrate. Twenty-five miles from Orcha—to which place Ney had been informed, by Davoust, Napoleon was retreating—two Polish officers rode forward to reach the main army, if possible, and report Ney's position. They were fortunate enough to elude the Cossacks, and encountered Eugene's corps at Liady. As soon as he received their intelligence, that officer marched to meet Ney, whom he encountered eight miles from the town; to the great joy of all. Soon after the united corps reached Orcha; and when Napoleon heard of their arrival, he burst into a fit of unwonted emotion, and exclaimed—"I have three hundred millions in my coffers in the Tuileries; I would willingly have given them to save Ney!"

At this time the army was almost annihilated. The losses, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, since the 14th of November, had been enormous; and there were scarcely 12,000 fighting-men under the eagles, though the crowd of straggling soldiers, baggage waggons, cannon, chariots, and camp-followers, was immense. The cavalry was nearly unhorsed; and it was found necessary to collect all the officers who had a horse remaining, to form a squadron of four companies of 150 men each, in which generals acted as colonels, and colonels as subalterns. This was termed the "sacred squadron;" it was commanded by general Grouchy, under the orders of the king of Naples, and its duty was, never to lose sight of the emperor. Every day many poor fellows were left exhausted on the road; and it is melancholy to know that they met with no pity from the Russians, who treated the prisoners that fell into their hands most barbarously. This began as soon as the French turned their backs on Moscow. When the Russian soldiers took any prisoners, they often stripped them naked, and made them march in that state; or they turned them adrift to be the sport and victims of the peasantry. Sir Robert Wilson witnessed many murders and other barbarities, which he could not prevent; the peasantry declaring, that to desist from torturing their enemies and putting them to death, "would be an offence against the avenging God of Russia, and deprive them of His further protection!" Finding his inability to repress the horrible practices which were constantly resorted to—and which had some excuse from the barbarity of the French, who ravaged the country, and mercilessly killed their prisoners—the English general, he tells us, "sent off a despatch to the emperor Alexander, to 'represent the horrors of those outrages, and to propose a check.' The emperor, by an express courier, instantly transmitted an order, 'to prohibit the practice, under the severest menaces of his displeasure and threats of punishment.' At the same time, he directed a ducat in gold to be paid for any prisoner delivered up by a peasant or soldier to any civil authority for safe custody.' The order was beneficial, as well as creditable; but still the conductors of prisoners were offered a higher price for their charge, and frequently were prevailed on to surrender their trust." The same authority also tells us, that, during this retreat, "famine ruthlessly decimated the ranks of the French. Groups were frequently overtaken, gathering round the burning or burnt embers of buildings which had afforded cover for some wounded or frozen soldiers;" and "many in these groups were employed in peeling off with their fingers, and making a repast of, the charred flesh of their comrades' remains!" "Innumerable dogs crouched on the bodies of their former masters, looking in their faces, and howling mournfully; whilst others were tearing the still living flesh from the feet, hands, and limbs of moaning wretches, who could not defend themselves, and whose torment was still greater, as, in many cases, their consciousness and senses remained unimpaired!"—All the horrors of this retreat were not known till Sir Robert Wilson's Narrative appeared. Nor, though the attachment of the soldiers to Napoleon has often been spoken of, could it scarcely have been supposed to reach the height that authority says it arrived at. He tells us, that whilst a general recklessness, a callousness to everything but momentary relief, prevailed amongst the French captives—they "could not be induced, by any temptation, by any threats, by any privations, to cast reproach upon their emperor as the cause of their misfortunes and sufferings. They were 'the chance of war,' 'unavoidable difficulties,' and 'destiny,' but not 'the fault of Napoleon.'

The famished, dying of hunger, refused food rather than utter an injurious word against their chief."

Napoleon reached Orcha on the 18th of November. There he found ammunition and provisions, which were distributed to the troops; and he attempted to re-establish something like order and discipline amongst them. He had still thirty-six cannon left. These he formed into six batteries, six guns in each; two were allotted to prince Eugene, two to Davoust, and two to Latour-Maubourg. He also issued the most positive orders to his officers, "to incorporate all stragglers into the different corps; to punish, by trial before provost courts, all who again quitted their ranks; to give up all horses to the artillery; to burn all effects, except a change of linen and shoes; and also all carriages, except a certain number for the use of the emigrants from Moscow; and to render all generals and others responsible for the execution of orders which the honour of the French and the safety of the army required." The issuing of such regulations, which are characterised as "judicious," and the observance of which, we are told, was "essential," speaks volumes as to the state to which the once "grand army" was reduced.

The Beresina was now the destination of the emperor and his troops, reinforced by the garrisons of Orcha and Mohilow, and a dépôt of cavalry from Gorki. Oudinot, after his defeat by Wittgenstein, had also advanced to the Beresina; had driven the Russian generals, Lambert and Langeron, from Borisow—a town on that river, thirty-eight miles from Minsk; and was ready to support Napoleon, who at first intended to cross the river at that spot. Oudinot made this important capture on the 23rd of November; on the same day defeating the advanced guard of Tchichagoff, with the loss of 1,000 men. On the route from Orcha, however, Napoleon learned that there was a practicable ford at the village of Studienka, a few miles above Borisow; and he resolved to effect the passage there. Before he reached the banks of the river, he had a body of 70,000 or 80,000 people with him, the fighting part of whom are classed, by Sir Robert Wilson, as follows:—

Troops.	Commanders.	Infantry.	Cavalry.
Old Guard	Lefebvre	4,000	—
Young Guard	Mortier	3,000	—
Cavalry of the Guard	Bessièrès	—	1,500
1st Corps	Davoust	1,500	—
2nd Corps, with Dombrowski's men, and the Minsk gar- rison	Oudinot	6,000	1,800
4th Corps	The Viceroy	1,600	—
3rd and 5th Corps, division Claparède, and the Mohilow garrison	Ney	3,000	400
8th Corps	Junot	—	—
9th Corps	Victor	12,000	1,200
4th Corps, reserve cavalry	Latour-Maubourg	—	150
		31,100	5,050

There were, also, about 4,000 armed artillerymen (the number of cannon being augmented to 260 pieces since the junction of Oudinot and Victor), escorts, head-quarters guard, &c.; the remainder were camp-followers, fugitives, and other non-combatants—"useless hands, and worse than useless mouths."

These various corps concentrated on the heights above Borisow; and indications were given of an intention of crossing there—preparations for throwing a bridge across the river at Brill, and other demonstrations, being made. Whilst they were going on, Kutusoff, with the main body of the Russian army, was on the left side of the Beresina, to the left of the French; Wittgenstein was on the same side, on the right; and Tchichagoff on the right bank, in front, covering Borisow and Studienka. On the 25th of November, that officer received a message from Kutusoff, informing him, "that Napoleon intended to pass the river at Beresina," a village ten miles below Borisow. The message was accompanied by an imperative order, "to move on that menaced point, with sufficient force to oppose the attempt." Tchichagoff was compelled to obey that order; and to that movement Napoleon owed his safety. On the 24th, the sappers and miners began to prepare materials for bridges to cross the river at Studienka—a work of great difficulty, for all the pontoons had been destroyed at Orcha. Two bridges were designed, about 200 yards distant from each other—one for cavalry and carriages, the other for infantry. They were completed, under great difficulty and danger, by the 26th; the sappers working amidst blocks of ice, and the water sometimes reaching their shoulders. As some Russian detachments were observed on the right bank, general Corbineau and his cavalry swam their horses across, landed, and chased them from the shore. They remained there; and, on the 26th, a brigade of infantry also safely passed over to the west side of the river. Napoleon reached Studienka early that morning, leaving general Partonneaux, with a strong division, at Borisow, and ordering Victor to cover the rear. The troops continued to cross on the 26th and 27th; the bridge for carriages breaking twice during the time. The Russian general Tchaplitz, who had been stationed off Studienka, but had been recalled to the Lower Beresina by Tchichagoff, in consequence of the orders he received—was informed that the enemy was crossing just at the spot he had left. He returned, but was too late; the advanced guard of the French had strongly posted themselves, and could not be dislodged. He was obliged to retire, therefore, and join Tchichagoff; and the time thus gained enabled Napoleon to pass over the greater part of his army, and secure the road to Zembin. Victor's division, and Partonneaux's, however, remained; and they were both in imminent danger, for Wittgenstein had come up in force, and thrown his men across the great road by which Partonneaux had to retreat, and which Victor had passed. The former attempted, on the evening of the 27th (he had been ordered by Napoleon not to quit Borisow before), to cut his way through this force. At first the Russians fell back, and the French drove them from a farm called Staroi-Borisow. Numbers, however, triumphed. The French were driven back, and attempted to regain Borisow; but it was already occupied by Platoff and his Cossacks. Ultimately, Partonneaux, and all the men of his division who survived, laid down their arms during the night of the 27th. In the meantime Victor had taken refuge in a ravine, which terminated on the Beresina. There, on the 28th, with between 9,000 and 10,000 men, he defended himself against 40,000 Russians, under general Diebitch. The fighting continued all the day; and Victor lost 400 out of 700 or 800 cavalry, and 3,000 infantry. The Russian loss is said to have been double that amount. In the night, the French, who never fought more bravely, reached the bridges, carrying with them all their matériel, and all their cannon, except two pieces.

THE RETREAT FROM MOSCOW.
PASSAGE OF THE BEREZYNA.

The French who had passed to the right bank of the Beresina, were also attacked, on the 28th, by Tchichagoff's army, returned from the lower part of the river. Oudinot and Ney had 9,000 infantry and 1,500 cavalry, besides the guard, under Napoleon, which formed a reserve. Tchaplitz began the attack by charging Oudinot's force, who defended the right and centre. He was wounded very early, and then Ney took the command. The fighting continued till midnight, and ended by the Russians being withdrawn; each side having lost about 5,000 in killed and wounded.

Whilst this desperate fighting was going on on both sides of the river, the non-combatants kept rushing to the bridges, to cross to the other side; and such a scene of horrible confusion was probably never before presented. Repeatedly the passage of the bridges was blocked up by carriages being overturned, or getting locked together. The horses broke from them, and, with many cavalry horses without riders, flew wildly about: men, women, and children were precipitated into the river, and most of them were drowned. The shrieks were appalling; and we can well believe that it was, as we have seen it described, a "pandemonium of horrors." Victor's division—what remained of it—arrived at the bridges as night set in. With difficulty the soldiers forced a way for themselves; and very soon after they began to pass over the bridge for carriages, it broke. This increased the confusion; but the remains of the mixed multitude who had not crossed, then began to get tired, and overpowered by fatigue. The soldiers having all crossed, except the rear-guard, they tried in vain to induce the helpless crowd to pass over; and were compelled, at last, to leave them, in order to ensure their own safety. At length morning dawned. Napoleon had ordered the bridges to be destroyed at day-break (about 7 A.M.), to prevent Wittgenstein's army from gaining the right bank. He had entrusted the duty of destroying them to general Eblè, of the engineers, under whose able and energetic superintendence they had been erected. Seeing so many fugitives on the bank, he delayed, for two hours, carrying out his orders; during which time several hundreds crossed over. At length the Russians were seen, and he could delay no longer. Combustible materials had been placed under and upon the bridges, and they were immediately fired. The scene that ensued was heartrending. Many of the fugitives were crossing when the bridges took fire, and were enveloped in torrents of smoke and flame. Many were precipitated into the stream; others were carried in by the falling bridges; and all perished! Those who remained on the right bank sent up a cry of despair, for the Cossacks were amongst them. They put a few to death, and drove the remainder—between 6,000 and 7,000 men, women, and children—towards the Russian army. The booty taken by the Cossacks was immense. Much of the spoils of Moscow and other places had been in possession of the troops, the camp-followers, and fugitives. They had adhered to it as long as possible. Very little, however, was carried across the Beresina, and the Cossacks came in for the prize.

The French continued their retreat, followed by the Russians, who, on the 30th of November, the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd of December, made many prisoners, and took nearly all the French guns. The horses and carriages were also nearly all gone, and the emperor had to walk on foot. At night he bivouacked in the midst of the remains of the brave old guard. On the 3rd he reached Molodetchino, in Russian Poland, where he indited his 29th bulletin; which, like Kutusoff's account of the battle of Borodino, is very "uncandid." Whilst the advantages obtained over the Russians were represented as greater than they really were, nothing was said of his tremendous losses in men. He admitted, however, that the "army had need of its discipline being re-established, of recruiting itself, remounting its cavalry and artillery, and replenishing its stores." On the 5th of December he arrived at Smorgoni, another town of Russian Poland, 45 miles E.S.E. of Wilna. There, on the 6th, he called together in council, Murat, Eugene, Berthier, Ney, Davoust, Lefebvre, Mortier, and Bessièrès, and communicated to them his intention of leaving the army—an intention which he had previously made known to count Daru, who urged him to remain: but Napoleon feared that Germany would rise; that his retreat would be intercepted; and he could not bear the idea of being made prisoner. He told his generals, he quitted them, but it was to seek 300,000 more men. The Russians, he said, had little to do with the late disasters; and that peace was not concluded at Wilna or Smolensko, he attributed to the extraordinary blunders of the king of Westphalia and the duke of Abrantes. With all the disasters, "the campaign of Russia," he observed, "would always be considered as the most glorious, the most difficult, and the most honourable which modern history has recorded." He concluded by stating, that he should leave Murat, aided by Berthier, to exercise the chief authority over the army in his absence. The marshals heard him, at first, with disapprobation, and in silence; but before he finished, he almost persuaded them that he was right. Saying farewell, he left them, and immediately entered a calèche placed on a sledge. Caulaincourt accompanied him in the carriage; marshal Duroc and count Lobau were on the sledge; and on the box of the carriage were Rustan, his favourite Mameluke, and captain Wasowitz, of the Polish lancers, who acted as interpreter. At Miedniki, the duke of Bassano exchanged places with Caulaincourt, and the party proceeded on their way—Wilna being their first destination.

The sufferings of the army were very great after Napoleon departed. The cold was intense—27° and 31° below zero, with a clear sky, and a keen sharp wind, that penetrated everything. What little discipline had remained, soon vanished; all fraternity of arms, all the bonds of society, were forgotten and torn asunder; hunger and cold appeared to have subverted every human feeling. The strong fell upon the weak, and despoiled them; the dying were stripped before their fleeting breath had left their emaciated bodies; and the dead horses were torn in pieces to furnish food, for which the starving troops contended in dreadful animosity, literally tearing the morsels out of each other's mouths. Added to this, the Russians pursued them so closely, that scarcely a day passed on the route to Wilna, without men and guns being captured. Between the Beresina and Wilna, numerous recruits had joined the army; yet, when the fugitives entered that town, they did not amount to half the number which had crossed the river. At Wilna, there were magazines, plentifully supplied, and the fatigued and exhausted troops hoped there to have had some repose; but the Russians, now as rapid in their movements as they had been slow in the early days of the retreat from Moscow, came in sight, and they were obliged to resume their march; all the stores not consumed in their brief stay, being abandoned. They arrived at Wilna on the 9th, and left it on the 10th; and five miles from the town, what few guns and carriages remained with them, were abandoned; and the soldiers pillaged the treasure-chests, which Berthier had entreated count Daru to be careful and carry off from Wilna, and which were said to contain 10,000,000 francs. Murat had only 4,500 combatants when he arrived at Kowno, on the 11th; Ney, who brought up the rear, had about 1,000. At that place were a German garrison of 1,500 men, forty-two guns, and 2,500,000 francs in money. But the Cossacks, who entered Wilna as soon as the French had left it, were again upon them at Kowno. Ney and Girard, with muskets in their hands, animated the men, and drove the Cossacks from the gate of Wilna, which they had entered; and, with the assistance of the garrison, planted twenty-four pieces of cannon on the redoubts—with which the enemy was kept at bay. In the night the place was evacuated—Ney setting fire to the bridges over the Wilia and the Niemen; and being himself the last French soldier who quitted Russia, he walked alone across the forests to Gumbinnen, in East Prussia, where he joined Murat, who had arrived on the 17th of December. A few days after, several hundred men reached Königsberg, the sole remains of that mighty army which had invaded Russia—all the matériel, baggage, cannon, horses, and ammunition of that army, having been lost.

During this retreat, Macdonald, with the Prussian corps, under general York, was in the neighbourhood of Riga; and Schwartzberg and Regnier were in Southern Russia. After the French had crossed the Beresina, Wittgenstein was ordered, by Kutusoff, to cut off the retreat of the French and Prussians to the Niemen. They did not begin to retire from Riga till the 18th of December, when the French marched first, followed by the Prussians, at half a day's march distance. The latter were harassed by the garrison of Riga in their rear; and on the 25th of December, Diebitch, with 2,000 men, interposed between the two corps. As Wittgenstein's army was following close behind Diebitch, York was threatened in rear, front, and flank. Finding his position desperate, on the 30th of December he signed an armistice with Diebitch, agreeing to remain neutral, and, if the king permitted, to join the Russians. Macdonald continued his retreat, harassed by flying parties of the Russians, but was never brought to action, and he reached Königsberg on the 3rd of January, 1813. Schwartzberg also evacuated the Russian territory on the 7th of that month: Regnier soon after followed him.

Thus Russia was free from the enemy; but she had suffered immense loss. Her ancient capital, her "holy city" of Smolensko, and many towns and villages, were destroyed; the country was laid bare and devastated; and the loss of life, though nothing like that of the French, had been very great. During the latter part of their pursuit of the retreating army, owing to the cold, and the difficulty of obtaining supplies, the sufferings of the Russian troops had been almost equal to those of the enemy; and, in the middle of December, the effective force of the whole army did not exceed 100,000 men. On the 22nd of December, the emperor Alexander arrived at Wilna, where, aided by his brother, the grand-duke Constantine, he exerted himself to procure every requisite for his troops; to whom, on the last day of the year, he issued a spirited address, telling them, that they had acquired a title to the gratitude of Russia, and the admiration of the world. To Sir Robert Wilson, he complained, in confidence, bitterly of Kutusoff, who, he said, "had done nothing he ought to have done—nothing against the enemy that he could avoid. All his successes had been forced upon him;" but "the nobility of Russia had supported him, and insisted on his presiding over the national glory of the war." It was on the 26th of December that the emperor saw Sir Robert. Half-an-hour after he left him, he had to decorate Kutusoff with the order of St. George, which, he said, he "considered a trespass on the institution." He should feel too much humiliated were Sir Robert present at the ceremony; he had no choice, however, and must submit to a controlling necessity; but he "would not again leave his army; there should be no future opportunity for additional misdirection by the marshal." Alexander showered rewards upon his other officers, and also upon the troops; and issued a general amnesty to the Poles who had joined the insurrectionary movement, and declared for the independence of Lithuania.

The Russians estimate, that the French lost 125,000 men in the different engagements; and 100,000 by cold, disease, and hunger. They took forty-eight generals, 3,000 officers, and 190,000 privates, prisoners; and captured seventy-five eagles or stand of colours, and 929 cannon, exclusive of those which were thrown into the river or buried. These totals very nearly assimilate with those given by Bouterlin: and certainly, there never was a more complete wreck, than that of the "grand army" of France in this Russian campaign.

CLOUD; RESULTS OF THE CAMPAIGN.

WE have stated that Napoleon, the day before he arrived at Smolensko, received intelligence of a conspiracy which had been discovered at Paris; and it is the general opinion that this information greatly influenced his determination to return to France. It was organised by a man named Malet, who, born in 1754, and entering the army at an early age, distinguished himself in the wars of the revolution. He attained to the rank of commander of a battalion, of which he was deprived, for some alleged illegal practices at Civita Vecchia, in 1806; and, by the sentence of a commission of inquiry held at Paris in June, 1807, he was imprisoned. He appears to have conceived the first idea of the project he subsequently carried out, in 1808, during the absence of the emperor in Spain. The unexpected return of his majesty, early in 1809, prevented his bringing it to maturity; and it slumbered till Napoleon's absence in Russia—at a distance of many hundred miles from Paris—appeared to afford a favourable opportunity for its revival. It was a well-planned scheme, carried on with consummate audacity, and was very nearly being successful. With the aid of two accomplices—Lafon, an old abbé, also a prisoner, and Rateau, a young corporal, who was employed as a guard over him—more nominally than anything else, for the surveillance exercised was very slight—he forged a decree of the senate, proclaiming the death of the emperor, abolishing the imperial government, and declaring him (Malet) governor of Paris. Orders on the treasury for sums of money, and appointments of officers to various posts, were also forged. Provided with these papers, he had no difficulty in evading the guard set over him by the inspector of police, in whose custody he was; and dressing himself in the uniform of a general of brigade, he went to the house of Soulier, colonel of the 2nd regiment, told him that Napoleon had been killed before Moscow on the 7th of October, and produced the decree of the senate, with another, raising Soulier to the rank of general of brigade, accompanied with an order on the treasury for 100,000 francs for his use. Soulier joined him, professing to believe in his representations, if he did not really think them authentic. The adjutant-general Doucet was gained by similar means: the soldiers of the 2nd regiment, and the 10th cohort, believing the report of the emperor's death, obeyed the orders of Malet, and liberated generals Lahorie and Guidal, two republicans, who had been long detained; seized and imprisoned Savary, the minister, and Pasquier, the prefect of police; and induced Frochot, prefect of the department of the Seine, to order the Hôtel-de-Ville to be prepared for the provisional government. Malet went himself to the hôtel of general Hullins, the governor of Paris, and asking to see him in private, shot him in the face, and left him wounded, and bleeding. He had dispatched forged orders, addressed to the commanders of two other regiments in Paris, who implicitly obeyed him; and, by their means, he obtained the command of the principal military posts in the city, with the possession of the barriers, and he gave strict orders to let no one pass into the country. He thus had all Paris at his command, with the exception of the adjutant-general's office; and he went there with twenty-five men, to arrest Laborde, one of the officials. Doucet was present; and whilst Malet was talking with him, the inspector-general to the minister of police arrived, to receive some instructions relative to an Englishman, whom he had arrested by order of the duke of Rovigo. He saw Malet conversing with the adjutant-general, and immediately exclaimed—"This is my prisoner." Telling him that he had no right to leave his house without his (the inspector's) leave, the officer turned to Doucet, and said—"There is something wrong here I do not understand; arrest him, and I will go and inform the minister of police." Malet attempted to draw a pistol, but Doucet and Laborde rushed upon him, and he was secured. A little inquiry then unravelled the entire plot. The soldiers, informed that they had been deceived, returned to their allegiance much more cheerfully than they had left it, with shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" Very soon, the minister of police, and the other persons who had been imprisoned, were set at liberty; and Malet, Guidal, and Lahorie took their places. The next day the trio were shot on the plain of Grenelle; eleven of their co-conspirators were also executed—a most unnecessary exercise of the law's severity.

When Napoleon learnt the details of this conspiracy—which he did before he reached Smorgoni—they filled him with alarm, as they proved how faint his hold was upon the people of France. This thought mingled itself, during his journey, with those devoted to the few brave fellows he left behind him in Russia; and it would appear to have been predominant, from the first steps he took after his arrival in Paris. While his once brilliant army was suffering the most intense privations, and dying as fast, from fatigue and exhaustion, as from the hands of their enemies, he pursued his way to that capital, closely wrapped up in his furs, and preserving an impenetrable incognito. At Warsaw he stopped to address the Poles; and there he sent for the abbé de Pradt, to whom he made himself known. He is reported to have held a long conversation with the abbé, in which he frequently repeated the phrase—"From the sublime to the ridiculous is but one step." He asserted that the cold, and the cold alone, had occasioned the reverses he could not altogether deny; and told the abbé he should soon return to the Vistula with 300,000 men. At Dresden he also made himself known to the king of Saxony; and there leaving his sledge, he borrowed the carriage of his ambassador, M. de Saint Aignan, and posted on to Paris, where he arrived on the 18th of December. The empress received him affectionately, but with surprise. Maria-Louisa had quite supposed, when she married, that her husband was one whom fortune would never forsake. To her he repeated the same story he told the abbé de Pradt—that all had been brought about by the cold. The next day he received his ministers, and other great personages of his court; and with them he made the conspiracy of Malet his chief topic, blaming them for their remissness, awaiting their explanation with hauteur, and appearing to think the events in Russia of little importance compared with those which had taken place at home, and which threatened the permanence of his dynasty. With respect to this conspiracy, he asked questions, and made remarks, with a view to place his ministry in the wrong, and to avoid being questioned himself; and was especially wroth with them for not recollecting, when they supposed he was dead, that the empress and the king of Rome survived. The result of the interview was, that the ministers retired abashed and humiliated—all except prince Cambacérès. To him Napoleon expatiated on the effects of the cold; on the folly of Alexander in burning his own towns; on the personal dangers he had run, and those which he must still encounter; and, therefore, on the imperative necessity that existed for securing the crown to his son, in the event of his death. Before Cambacérés left, it was arranged, that M. Frochot, prefect of the Seine, who had displayed great credulity with respect to the Malet affair, should be arrested; and that, on the following day, the great public bodies should attend at the Tuileries, to present addresses to the emperor, congratulating him on his return.

On the 20th, the senate, the council of state, and the administrative bodies of the capital, attended at the Tuileries; and addresses were read, which were all of one purport, having been drawn up from hints suggested by Cambacérés. That from the senate, prepared by their president, Lacépède—"one of those writers," says Thiers, "who are ever ready to devote their pens to the service of those who are capable of rewarding them"—was the most striking. It congratulated the emperor on his "propitious return," and France, on that happy event; adverted to the Malet conspiracy, and severely condemned those who "had attempted to throw back the empire into the midst of that anarchy from which the genius of the emperor had rescued it." Having disposed of that subject, the address adverted to the one nearest Napoleon's heart, as follows:—"At the commencement of our old dynasties, the monarch, more than once, ordered that every Frenchman, of whatever rank, should bind himself, by a solemn oath, to observe fealty to the heir to the throne; and sometimes, when the age of the young prince permitted it, a crown was placed upon his head, as a sign of his authority, and the symbol of the perpetuity of the supremacy of his family." This course was recommended as one proper to be pursued under the new dynasty; and then a few words were added with respect to the Russian expedition; to the "barbarous conduct of the Russians" in burning their towns; to the alleged object of Napoleon in carrying on the war; to the hope of obtaining an equitable arrangement; and to the courage of the French troops, which, no doubt, was abundantly manifested. Napoleon briefly replied, asserting, that he considered it his duty, before all things, to secure the tranquillity and happiness of France, and to save her from the desolation of anarchy. He asked of heaven the gift of courageous magistrates, as well as of heroic soldiers; and although it was generally said, that the noblest form of death was that encountered on the field of honour, yet he contended, that the death of a magistrate perishing in defence of his sovereign, the throne, and the law, was more glorious still. The rallying-cry of their fathers was, "Le roi est mort—vive le roi!" In those few words were conveyed an intimation of the principal advantages of royalty. Having closed this part of his reply, by saying that he had studied the disposition manifested by the people in various ages—had reflected on what had taken place at various epochs of their history, and was prepared to do what was best for their welfare—the emperor briefly alluded to the war with Russia, which, he said, he had undertaken without animosity; and would gladly have spared her all the evils she had brought upon herself. "I might," said he, using more emphasis than he imparted into any other portion of his reply—"I might have armed against her a portion of her own population, by proclaiming the freedom of the serfs. This measure was frequently demanded of me; but I refused to adopt a course which would lead to the destruction of thousands of families." He again attributed the misfortunes of his army to the weather; and having concluded by thanking the senate, he replied to the council of state much to the same effect—except that he introduced rather an impassioned philippic against the "men who proclaimed the principle of insurrection as a duty; who paid court to the people, by inviting them to assume a sovereignty for which they were unfitted; who destroyed the sanctity of the laws, and the respect due to them, by making them depend not on the sacred principles of justice, but simply on the will of an assembly, composed of men entirely ignorant of the first principles of legislation, or of administration of politics, or of the art of war."

At this time, Napoleon was ignorant of the disastrous fate of his army; and having procured from the council of state a conviction of M. Frochot of a "want of presence of mind," with a recommendation for his removal from office, which he lost no time in carrying out, he took immediate steps to raise reinforcements to dispatch to the north. Before he left for Moscow, he had ordered the conscription for 1813 to be levied; and these men, to the number of 140,000, had all been assembled in the dépôts in the previous October. Here was a large army; but it was not sufficiently numerous for Napoleon's plans; and he set agents at work, to induce some of the cohorts of the national guard—whose terms of enrolment precluded them from being sent out of the country—to petition for leave to join the grand army. These agents succeeded much better than could have been expected. The number of cohorts that made the application was great: the permission they asked for was most readily granted, and confirmed by a decree of the senate. Napoleon thus obtained another 100,000 of the most vigorous and ablest men in France. He had formed his own estimate of the number of men still on the borders of Russia; and with the remains of the various corps under Ney, Victor, and Eugene; those of Macdonald and Augereau (the latter occupying the line of the Elbe); from 15,000 to 18,000 men, under general Grenier, who, selected from the old regiments of the army of Italy, had been stationed at Berlin; the Prussians, under d'York (of whose defection he was not aware); and the Austrians, under Schwartzberg—he calculated that there would be, on the lines of the Elbe, the Oder, and the Niemen, at least 200,000 men; and as, in three months' time, he could transport the 240,000 he had raised in France to join them, he expected, with this second large army of 440,000 men, to overawe Prussia and Austria, and to bring Alexander to terms.

The misfortunes which had befallen his army after he quitted it, were, however, soon known to him. They did not end at the Russian frontier. When Murat arrived at Königsberg with a few hundred men of the guards, the inhabitants displayed the utmost exultation. At that time, there were about 12,000 sick and wounded in the hospitals of that city, including numerous officers; and a fear that the inhabitants would rise, and that even these invalids would not be safe, induced Murat to send to Augereau, who immediately ordered one of his corps, under general Heudelet, to protect them. The inhabitants were thus held in check; but they are said—although some Prussians displayed considerable humanity, and evinced the greatest respect for men who had suffered so much—to have extorted, from men and officers, all the money they possessed, for food and clothing. The fugitives were soon, also, threatened by the Russians. At Wilna, Alexander had assumed the command of the army; and had ordered Wittgenstein to cross the Vistula, and pursue the French into Prussia. On the 13th of January, 1813, that general issued a proclamation to the Prussians; in which he told them, that “the Russians had avenged the infamous invasion of their territory, had annihilated the enemy who inundated it, and were now engaged in pursuing the scattered relics of that immense army. They crossed the frontiers of Prussia, solely to pursue the flying remains of the common foe—the enemy of the human race; and with no other object but to conquer a desirable and honourable peace. They came not as enemies, but friends; and whilst property would be held sacred, the most exact discipline would be preserved.” On the 15th and 16th, Wittgenstein's army crossed the Vistula, and advanced in two columns—one marching by Königsberg and Elbing, the other by Tilsit and Friedland, on Berlin. The Cossacks, and some light cavalry, under Platoff, also crossed the river, and moved on Dantzic, arriving before that fortress on the 24th of January, and immediately commencing its blockade. A third, under Tchichagoff, had crossed the Vistula earlier, marched through East Prussia, and arrived, in the middle of January, at Marienburg. A fourth, under the emperor himself, who was accompanied by Kutusoff, marched through Lithuania, and established itself at Plonzk, early in February.

A fifth, under Milaradovitch, Sacken, and Doctoroff, followed Regnier and Poniatowski, who were retiring towards the Upper Vistula. Of these corps, Wittgenstein's first came on the track of the enemy, whom he surprised at Marienwerder, near the Vistula, on the 16th of January. That place was prince Eugene's head-quarters, and he was obliged to evacuate it, leaving 1,000 prisoners, and losing 600 killed. Murat, who had retired to Posen, on that day resigned the command of the army, which prince Eugene was obliged to assume—if, indeed, the few troops he had at his disposal were worthy the name. At this time, the fortified posts on the Vistula, in the hands of the French troops, were well supplied with provisions. General Rapp, at Dantzic, having been joined by the Polish division Grandjeau, and Heudelet's corps (which Murat dispatched there from Königsberg), had 25,000 men under his command; but prince Eugene, at Posen, had little more than 10,000 French troops—of whom 1,800 were fresh recruits—1,200 Neapolitans, and 4,000 Bavarians. General Regnier, prince Berthier, and prince Schwartzberg, were at Warsaw, covering Posen on the right.

Notwithstanding the disasters of the French, the king of Prussia did not, at first, entertain the idea of abandoning his alliance with Napoleon. When his majesty heard of the defection of general d'York, he disowned his proceeding, and threatened to have him tried by a military commission. That threat, however, was not carried out; but he sent M. de Hatzfeldt to Paris, at once to clear his majesty from any supposed complicity with that officer, and to propose to the emperor the only terms, a compliance with which would prevent him from joining the enemies of France. These were—the removal of the Prussian court to Breslau, to take it out of the theatre of hostilities; liberty to increase the Prussian army; and the evacuation, by France, of the fortresses on the Oder.—Soon after his return from Russia, the emperor had caused it to be indirectly intimated to the Prussian monarch, that a more close alliance might be contracted between the two countries, by the marriage of the heir to the Prussian throne with a French princess: of this proposal, M. de Hatzfeldt was ordered to take not the slightest notice.—The position of the emperor Francis, as not merely the ally, but the father-in-law, of Napoleon, was at this time one of peculiar delicacy, as the interests of Germany and those of his son-in-law were quite opposed to each other. Under the advice of M. de Metternich, he resolved to maintain the French alliance; and as Napoleon wished to have at his court some distinguished Austrian diplomatist, M. de Bubna was sent to Paris, with instructions to inform the emperor, that his imperial master was faithful to his engagements; but, at the same time, to point out the desirableness of peace. Austrian envoys, at Berlin, Munich, and Dresden, were also ordered to enforce on the sovereigns of Prussia, Bavaria, and Saxony, the advantages of a peace concluded with a due regard to German interests; at the same time, the augmentation and organisation of the Austrian forces were commenced, in order that the emperor might be prepared for any emergency. Thus, at the commencement of 1813, Napoleon was surrounded by difficulties. Instead of the 200,000 men who, he expected, were holding the Russians in check, he had only a few thousand fugitives, unable to make a stand against the foe; and instead of obedient and willing allies, he had only counsellors, who proposed terms which they evidently meant should be the conditions of their continued allegiance.

Deep and most painful must have been his feelings at this period, but he concealed them under an air of icy indifference. He was, at first, greatly enraged at the departure of Murat from the army: however, he resolved, on consideration, to overlook it; and he announced the change of command in the Moniteur, in which journal, France was told, that "the king of Naples having been compelled to resign the command of the army through indisposition, he had transferred it to the hands of the viceroy. The latter was more accustomed to the conduct of a great administration, and had the emperor's entire confidence." Napoleon himself wrote to Eugene, authorising him to summon Grenier's corps from Berlin, and promising to dispatch him 60,000 men from France in a few days. As he was greatly in want of cavalry, the emperor ordered general Bourcier, who had been sent to Germany and Poland to purchase horses, to buy all the animals he could meet with, at any price, and to take them by force, if their owners refused to sell them. These were to be sent to Eugene, to mount some of his troops; and an earnest appeal was made to the princes of the Confederation of the Rhine to send cavalry to Posen.

Having given the necessary instructions to prince Eugene, the emperor employed himself in raising forces in France; in taking steps to open a negotiation for peace, through the mediation of Austria; in providing the ways and means to pay his troops; and in concluding an agreement with the pope, to whom he made overtures soon after his arrival at Paris. With regard to the army, he determined to increase his 240,000 men to 500,000. For this purpose he obtained, in January, a senatus consulte, which placed at his disposal 100,000 conscripts of the years 1809, 1810, 1811, and 1812, who ought to have been exempt from serving in the active army; and 150,000 more of the conscription for 1814. At that moment the conscription was most unpopular with the working classes; but amongst the higher ranks of society, there was, apparently, no desire to abandon the fortunes of Napoleon. The city of Paris setting the example, most of the large towns in the empire offered to supply, in numbers proportioned to their means, horsemen properly equipped; and the Moniteur was, for some time, filled with addresses from public functionaries and public bodies, professing the utmost loyalty, and offering their persons and property to test their affection for the Napoleonic dynasty. At a later period, the senate, by another senatus consulte, gave the emperor the disposal of an additional army of 180,000 men, which was to be raised "to increase the active force:" 10,000 out of the 180,000 equipped themselves at their own expense, and were called "mounted guards of honour." The sons of the nobility, and rich bourgeoisie, who hitherto had purchased exemption from military service by paying immense prices for substitutes, constituted these "guards;" and they were, says Thibaudeau, "hostages, who would be a security to the emperor that their families would not form conspiracies in the interior of the empire." This drain upon the population had serious effects upon the industrial resources of France.

Before he summoned his legislative body to consider financial matters, Napoleon, in January, held a council, composed of the duke de Bassano, the arch-chancellor (Cambacérès), the prince de Talleyrand, M. de Caulaincourt, the duke of Cadore, M. le Bernardiere, and M. d'Hauterive (the two latter of whom were the chief secretaries of the department of foreign affairs). His object in consulting these personages was, to receive their advice upon the state of Europe, and the measures best calculated to put an end to the existing struggle. When they met, the emperor briefly addressed them. He said he desired peace; but he did not fear war, as, "in spite of the losses caused by the rigour of the climate, the resources of the empire were still large." He represented Austria, Prussia, and Denmark as faithful to their engagements—Prussia being about to bring general d'York to a court-martial for signing the armistice. Russia had need of peace; and, though greatly influenced by England, he did not think she would persist in a struggle which must end in her discomfiture. The question was, after having made arrangements for the development of their forces, whether they should offer terms, or wait till proposals were made to them? And, if they resolved upon the former course, whether direct negotiations should be opened with Russia, or whether they should seek the mediation of Austria? Every member of the council offered his opinion; and all were in favour of peace; but, as to the course to be pursued to obtain it, a vote was taken, as they were not unanimous. Three—MM. de Caulaincourt, Cambacérès, and Talleyrand—were for at once opening a communication with Russia; the other four were in favour of Austrian mediation. That course the emperor resolved to adopt; and after an interview with M. Bubna, he wrote an autograph letter to his father-in-law, stating his desire for peace, and his wish to have the Austrian mediation exerted at the different belligerent courts. He then stated the terms to which only he would agree. They were—that Rome, Piedmont, Tuscany, Holland, and the Hanseatic department were to remain part of the empire; that he might be willing to enlarge the Russian territory, but would permit no territorial aggrandisement on the part of Prussia; that Joseph was to keep Spain; Murat, Naples; Portugal was to go to the house of Braganza, and Sicily to the Bourbons; whilst England, if she agreed to make peace, would possess all the French colonies beyond the seas.—Austria would not accept the office of mediator on these terms; though the emperor wrote in an affectionate style, and informed Francis that his grandson was about to be crowned king of Rome, and his daughter would be made regent of France—a piece of information, which, if gratifying in one respect, as regarded his daughter and her child, was the very reverse in another, as it must bring with it the memory of his misfortunes and humiliation.

Next to enlisting troops, it was necessary to find the means of paying them—no very easy matter, as the resources of France were very much exhausted. The estimated amount of the revenue for 1812, was 1,030,000,000 francs (£41,200,000); the receipts were, 992,000,000 francs (£39,200,000). To this deficiency of 38,000,000 francs, was to be added a deficit of 46,000,000 francs, in 1811; and, as the budget for 1813 was estimated at 1,270,000,000 francs, a further deficit of 149,000,000 francs was expected. M. Molliou, the secretary of the treasury, was greatly disconcerted at this state of things, as there appeared to be no reasonable means of augmenting the national income. The taxes, whether direct or indirect, were considered to have reached the highest points at which they could be rendered productive; whilst the notorious contraction of the means of the bankers, merchants, and traders—of all engaged in commercial pursuits—rendered the resort to a loan, if not impossible, still very unlikely to be attended with success. Napoleon was himself in possession of 160,000,000 francs in coin, in the cellars of the Tuileries, and in the balance of the domaine-extraordinaire. This sum was the fruit of savings of the civil-list, and of the extraordinary contributions from foreign states. M. Molliou wished the emperor to place it at his command; but Napoleon objected to deprive himself of the ready-money he had amassed, and which he expected might be necessary for his purposes; and the minister accused him privately of personal avarice—a vice which does not appear to have been Napoleon's failing. This was the state of matters when the legislative body met.

Napoleon opened the session of that body on the 24th of February; and his speech, on the occasion, was especially devoted to the censure of England, and to the Russian campaign, the disasters of which he could not conceal, though he attributed them all to one cause. "Success the most brilliant," he said, "in the first instance, attended our arms; but the excessive rigours and premature approach of winter, brought frightful calamities on the army. In a few nights I beheld everything changed. I have experienced great losses; they would have broken my heart, if, in such circumstances, I could have been alive to any other considerations but the interest, the glory, and the future destiny of my people. The agents of Great Britain spread among all our neighbours the spirit of revolt against their sovereigns. England would wish the entire continent to become the prey of civil war; but Providence has determined that she shall be the first victim of the passions she would spread amongst others. The joy of our enemies, and above all, of England, has reached its height: but misfortunes have proved the strength of the empire: the energy of my people has brought them back to a more just appreciation of things. My differences with the pope have been happily terminated by a concordat: the French dynasty reigns, and shall reign, in Spain. I am satisfied with the conduct of all my allies. I will abandon none of them. I will maintain the integrity of their states. The Russians shall retreat to their terrible climate. I desire peace: it is necessary to the world. On four different occasions, since the rupture of the peace of Amiens, I have solemnly made offer of it to my enemies; but I will never conclude a treaty save on terms honourable and suitable to the grandeur and interests of my empire." He alluded to, and rejoiced at, the war between the United States and England. "The wishes of the world," he said, "accompany the States in this glorious struggle. If they terminate it by compelling the enemies of the continent to acknowledge the principle that the flag covers the merchandise and the crew, and that neutrals ought not to be subjected to a paper blockade, in conformity to the stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht, America will have deserved well of all nations: posterity will say that the Old World had lost its rights, and that the New World has recovered them."

Before count Molé, the minister of finances, brought forward his measures for raising the necessary ways and means, M. Montalivet, the minister of the interior, presented to the legislative body a very minute report on the state of the empire. It appeared, that the population of what might be considered old France, estimated at 25,000,000 at the time of the revolution, had increased, notwithstanding the internal bloodshed and external wars, to 28,700,000; and, in the midst of the popular mourning for the loss of life in the Russian expedition—a loss affecting almost every family in France—M. Montalivet said—"The conscription itself, which, every year, made the élite of the youth rally round the standards of the empire, had contributed to the increase of the population, by multiplying the number of marriages, and favouring them, because it fixed, for ever, the lot of the young Frenchmen who obeyed the law on this subject." The additions made to the empire were enumerated, which increased its population and its resources. Those, in opposition to popular complaints, were stated to be flourishing; the industry of France at that time, and its products, far exceeding what they were in 1788, or any time after that date: this was attributed to favourable changes introduced by the revolution, and to that good order which was the work of the emperor. A large portion of this report was devoted to a detail of public works—roads, bridges, fortifications, harbours, public buildings, &c., which had been carried on since the accession of Napoleon to office as first consul. In the twelve years, 1,005,000,000 francs had been expended on these works, all of them of utility or ornament, and many combining both qualities. Out of this large sum, 62,000,000 francs had been expended on the palaces, and other buildings belonging to the crown. The financial and military resources were enlarged upon in the report; though the minister was compelled to acknowledge a deficit in the former, on the three years, 1811, 1812, and 1813, of 233,000,000 francs.

To cover that deficiency, as the taxes could not be increased, count Molè proposed, that he should be authorised to sell all the heritable property of the communes;—exempting woods, pastures, public buildings, public walks—everything that was enjoyed by the people in common; but including lands, houses, manufacturing establishments—all that was let to individuals or firms at a specified rent. So extensive were these possessions of the communes, that it was estimated they would yield 370,000,000 francs. For whatever sum they did bring, the communes were to be entered as creditors on the national books, and receive interest for the same. The purchasers were to pay for their purchases in three equal instalments, in 1813, 1814, and 1815; paying an interest of five per cent. on the sums left unpaid. Paper money was to be issued to the amount of the two instalments to be paid in 1814 and 1815, which was to be redeemed as the receipts for the sale of the commercial property were realised. In submitting this proposal, M. Molè compared the conduct of Napoleon to that of Charlemagne, who "ordered the sale of the superfluous herbs in his garden, when his hand was distributing to his people the spoil of conquered nations." And having taken a review of the state of the empire as developed in the report of M. Montalivet, he said—"If a man of the age of the Medici, or of Louis XIV., were to revisit the earth, and, at the sight of so many marvels, were to ask how many years of peace and glorious reigns had been required to produce them, he would be answered, twelve years of war, and a single man." But without those wars, the immense sum named in the preceding paragraph could not have been expended on public works. It was the forced contributions exacted from the countries overrun by the French armies, that enabled Napoleon to do so much to attract the notice, and win the applause, of the French people. The legislative body agreed to the proposal of count Molè; but very small sums, owing to the state of public feeling, and the uncertainty of public affairs, were realised from the sales; and before the close of the year, that body had largely to increase the indirect, and add thirty per cent. to the direct, taxes.

In his speech to the legislative body, the emperor told the members that he had concluded a concordat with the pope. Pius VII., subsequently to his removal to Fontainebleau, had been kept under strict surveillance, but treated with the greatest respect. It was not the aim of Napoleon to injure the Roman catholic religion, or to lessen the power and influence of the pope over the Roman catholic world. But he wanted to direct that influence and power for his own benefit, and the exaltation of France. Had he been successful in his Russian and German campaigns, the pope would have been installed in Paris; he would have been lodged in the archbishop's palace of that city; and the sacred college, the office of propaganda, the penitentiary, the archives, would all have been collected round Nôtre-Dame. Rome would have become quite a secondary consideration, and the pope would have exerted his influence on the governments and people of Spain, Portugal, Germany, and Poland, as well as upon the members of his church in England and other countries—all for the benefit of the emperor of France, who would, in fact, have directed its exercise at his pleasure. Such was Napoleon's plan; and he told the bishop of Nantes, to the surprise of that prelate, who had no key to his real designs, that "the policy of his government was intimately bound up with the maintenance of the spiritual authority of the pope. He required that the pontiff should be more powerful than ever: he would never have as much influence as his policy required he should possess." When that prelate understood him better, he had only to say to his imperial majesty, "that measure attacks the catholics and the church;" and it was instantly suspended. All these projects were arrested by the disasters of the Russian campaign; and, before he commenced another, Napoleon resolved to endeavour to come to terms with the pope. Accordingly, on the 1st of January, he sent to compliment his holiness upon the commencement of the new year; and, on the 19th, leaving the Tuileries with the intention of engaging in the chase, he suddenly changed his mind, and went to Fontainebleau. On being admitted to the presence of Pius, he embraced him, and called him "father;" and, in a long conversation, succeeded in making himself very agreeable. The next day the pope returned the visit, and was introduced to Maria-Louisa. Negotiations followed, conducted by cardinals Doria and Dugnani on the part of the pope, and the bishop of Nantes on the part of Napoleon. They ended in a concordat, which was signed by the pope on the 25th of January, and published, as a law of the state, on the 13th of the following month.

By this concordat, which contained eleven articles, it was stipulated—1st. That the pope should exercise his pontifical functions in France and Italy, after the manner of his predecessors.—2nd. That his ambassadors, and their officers, should enjoy the same immunities and privileges as the members of the diplomatic body.—3rd. That his unalienated domains should be free from taxes; and 2,000,000 francs be paid annually, as an indemnity for the property sold in the Roman states.—4th. The emperor to nominate to the vacant bishoprics in his empire; the pope to induct the nominees in six months; but, if he neglected or refused, the archbishop of the province, or in the event of his failing, the senior bishop, to confer induction.—5th. The pope to nominate in ten dioceses in France or in Italy, as he might prefer, that he might have the means of recompensing the servants of his government.—6th. Six suburban sees (which had been suppressed) to be restored, and the pope to have the right of nomination.—7th. The expelled bishops of the Roman sees to retain their titles, under the form of bishops in partibus, and receive incomes equal to the revenues of their several sees.—8th. The emperor and the pope to take measures for the reduction of the bishops in Tuscany and Genoa; and the creation of others in Holland and the Hanseatic department.—9th. The offices of propagandism, of the penitentiary, and the archives, to be established at the residence of the pope.—10th. The emperor to award a free pardon to various ecclesiastics and laymen who had incurred penalties from recent events.—11th. His holiness consented to the conditions, from the confidence he had in the good disposition of his majesty to relieve the numerous wants then manifested by the church.—In addition to the terms of the concordat, the pope agreed to live at Avignon; and to transfer to that city from Rome, all the papal establishments.

There were great rejoicings in France at the conclusion of the concordat; and the Te Deum was chanted in all the churches, to celebrate the event. But the pope had scarcely affixed his signature, ere he repented having done so. His cardinals also urged upon him the impropriety of assenting to a document by which he resigned much of his temporal power, and greatly curtailed his spiritual authority. Influenced by these representations, and his own feelings, on the 24th of March, Pius wrote a letter to the emperor, confessing that he had done wrong, and that, with the aid of the Lord, he wished his act should be altogether annulled, in order that no damage might thence arise to the church, or injury to his own soul. "The concession made in one of the articles," he said, "was unjustifiable in the sight of God and man: for what regulation could infringe so deeply on the original constitution of the church of Christ—who established the primacy of St. Peter and his successors—as that which subjected the power of the pope to that of a metropolitan?—empowering the latter to give induction to bishops whom the supreme pontiff had deemed unworthy to receive it; thus rendering an inferior functionary judge over the head of the church." In conclusion, his holiness proposed to annul the concordat, and reopen the negotiation. The only answer Napoleon gave, was again to publish the document, as a law obligatory on all archbishops, bishops, and chapters. At the same time, another decree was published, by which cognizance of all cases, technically termed "appeals on abuses," hitherto confined to ecclesiastical tribunals, was transferred to the ordinary courts of the empire; which were, also, to take cognizance of all infractions of the concordat. The "grand judge" was ordered to draw up a form of process for all such cases. The disavowal of the concordat by the pope prevented his removal from Fontainebleau, where he continued to reside, under surveillance, as before.

While Napoleon was occupied with recruiting his army, regulating his finances, and re-establishing his relations with the pope, affairs were coming to a crisis in Germany and Prussia. Early in February the Austrians evacuated Warsaw, and retired entirely from Lithuania; and Regnier was obliged to follow them. They were immediately replaced by the Russians. At Kalisch, the most western town of Russian Poland, Wittgenstein, with a large detachment of Russian horse, overtook Regnier and his Saxons, attacked and broke up his division, separating the horse from the foot, and forcing the former to retreat on the southern parts of Poland, where they sought protection of the retiring Austrians; and the latter were driven back, in the direction of Glogau. Eugene, finding that Posen was no longer tenable, evacuated that position on the 12th: on the 18th he was joined by general Grenier and his corps, from Berlin; and he marched upon that city, where he established his head-quarters, the king and court having previously retired to Breslau. The continued advance of the Russians compelled the viceroy to evacuate the Prussian capital on the 2nd of March; and having thrown 3,000 men into the fortress of Spandau, he retreated in the direction of Wittenberg, and cantoned his forces behind the Elbe, supported by that fortress and by Torgau and Magdeburg. Here, by collecting all the scattered troops, he succeeded in concentrating about 40,000 men for the defence of the Elbe—considered a great military barrier; the fortresses on the Oder, at the same time, were well provisioned and garrisoned.

These events created an immense sensation in Prussia and Germany, and in all the provinces annexed to France. Between the Rhine and the Elbe—in Holland and Westphalia, at Bremen and Hamburg—the appearance of English fleets, and the continued advance of the Russians, caused the populace to make frequent demonstrations of hostility to the French. At Hamburg and other places, open disturbances broke out, and the French authority was defied; whilst in Holland, the cry of "Orange Boven" was frequently heard. In Prussia, the greatest joy was evinced at the retreat of the French; and the inhabitants of Berlin received the Cossacks with enthusiastic shouts.

Frederick William had retired from Berlin to Breslau, on the 25th of January; and, soon after his arrival there, he opened communications with the emperor Alexander, who, about the middle of February, established his head-quarters at Kalisch. On the 10th of that month he had issued a proclamation, dated from Warsaw, in which he particularly invited the princes of the Confederation of the Rhine to throw off the yoke of subserviency to France. By another proclamation, from Kalisch, dated the 22nd, he called on the inhabitants of Germany to rise en masse against Napoleon. The people were not slow in responding to this call; and urged by these demonstrations, as well as by those of his own people—Napoleon having refused to accede to the proposals he had sent to him by M. de Hatzfeldt—the king of Prussia, on the 28th of February, signed, at Kalisch, a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with the czar. By this treaty, Alexander was to bring 150,000 men, and the king of Prussia 80,000, into the field, independent of the garrisons of various strong places, which it was necessary to defend. The contracting powers were jointly to make efforts to induce the emperor of Austria to join their alliance; and to treat with England, from which country Frederick William hoped to get those supplies of money, in the shape of subsidies, which were absolutely necessary to enable him to complete his armaments. Neither of the contracting powers were to conclude a treaty or truce without the sanction of the other; and, by a secret article, the emperor Alexander engaged not to lay down his arms till the kingdom of Prussia was restored, in every respect, to the position it occupied previously to the war of 1806, and by uniting the old provinces to Silesia, and other measures, it had attained that consistency and power, which would restore it to the rank of a first-rate European state, and render it an effectual bulwark of the Russian empire. On the 15th of March, an interview took place between the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, at Breslau. The former arrived, accompanied by M. de Nesselrode and a number of generals; and the two monarchs embraced in public, amid the shouts of the soldiers and the people. So eager were the latter to show their enmity to France, that they rushed to the house of M. de St. Marsan, the French ambassador, who had accompanied the king to Breslau; and his majesty had to surround the mansion by his own guard, to preserve his excellency from violence. On the 17th of March, M. de Hardenberg, the Prussian minister, transmitted a declaration of war by Prussia against France, to M. de St. Marsan; and, with many expressions of personal esteem and regret, wished him to leave Breslau at an early period.

The proclamation of the emperor of Russia to the princes of the Confederation of the Rhine, was followed by the advance of the Russian army—now under the command of Wittgenstein, Kutusoff having died of malignant typhus fever, at Buntzlau—upon Dresden; and attempts were made to detach the king, Frederick Augustus, from his alliance with Napoleon. He remained firm to the engagements into which he had entered; and as he found he could not defend his capital, he left it on the 24th of February, having on the previous day addressed a proclamation to his people; in which he said—"Faithful to our alliance, we reckon, with confidence, on the success which, if our wishes for peace are not heard, will await us, from the aid of our powerful ally, the active succour of the confederated princes, and the approved valour of our brave soldiers." The capital of Saxony was occupied by the Russian troops; and the king of Prussia addressed an autograph letter to Frederick Augustus—expressing a hope that "he, and all the confederated princes, would seize with eagerness the opportunity which presented itself, of shaking off the chains of France." The king of Saxony, however, replied, that "he was guided solely by a regard for the good of his dominions, and respect for the engagements which he had contracted;" and he refused to abandon the alliance, which, under more favourable auspices, he had contracted with the emperor of France. Nor could the emperor of Austria be induced, by the efforts of the Russian and Prussian ministers, at that time, to break openly with Napoleon. But advances were made towards the alliance which was soon afterwards formed. And whilst an armistice was agreed upon between Schwartzemberg and Wittgenstein—the former returning to Vienna, from whence he was sent as ambassador to France—M. Metternich told M. Otto, the French ambassador at Vienna, that Austria would not support the emperor as president of the Confederation of the Rhine, nor unite with him in an attempt to resuscitate Poland. M. Otto himself was deeply impressed with a conviction that the Austrian government was really hostile to France. He informed Napoleon, that the declaration of M. de Metternich did not indicate the entire policy of that government, which, he was of opinion, would not be confined to inaction. That government, however, made an effort to restore peace. M. de Wessenberg was sent to London, and M. Lebzettern to Kalisch, to offer the intervention of the court of Vienna with England and Russia, for the purpose of bringing about an understanding with France. The envoys were courteously received, and told, that both powers were desirous of peace; but the declarations of the emperor Napoleon proved that he would refuse all reasonable conditions.

In March, the enemies of France were further increased by another accession to the alliance against Napoleon. Bernadotte had written to the emperor, offering his mediation for the conclusion of a general peace. Pending the reply, efforts were made to detach Denmark from her engagements to France. An indemnity for Norway was offered to her, and other inducements; which led to a proposal, made at Kalisch, by count Moltke and count Bernstorff—that, if the fleet taken at Copenhagen, and the colonies captured by England, were restored; Hamburg and Lübeck made over to her, and £600,000 paid as an indemnity for the bombardment of Copenhagen, Denmark would join the European alliance. These terms were at once rejected; Denmark remained connected with France; but Sweden formally joined the “grand alliance” of England, Russia, and Prussia, and engaged to send an auxiliary force of 30,000 men, to be commanded by the prince-royal, and employed with the armies of the two latter powers, in the north of Germany. England, in consequence of Sweden’s thus acceding to the coalition against France, agreed to cede Guadaloupe to that power, and to grant her a subsidy of £1,000,000 per annum, payable monthly. Denmark then joined France; and the troops of that power marched out of Altona, and were united to those of marshal Davoust.

While these events were in progress, a royal decree was issued by the king of Prussia, absolving general d’York from all blame with respect to the convention he had concluded with general Diebitch; and, on the 19th of March, a most important convention was signed between that sovereign and the emperor of Russia. It consisted of four articles. By the first, the contracting sovereigns agreed to issue a proclamation, declaring their sole object to be, “to rescue Germany from the domination of France;” and all the small sovereigns were invited to join them, under the penalty of losing their territories. The other articles provided the means by which the specified object was to be attained; one of which was, to organise in all the countries between Saxony and Holland, except the possessions of the house of Hanover, and the ancient Prussian provinces, an army of the line, and a levy en masse. Prussia herself had the means of raising a formidable force. The treaty with France bound her not to keep on foot an army of more than 40,000 men. But the war minister, colonel Schernhorst, while he adhered to that agreement literally, evaded it in the spirit. He enlisted 40,000; and kept them under their colours long enough to acquire the drill, and accustom themselves to discipline; then they were sent to their homes in sections, to be ready to serve when called upon; and their places were supplied by fresh recruits. This practice was constantly kept up; so that when the king felt himself compelled to break with Napoleon, he had—not 40,000, but at least 120,000 good soldiers. Such was the spirit of the men, that those at home were quite as ready to serve as those in the ranks. This minister also instituted the Prussian landwehr, or army of reserve—a force resembling our militia, except that their term of service in time of peace was somewhat longer. This considerably augmented Prussia’s military strength.

The convention of the 19th of March was followed, on the 23rd, by a proclamation from the Russian generals, announcing, that the Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved. It was not long before its members, once so enthusiastic for Napoleon, rallied round the black eagles; the duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin being the first to set the example of quitting a league, into which he had been the last and the most unwilling to enter. The desire to get rid of all traces of the French domination, now spread alike among princes and people. To stimulate still further the patriotic spirit, the king of Prussia instituted a new order of knighthood, called the Order of the Iron Cross, with which those who displayed most ardour and achieved most success in the cause of Germany, were to be decorated. The king of Prussia and the emperor Alexander appeared in public, decorated with the cross of this order; and the spirit of chivalry thus stimulated, soon pervaded all classes. From the highest to the lowest they took up arms; the scholar and the artist, the mechanic and the farmer, forsook their pursuits, and rallied round the national standard; and the women, who could not bear arms, sent their ornaments of gold and precious stones to the treasury of the nation; receiving, in return, bijouterie, of the comparatively common metal of iron, but made in a high style of art, and bearing the inscription—"I gave gold for iron, 1813." Such was the spirit which pervaded Austria, Prussia—all Germany—in that memorable year.

These events could not be concealed from Napoleon; and he took what measures appeared to him to be most likely to counteract them. His ministers at the courts of the princes of the Confederation of the Rhine, were instructed to use every means to keep those sovereigns faithful to their alliance with France: Davoust was sent to retake Hamburg, from whence the French had been expelled; prince Eugene was reinforced; strong corps d'armée were dispatched towards Germany, and posted so as to be able to keep up communication with each other, and to threaten their opponents in the most assailable positions; and strenuous efforts were made to induce the emperor of Austria to be faithful to his engagements. As Napoleon thought that M. Otto was not competent to cope with M. Metternich, whose diplomatic abilities were becoming more and more apparent—he recalled the former from Vienna, and replaced him by the count de Narbonne, who arrived at the Austrian capital a few days before prince Schwartzberg quitted it on a special mission to Paris. The new ambassador was the equal of Metternich in talent, and possessed, in addition, the most polished courtly manners; but he felt, soon after his arrival at Vienna, the difficulty of his position; and though he did not neglect anything to ensure success, he never anticipated that he should achieve it.

In making these preparations, the close of March had arrived; and Napoleon determined that, in the middle of April, he would set out for the seat of war. He was full of confidence in the result of his vast combinations abroad; and applied himself during the time still left for him to remain at Paris, in making arrangements for the satisfactory administration, during his absence, of affairs at home. He had intended to have his son crowned king of Rome, but that was considered unadvisable in the existing state of affairs. He therefore nominated Maria-Louisa regent; her adviser being the arch-chancellor Cambacérès, who, in all administrative matters, had the emperor's entire confidence. A council of regency was also constituted, composed of the princes of the blood, the uncles of the emperor, and the princes, high members of the French government—who were not reigning over any dominions beyond the limits of the empire. This council was to be consulted on all affairs of state; but it had only a deliberative voice; all administrative and executive power was vested nominally in the regent—really, in the arch-chancellor, who was the head of the council. All official acts were to have his signature; and Champigny, duke de Cadore, was appointed secretary to the regency. The empress was officially invested with her new dignity on the 30th of March.

It was only two days before Napoleon left Paris, that prince Schwartzberg arrived. M. de Bubna had previously left that capital; the emperor having requested that he would return to Vienna, and endeavour to impress the government there with the conviction, that Austria's wisest and best course was to share the fortunes of France. He gave prince Schwartzberg a friendly audience before he left the Tuileries, in which he endeavoured to imbue him with the same idea. He talked long to the prince, telling him, that he had eleven or twelve hundred thousand men under arms in France, Germany, Italy, and Spain; that he should crush the Russian and Prussian forces, and drive them beyond the Vistula; and that now was the time for Austria to declare in favour of France, by which means she might ensure peace, and render it fast and certain. As an inducement, he offered to give her Silesia and Illyria. Prince Schwartzberg endeavoured to persuade Napoleon, that it was not quite so certain as he appeared to think, that the issue of the war would be favourable; but, producing no impression, he said nothing which could commit his government to Napoleon's views. In fact, he was sent rather to discover what those views were, than to explain the policy of Austria; except that he was authorised to state, that she would not draw the sword unless it were to obtain peace—a peace which would be advantageous to the interests of Germany.

This interview ended without the slightest result. At its close, Napoleon sent off couriers to his allies, the grand-duke of Baden, the prince-primate, the duke of Würzburg, the kings of Würtemberg, Bavaria, and Saxony, calling upon them to prepare their contingents: he especially asked for all the cavalry at their disposal; and requested the king of Saxony, who had retired to Prague, to send a corps of 2,400 cavalry he had with him to marshal Ney. These arrangements made, he left Paris on the 15th of April, his empress being in a state of great agitation, almost of despair, at the separation; but he himself was full of hope and confidence, and never entered upon a campaign with more decided anticipations of success.

At the close of March, the Prussian troops were distributed as follows. An army of 22,500 foot, and 2,500 cavalry, under marshal Blücher, was in Silesia. D'York was in East Prussia, nominally with 15,000 men, but 6,000 of them were on the sick and invalid list. Bulow had 10,000 near Berlin; there were 5,000 in Pomerania; and the various forts had all numerous and effective garrisons. These corps were constantly receiving reinforcements; and before May came in, Frederick William expected that he should have at least 80,000 effective troops under his banners. The Russian army was stationed between Berlin and Magdeburg; and along the course of the Elbe from the latter fortress, and threatening Dresden. The first division of 36,000 men was under Wittgenstein; the second, of 33,000, under Tettenheim, Chernicheff, Woronzoff, and Milaradovitch. Barclay de Tolly, with 20,000 men, was engaged in the blockade of Dantzic, Zamosc, and Thorn, on the Vistula; and a reserve of 70,000 men was forming in Poland, under the orders of Sacken. The number of the two armies ready for immediate action, appears to have been about 50,000 Prussians, and 70,000 Russians. As, however, the fortresses of Magdeburg, Wittenberg, Torgau, and Königstein, on the Elbe, had to be blockaded, the allies could not rely upon the services of more than 90,000 men in the field. Opposed to them were prince Eugene, at Posen; Ney, with five divisions, at Erfurth; Marmont, with six divisions, at Gotha; Bessières, with six battalions of the old, and sixteen of the new, guard, at Eisenach; Bertrand, with three divisions, at Coburg; and Oudinot, with his own corps and a Bavarian division, at Saalfeld. These divisions were within easy marches of each other; and their united numbers could not be less than 170,000 men: 300 pieces of cannon were attached to the various corps.

The first campaign of 1813 may be said to have commenced about the middle of April, when Blucher and York, with their divisions, marched to the Elbe; crossed that river; advanced to Dresden, of which they took possession, and, being joined by the Russians, under Wittgenstein and Winzingerode, they spread themselves over a great part of Saxony—Wittgenstein being at Rotha; Blucher at Borna; and Winzingerode at Leipsic. Prince Eugene, as the allies advanced, found himself obliged to retire; and he took up a position behind the Saale—his left being posted at the junction of that river with the Elbe; his centre at Bernburg; and his right was protected by the Hartz mountains. The effect of these movements—connected with the defeat of a division of 3,000 French, under Morand, by the Cossacks, at Lüneburg—caused a general insurrection in the districts of the Elbe and the Weser—the Hanse Towns expelling the French authorities; and the people of Hanover returning, with shouts of joy, to their allegiance to the king of England, whose restored sovereignty was proclaimed throughout the province.

Napoleon arrived at Mayence on the 16th of April. He remained there till the 24th, being employed in seeing the fortifications of that place made effective, and in sending off reinforcements to the various divisions of his army. On the 25th he reached Erfurth, where he found Ney had been joined by the corps of Bertrand and Marmont; and also by Macdonald, with the remains of the division with which he had escaped from Russia. On the 29th, this division was joined by that of prince Eugene, and the emperor gave directions for concentrating all the scattered corps on Leipsic. On the 30th, marshal Ney attacked a Prussian corps at Weissenfels, five leagues south-west of Leipsic, which was compelled to retire: prince Eugene, at the same time, forced back general Kleist's Prussians at Halle; and the allies, who were astonished at the celerity of Napoleon's movements, resolved to concentrate their troops, and arrest his march upon Leipsic.

The country between Weissenfels and Leipsic, is a wide, undulating plain, called the plain of Lutzen, on which several villages are scattered. The French marched towards this plain on the 1st of May. They had to pass the defile of Grünebach, where they found the allies strongly posted on the heights of Poserna. They were attacked, and the passage forced; but with a serious loss to the French—one of their best generals, marshal Bessières, being killed by a cannon-ball early in the engagement. Napoleon slept at Lutzen that night; the young guard bivouacked round the tomb of Gustavus Adolphus, who lost his life in an engagement with the Austrians on that plain, on the 6th of November, 1632; and a part of the infantry, under general Souham, was quartered in the villages of Gross-Girschen, Klein-Girschen, Rahna, and Kaia, which are near each other on the plain. The next morning the allies crossed the White Elster—a river which, rising in Bohemia, passes near Leipsic to the Saale—and attacked the French in their positions, driving them out of the villages with great impetuosity. Couriers were sent to Napoleon to demand reinforcements; and whilst the villages were set on fire and blazed rapidly, the French continued to retreat. Ney was the first who came up to the support of Souham. He had with him the three divisions Brennier, Girard, and Marchand; and by a brilliant charge of the bayonet, the allies were driven back from the ground which the French had previously occupied. Wittgenstein brought up his reserves, and again the French were repulsed. Napoleon himself then appeared, and restored the fortunes of the day—but not without a hard struggle, which continued four hours—both armies fighting under the eyes of their emperors and king. The allies had the advantage in cavalry, of which they made very little use—the French in artillery; and it was the damaging fire kept up from their guns, that at last won the day, and forced the allies to retire. This they did in good order, in the direction of Pegau, a town on the Elster. They recrossed that river, and marched on Dresden, not leaving a gun or a wounded man behind. They reached that city on the 7th; but, without halting, passed on, and occupied a strongly intrenched position at Bautzen, on the Spree.

Different estimates have been given of the number of men engaged at Lutzen; some giving the French, others the allies, the superiority in numbers. The most precise accounts, and those which appear to be founded on official details, state that the French had 115,000 in the battle; the Russians 35,775, and the Prussians, 36,150—total, 71,925: giving the French a large superiority. The loss on their side was enormous. Jomini says, that "Ney's corps alone had 12,000 privates and 500 officers killed and wounded." He adds—"The number of wounded was so great, that the generals accused the young conscripts of having injured themselves, to escape the fatigues and dangers of the campaign." The allies carried off 900 prisoners; and the entire number lost to active service was not less than 18,000. The loss of the allies was also very considerable; but not so great as that of the French.—The latter followed closely on the retreating army; and encumbered as it was with a number of wounded, only the steady and indomitable courage of the rear-guard, under Milaradovitch, prevented the French from inflicting considerable loss upon their foe. There were repeated passages at arms between the two, but with no decisive results; and Napoleon's main army arrived at Dresden the day after the allies had passed it. The emperor immediately established his head-quarters in the Saxon capital—which has been called, "the Queen of Northern Germany." It stands within an amphitheatre of hills, rising from a very low altitude to one of 400 or 500 feet: the Elbe separates the old from the new town—the communication being kept up by a handsome stone bridge; and the country around was then covered with vineyards and corn-fields, terminated by the Bohemian and Swiss mountains, at the distance of from twelve to sixteen miles. Before Napoleon entered Dresden, he was met by a deputation from the municipality, to whom he was very rude. As soon as he had established himself there, he sent to Prague, to ask the king to return to his capital, where he arrived on the 12th. He was obliged to place all his resources at the command of Napoleon; and to order general Theilman, who commanded at Torgau, to deliver that fortress into the hands of Ney.—Before the arrival of the king of Saxony, the emperor sent for prince Eugene; praised him highly for his conduct during the retreat from Moscow, and since the command of the army had fallen into his hands; told him that he (Napoleon) would give Galicia to his daughter as a dotation; and then dispatched him to Italy, to organise an army of 80,000 men, and 150 pieces of cannon, to be ready in July.

While Napoleon remained at Dresden, M. de Bubna arrived from Vienna—M. de Stadion at the same time proceeding to Bautzen—being sent by M. de Metternich, to endeavour to persuade the contending parties to come to some accommodation. Napoleon also sent M. Caulaincourt on a secret mission to Alexander—being quite willing to come to terms with the czar at the expense of Austria and Prussia. These efforts produced no effect; and Napoleon determined to attack the allies in their intrenchments at Bautzen. Having replaced the bridges across the Elbe, destroyed by the allies, the French "grand army" had crossed that river on the 11th and 12th of May; and compelled Milaradovitch and Kleist to fall back towards the Spree. At the same time, Barclay de Tolly, having taken Thorn, had arrived near Bautzen, with 18,000 men. He was directed to watch Ney; and on the 18th, at Königswërtha, he encountered a corps belonging to the marshal's division, which he defeated, killing a great many, taking 1,000 prisoners, and six pieces of cannon. Ney was moving towards Steinwitz and Weissig; and at the latter place, he encountered the Prussians under York, who fought well, but were obliged to retreat, and fall back on the main body. Barclay de Tolly also rejoined the army; and Ney continued his march—his destination being Klix, to co-operate in the attack on Bautzen.

Napoleon did not leave Dresden till the 18th of May. The last column of his army had crossed the Elbe several days previously; but he lingered behind, hoping that he should hear some favourable intelligence from Caulaincourt; or that the count de Narbonne would inform him, that Austria, whose sympathies with the allies were too evident—and to whom he had proposed, through M. Bubna, an armistice and a congress—had returned to her allegiance to him. Disappointed in these expectations—and, notwithstanding the victory of Lutzen, with much less confidence than when he left Paris—Napoleon took leave of the king of Saxony, and proceeded, on horseback, towards Bautzen.

From the time that the allies established themselves at Bautzen, the weather had been fine: and after the French crossed the Elbe, the two armies lay opposite to each other; both enjoying the short truce amazingly—provisions being abundant, and their labours light. This repose was soon to be interrupted. Napoleon joined his army on the 19th, and established his head-quarters at Klein-Forgsten, about three miles from Bautzen. He, however, did not retire to his tent, but set out to reconnoitre the advanced posts, and the position of the enemy. At that time the allies were strongly posted on a range of hills, forming the natural boundary of Silesia. Milaradovitch and Kleist held the right bank of the Spree, the former occupying Bautzen. These commanders had about 21,000 men under their orders. Two miles in the rear, was the main army of 52,000 men. On the left were 15,000 Russians, under Wittgenstein; York, with 6,000 men, was in the centre; Blucher, with 20,000, on the right; 4,000 Prussian guards and 8,000 cavalry formed the reserve; and Barclay de Tolly, with 10,000 men, occupied the extreme right, observing Ney on his advance to Klix. The total number of these corps was 84,000 men. The position was defended by numerous field-works, and was well calculated for defence. The French army was much more numerous. Oudinot, with 20,000 men, faced Milaradovitch. Macdonald, with 12,000, menaced Bautzen. More to the left, were Marmont and Bertrand, each with 20,000 men; and 15,000 guards were at the imperial head-quarters. Here were 87,000 troops. The left wing, 55,000 strong, was moving to the field. One column, of 15,000 men, under Lauriston, was that night at Weissig; Ney, with 30,000, was at Maukersdorf; and Regnier, with 10,000, was much farther in the rear.

On the 20th, Napoleon made his dispositions for the battle, being on horseback by nine o'clock. The object that day was, to pass the Spree, and attack Bautzen; and, under a tremendous cannonade, which was returned by the allies, the passage of the river was effected: Bautzen, no longer tenable, was evacuated, and taken possession of by Macdonald; and the French obtained some further advantages, though not of a decided character. During the night, the French continued crossing the river; forming squares as they landed—lighting fires in the centre—and laying down to sleep with their arms in their hands, or by their sides.

The next morning was fine and bright; and, remarks general Cathcart, "all was still; and even the sound of an occasional musket-shot, discharged along the distant line of advanced sentries, was scarcely to be heard." Soon this silence was disturbed, and all was animation on both sides. The generals were making their observations, and the soldiers were hastening to their posts. Napoleon's plan, as we learn from his officers, was to attack and disperse the right of the allies; and to interpose the division of Ney between them and their line of retreat to Breslau. Ney had to cross the Spree, in the rear of the enemy, that morning; and whilst simultaneous attacks were made on each flank, that general was steadily advancing in his assigned direction. Napoleon, in the meantime, held back the centre; and sitting down to get his breakfast, fell asleep. He was awoke by the sound of cannon; and judging that it was Ney who had passed the Spree, the emperor made himself secure of victory. Ney, however, was not so near as was supposed; and the allies were driven from hill to hill on the flanks, before he arrived. Blucher, however, recovered nearly all that was lost; and for some time the French were kept at bay. But first Lauriston, and then Ney himself, came into action. Napoleon was, from the superiority of his numbers, enabled to bring up division after division; whilst the allies had no reinforcements to draw upon; and retreat became necessary. It was made in the most orderly manner, with the precision of parade; the Russians retiring by the route of Hochkirch and Lobau, the Prussians by that to Weissenberg. Napoleon, seated on the summit of the Hoheberg, from whence he could survey the whole field of battle, directed his cavalry and artillery to follow the allies, and harass them on their retreat. But the French horse were met by the equally gallant, and more numerous, cavalry of the Russians, and beaten back; whilst the Russian and Prussian artillery, from eminences, with which the line of their retreat was interspersed, returned the enemy's fire with great effect. At dark, the pursuit ceased; and Napoleon sought rest in the isolated inn at Klein-Purschwitz, which the emperor Alexander had occupied during the day. Ney took up his quarters at Wurschen, previously the head-quarters of the allied sovereigns. The troops bivouacked on the field. In the two days' engagement, the loss on both sides had been very great. That of the allies was 15,000 men, killed and wounded, and 1,500 prisoners; the French had 5,000 killed, and 20,000 wounded.

On the morning of the 23rd of May, the emperor was in motion by daybreak. He had his army also roused, and the pursuit of the allies commenced. Their retreat had not been made very rapidly, having so many wounded to look after, and the French had not much difficulty in coming up with them. Several engagements took place, with no result; and Napoleon had the mortification of seeing the unbroken columns retiring on the road to Görlitz, conscious that he was unable to prevent them. Anxious, however, to push on to that town before night, he rode to the front; his suite followed him; when suddenly a cannon-ball fell amongst them; and Duroc, the man, after Desaix, to whom he was most attached, and general Kirchen, were killed. The death of Duroc afflicted the emperor as much as the loss of a battle could have done. He pitched his tent near the cottage where the body was laid, and would advance no further that day. He saw the corpse of his friend interred, and left 200 napoleons in the hands of the owner of the cottage, to erect a monument to his memory. That intention, however, was never carried out; the Russians interfering to prevent it.

The allies continued to retreat, the French to advance, till the 26th of May; the aim of the former being to reach an intrenched camp at Schweidnitz, before they hazarded an action. On that day, Napoleon himself rested for a short time at Buntzlau; but his advanced guard, under Lauriston, proceeded beyond Haynau. There Blücher drew the enemy into an ambuscade, by screening a party of horse behind some hills, while a corps of infantry made a feigned retreat into the open country. They were pursued by the French advanced guard of dragoons, infantry, and artillery, who were suddenly charged by the Prussian horse, and completely broken up; 800 were killed, 1,500 taken prisoners, and eighteen cannon: the victors could, however, only carry off twelve for want of horses. The Prussians did not lose more than a hundred in killed and wounded; but amongst the former was colonel Dölft, a most valuable officer. There were several encounters of detached corps on the 27th; in one of which, general Sebastiani, at the head of Victor's cavalry, captured a Russian convoy of twenty-two guns, sixty tumbrils, and 400 men; in another, eight squadrons of Russian cavalry defeated twelve squadrons of the French, making 400 prisoners; and in a third, Woronzoff's cavalry, in an encounter with a body of French horse near Dessau, were also victors, making 500 prisoners. The main bodies of both armies still continued in motion—the route of the allies towards Upper Silesia, indicating a secret understanding with the Austrian government. They gained the camp at Schweidnitz—a fortified town of Prussian Silesia, at the foot of the Riesengebirge, on the 29th: about the same time the French reached the neighbourhood of Liegnitz, where they halted; and a rumour that an armistice was likely to be concluded between the hostile powers, was circulated through the camp.

This rumour proved correct. Napoleon was desirous of concluding an agreement with Russia alone; but to all his messages on that subject, Alexander turned a deaf ear. Austria was still endeavouring to restore peace—M. de Bubna and M. de Stadion remaining at the respective head-quarters of Napoleon and the allies. The terms she proposed, and to which Russia and Prussia would have acceded, included the restoration of the latter to her rank as a first-rate power: but they would have left France powerful—too powerful for the repose of Europe. It was suggested, that the grand duchy of Warsaw should be dissolved; Prussia reconstructed by the addition of a considerable portion of that grand-duchy, and some of the Hanseatic Towns; that Hamburg, Lübeck, and Bremen should be restored to Germany; and

Illyria, and the portions of Poland taken from her, given back to Austria; the Confederation of the Rhine was also to be formally dissolved. These terms agreed to, Napoleon would have retained Belgium, the Rhenish provinces, Holland, Piedmont, Tuscany, and the Roman states, as French provinces; and Westphalia, Lombardy, and Naples, in the hands of vassals. He, however, considered that their acceptance would be a loss of glory. They would have included the abandonment of Spain, the laying down the title of "Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine," and the restoration of Prussia from that state of humiliation to which a series of disasters, and the successes of the French arms, had reduced her. He resolved, therefore, we are told, to give up nothing. But, although the battle of Lützen had been followed by the recapture of Hamburg, and the complete re-establishment of the French on the Lower Elbe, Napoleon felt that his force was not adequate to the complete subjugation of Prussia and Austria; for he had determined the latter should fall, if she would not abandon the allies, and join him actively and energetically in the campaign. One of his last messages to the Austrian court, through M. de Narbonne, was, that "she should prepare a powerful force, and then summon the belligerents to pause in their movements, under the threat of throwing 100,000 men upon their flanks." He was very desirous of causing Saxony to take the place of Prussia in the map of Europe; and he authorised his ambassador to intimate to M. Metternich, that, if Austria would support him in his views in that respect, "he would pay her well for her services, with territories which should be taken, it mattered not from whom." M. de Metternich, however, could not advise the emperor to agree to such terms; and though Napoleon would not accept those which the Austrian minister proposed, yet, as he considered time an object, he temporised. After the interchange of messages, he agreed, that consultations should be held upon the subject of an armistice; and the village of Plesswitz or Poischwitz, in the circle of Striegau, was fixed upon as the place of meeting. The armistice was signed there on the 4th of June. It was concluded for six weeks; and six days' notice of an intention to renew hostilities was to be given. The very day that this armistice was signed, Oudinot attacked the Prussians at Luckau. The suburbs of the town were carried and set on fire; but the assailants, in the end, were decidedly beaten, and had to retreat, with the loss of 1,500 killed, 500 prisoners, and three pieces of cannon. The French and Russians were also fighting at Taucha, in front of Leipsic, to the manifest disadvantage of the former, when the news of the armistice was received, and hostilities were suspended. Shortly after it was signed, under the pretence that it did not extend to irregulars, general Fournier, with 3,000 men, attacked a corps of partisans, known as "Lutzow's corps," which was only 500 strong, and was returning to Silesia. The poet Korner—at the time, the Tyrtæus of Germany—was amongst them, and was severely wounded. This act of treachery would have justified the allied sovereigns in breaking the armistice. It did not suit their purposes, however, to do so; but the people of Germany took the outrage deeply to heart; and their universal cry was—"Armistice be it; but no peace! Revenge for Korner first."

In signing the armistice, says Thiers, "Napoleon's only intention was, to gain two months' time, in which to complete his armaments, and to raise them to a strength sufficient to meet the new enemies he was about to create; but he had never, for a moment, entertained the idea of peace." He, however, continued the negotiations. While they were going on he took up his residence in the Marcolini palace, in the Frederickstadt suburb of Dresden, where he arrived on the 10th of June. The king of Saxony immediately waited upon him, and was received cordially, the emperor addressing to him "language of comfort and encouragement." On the 18th of June, M. de Metternich arrived from Vienna, and had a long interview with the emperor. After it had continued some time, and Napoleon had told Metternich, that all he wanted from Austria was neutrality, as his army was strong enough to bring the Russians and Prussians to reason—they retired into the emperor's private closet, where they remained alone. On their returning into the room where they first met, Napoleon was, according to an eye and ear witness, speaking in a loud voice; and exclaiming—"What! not only Illyria, but the half of Italy, and the return of the pope to Rome! Poland too, and Spain, and Holland, and the Confederation of the Rhine, and Switzerland! This is what you call moderation!" After much declamation, he asked Metternich—"How much has England given you to play this part towards me?" Metternich changed colour, but made no reply; and the two paced the room in silence. At length Napoleon cooled; and Metternich being referred to the duke of Bassano, some preliminary terms were at length arranged. On the 30th of June, Napoleon and the allies formally accepted the mediation of Austria. It was agreed that the plenipotentiaries of all the powers should meet at Prague on the 5th of July, and the armistice was prolonged till the 10th of August. At Prague, Austria formally proposed those conditions which had been previously sent to the emperor through M. de Narbonne, and were, as his conversation with Metternich indicates, repeated to him at Dresden, with additions. They were rejected, and other terms offered.

The emperor would consent to dissolve the duchy of Warsaw, and make Dantzic a free town; but the king of Saxony was to be indemnified for the territories he surrendered, by others in Silesia and Bohemia. Illyria, with the exception of the port of Trieste, was to be restored to Austria. The Germanic confederation to be continued, and extended to the Oder; and the integrity of Denmark to be preserved. These terms were not received before midnight on the 10th of August; at which hour Napoleon knew the allies had determined that the armistice should cease. At that hour, therefore, the Russian and Prussian negotiators declared that their powers had expired: the conference broke up; and the war was again resumed. For this result some blame Austria, others Napoleon. The truth appears to be, that the former was really anxious for peace upon the terms she proposed, which would have restored the independence of Prussia and Germany; and was equally resolved to join the allies—notwithstanding the relationship between Francis-Joseph and Napoleon—if those terms were not accepted. The French emperor, on the contrary, was determined not to give up anything; and only consented to the armistice and to the negotiations, to gain the necessary time for the reinforcements to reach him, which he expected from Italy and elsewhere. Whoever peruses attentively the details into which M. Thiers enters, respecting this episode in the career of Napoleon, cannot rise from that perusal under any other impression. We may remark, that although, at Dresden, Metternich appears to have proposed that the independence of Holland and Spain should be re-established, that question was not formally debated at Prague. It was considered more especially connected with England, who was not a party to the conference.

During the armistice, Sir Charles Stewart and earl Cathcart repaired to the head-quarters of the allies; and preliminaries were signed at Reichenbach on the 14th of June, which laid the foundation of that "grand alliance," out of which the final downfall of Napoleon sprung. By the terms agreed upon, England was to pay Russia an annual subsidy of £1,333,334, and Prussia one of £666,666, for the next six months, to enable them to continue the war: one object of which was to be the restoration of Prussia to the situation in which it stood, as to its geographical and statistical proportions, previous to 1806; and the allies reciprocally agreed not to negotiate separately with their common enemies, nor to sign any separate peace, truce, or convention. Napoleon, on the other hand, on the 10th of July, concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Denmark, which ensured him considerable support at the mouth of the Elbe, and 20,000 troops to strengthen Davoust at

Hamburg. He had now the command of the entire line of the Elbe; but as he was at the mercy of Austria—which, from the Bohemian mountains, could at any time direct an army upon his flanks—his generals urged him not to advance any further along the Upper Elbe; but, retaining Dresden, and keeping up his communications as far as Magdeburg, to place his magazines and hospitals on the Saale, and to make such defensive arrangements along that river, as would render retreat safe, should it become imperative. Napoleon, however, thought any retreat would be a sign of weakness; and resolving to make Dresden the centre of his operations, he employed the two months over which the armistice extended, in constructing an intrenched camp in the mountains by which that city is surrounded. This camp included, within its boundaries, several important places—Pirna; the fortress of Königstein, considered impregnable; the rock of Linienstein; Hohenstein, and Stolpen. A force of 25,000 men was sent to occupy this position, which enabled him to command nearly all the passes of the mountains. He also renewed and strengthened the fortifications of Dresden, and of all the forts and fortresses on the Elbe; ordered up from France, and the Confederation of the Rhine, all the troops, of every arm, that could be rendered available; and instructed prince Eugene to gather an army of observation between Pavia and the Adige, with a view to make a descent on Vienna, if necessary. A Bavarian army, 45,000 strong, was collected under Wrede, and placed so as to keep the Austrians in Bohemia in check; and the cavalry was reinforced by 6,000 men, brought by general Arraghi from Italy, and 3,000 from the cavalry dépôt in Brunswick. While these preparations were making, Napoleon himself took little repose; but he provided for the pleasure of his army. Every recreation in which the French soldiers delight was procured for them. Balls, plays, operas, masquerades, were frequent; the camps were decorated with flowers; the standards waved gaily over the tents, and in the streets: nothing appeared to be forgotten or neglected which could produce pleasure and excitement. "All this could not be done without a large expenditure of money; and money, we are told by creditable eye-witnesses, was abundant. Moreover, as the wounded recovered or died, Dresden gradually ceased to exhibit traces of having been, but a few weeks previously, an overgrown hospital. It was now the gayest, and, probably, the most immoral, city in Europe."* Napoleon's birthday was celebrated on the 10th of August, by a brilliant military review, and other festivities, concluding with illuminations, a display of fireworks, and a ball.

* Gleig's Leipsic Campaign.

† Some accounts give the allies greatly the advantage

All this ceased when the armistice was at an end. Immediately that its expiration was known, beacon fires were lighted on the mountains of Silesia and Bohemia, to warn the population that war was about to be renewed. Austria gave in her adhesion to the allies, and, on the 12th of August, declared war against France; assigning as her reason for this step, the conviction forced upon the government by the progress of events, that the French emperor was insincere in his professions of peace. Sweden also now joined actively in the war; and the plan of operations was drawn up at Trachenberg, a town of Prussian Silesia, by the allied sovereigns and Bernadotte. The allies had a force of something less than 300,000 men. The corps of Wittgenstein, 45,000 strong; of Milaradovitch, 24,000; and the Prussian corps of Kleist, 25,000, followed the emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia, encamping or bivouacking round their headquarters; and, with the cavalry reserve under the grand-duke Constantine, occupied the country between Schweidnitz and Glatz. To the right were a corps of Russians (33,000), under Langeron, and of Prussians (35,000); the whole under the orders of Blücher. On the left was an Austrian force of 35,000 infantry, 8,000 cavalry, and 2,000 artillery, placed conveniently for turning the intrenched camp in the mountains, and taking the French posted about Dresden in the rear. A Prussian corps of 20,000 men, under Bulow, and a Russian corps of 5,000 under Tauenzien, covered Berlin. Far in the rear was Bernadotte, with 25,000 Swedes; 12,000 Russians, under Winzingerode and Woronzoff; and 13,000 Hanoverians and Germans, under Walmoden. This army was ultimately joined by Bulow's and Tauenzien's divisions; and the united bodies formed the "army of the north," under Bernadotte. Before the campaign actually commenced, Moreau, who had been for upwards of ten years in exile in America, joined the allies at the Russian head-quarters, and accepted the commission of lieutenant-general in the service of Alexander.

Napoleon had nearly 100,000 men more than the allies. The "grand army" was at Dresden; it comprised the corps of Ney, Lauriston, Macdonald, Sebastiani, Milhaud, Victor, St. Cyr, and Poniatowski; and amounted to 125,000 men; of which, 20,000 were cavalry. Vandamme, with 25,000, occupied the intrenched camp. Oudinot, with 80,000 men, stationed in front of Torgau, watched the road to Berlin; Rapp had a numerous corps at Dantzic; Davoust another at Hamburg; Augereau had 20,000 conscripts at Würzburg and Bamberg; and there were 25,000 Bavarians at Munich. The entire strength of these corps, with the force under Wrede, &c., was about 340,000 men; and they had 1,300 pieces of cannon.†

in numbers, in the proportion of five to two. The above figures are taken from authentic documents; and though

Before active hostilities commenced, Fouché arrived at Dresden, having been summoned by Napoleon. He had, anticipating the emperor's downfall, been intriguing at Paris, to establish the regency of Maria-Louisa, with a council, of which he was to be a member; and this coming to the ears of his imperial master, led to his being ordered to repair to Dresden. On his arrival Napoleon sent him to Illyria, to succeed Junot as governor. That veteran had, for some time, been decidedly insane, and died a few days after he was superseded by Fouché. On the 16th of August Murat arrived. He had been wavering in his allegiance; for, anxious to preserve Naples, he was ready to side with the victors. The battles of Lutzen and Bautzen decided him, for the present, at all events, to adhere to his first friend. About the same time, Jomini, the chief of Ney's staff, deserted to the enemy; his defection caused some alarm, as it was in his power to disclose the plan of the campaign laid down by Napoleon. But the latter did not appear disposed to change the prescribed operations.

Both armies seem to have begun their movements about the same period. The plan of the allies was to direct their forces from three points—Berlin on the north, Silesia on the east, and Prague on the south—upon Dresden. Napoleon framed his plans from the conviction that the allies would make their great effort on the side of Silesia: and, ordering Oudinot to march on Berlin, and take possession of that capital, leaving St. Cyr, with 31,000 men, at Dresden, and Vandamme, with 25,000 men, at the camp of Pirna, he ordered the rest of the army of Dresden to advance on Silesia by the way of Breslau. The intelligence he received, however, of Blücher's movements induced him to retrace his steps. That commander had been the first to march upon Dresden; and, falling in with the corps of Ney, the French were repulsed in several encounters. The Russians and Austrians also directed their movements on Dresden, but by a different route from that by which Napoleon expected them; and by the 21st of August, 150,000 men were concentrated in rear of the right of Napoleon's main position, having the power to attack the Saxon capital, or interpose between the different divisions of his army, as might seem most advisable; and from 20,000 to 25,000 Austrians, under general Klenau, were in the neighbourhood of Carlsbad. Prince Schwartzberg was commander-in-chief of the Austrians; and, on approaching Dresden, he had issued an order of the day to his troops; in which he said—"All efforts to obtain peace on equitable terms, such terms as alone could be durable, had failed;" as "nothing could bring the relative proportions of the two armies were changed during the campaign, the allies never had anything like that preponderance of force.

back the French government to moderation and reason." They were, therefore, at war for "the protection of their country, the security and welfare of posterity;" and "Europe expected its deliverance at their hands." Napoleon heard of these movements when he was at Zittau, and also that the two emperors and the king of Prussia had had an important interview at Prague; after which Alexander and Frederick William had followed the army. This information convincing him that it was in Saxony, not Silesia, that he must seek the enemy, he left 75,000 men, under Macdonald, to keep Blücher in check, and returned to Dresden, where his presence was very much required. The allies, under Wittgenstein and Schwartzberg—Alexander commanding in chief—had, as soon as they learnt the small force which Napoleon had left there, marched on the city, and had established themselves in the Grosse-Garten, having driven out the enemy from that enclosure, and also from the line of breastworks which connected it with the Elbe.

Napoleon had, on the 24th, sent general Gourgaud from Bautzen to St. Cyr, to inform him of the approach of succour; and that general returned, on the 25th, with information that the city could not hold out twenty-four hours. Napoleon, who had sent orders to Vandamme to cross the Elbe near Pirna, and get in the rear of the allies, and who meant to have attacked them in their positions, now resolved to hasten to Dresden. He had with him Latour-Maubourg's cuirassiers and Kellermann's horse, with the guards, and the corps of Victor and Marmont. When his advanced guard reached the elevated plateau, which is crossed by the roads of Bautzen, Stolpen, and Pilnitz, there intersecting each other, it was seen that the whole plain of the Elbe was filled with the numerous hostile force. The suburb of Frederickstadt alone was not enveloped by them. From this point Napoleon pushed on before his troops, only escorted by a squadron of horse. On gaining the barrier, he was recognised and cheered. He rode on to the palace, where he had a brief interview with the king, and then proceeded to the bridge, where he remained till most of the troops arrived, and were distributed according to his orders. Their advance had been seen by the allies, who were on the opposite side of the Elbe; and a fire had been opened upon them, but with so little effect that it was soon discontinued. After he had arranged for the disposition of the newly arrived troops, and those which were to follow, Napoleon visited the exterior works, from the barrier of Pirna to that of Freyburg, and then returned to the palace. His attention, however, was soon called to a fierce bombardment which was opened on the town, from at least a hundred pieces of cannon; and an assault from the Russians under Wittgenstein, and the Prussians under Kleist, who captured several redoubts and outworks; but furious sorties of the young guard and other French troops from the gates of Plauen, Pirna, and Dippoldiswalde, repulsed the assailants, and most of the redoubts, &c., were retaken. Soon it was rumoured amongst the allies that Napoleon directed the defence; and, after the fighting had been maintained for several hours, the allied generals withdrew their troops. A dense rain fell, under which the allies had to bivouac in the open fields. Dresden presented a scene of tumult all night; and one which those who witnessed it never forgot. Men, carriages, and horses were continually arriving; and the streets were kept in a constant state of illumination from the blazing torches of the guides. Every shop and store was open to supply food, and not a few houses were plundered to obtain it. The horses had to be fed and littered in the streets; and the inhabitants were in the greatest alarm for the safety of the city as the tumbrils and ammunition waggons dashed from point to point; and a spark from one of the torches, falling upon any of them, might have caused incalculable mischief. The night, however, passed over without any untoward event; and, on the 27th of August, the battle of Dresden was fought.

Napoleon was on horseback by 6 A.M.; and repairing to a point from whence he could survey the positions of the enemy, he took his measures accordingly. The allies occupied a range of heights, which skirted, and sloped down to, the plain of the Elbe, and looked into the city. It formed a concave arc, presenting a base of six miles in length, from right to left. The right, composed of Wittgenstein's Russians and Kleist's Prussians, was formed on the road to Pirna, extending to Strehlen. The centre, formed of Austrians, commanded by Schwartzberg, was posted on a semicircle of heights, extending from Strehlen to Plauen. Giulay's corps, and one division of Klenau's troops, which had come up, were on the left; and a space was left for the remainder of Klenau's army when it joined. Of the French, Victor, and the cavalry of Latour-Maubourg, opposed Giulay. The emperor, with Marmont's and St. Cyr's corps, was in the centre, opposite Schwartzberg; the infantry and cavalry of the old guard forming the reserve. Ney commanded the left, where he had the four divisions of the young guard, and the cavalry of Kellermann: Murat, with 10,000 cavalry, had orders, when the battle was raging, to fall on the enemy's rear.

The attack was made by the French, and the action commenced on the right, from whence it extended to the centre and the left. The allies fought well, though much exhausted by their uncomfortable bivouac in the rain of the preceding night; but they were compelled to give way on all points. Their defeat was accelerated by Murat's cavalry, which, moving in the rear of Victor's division, was enabled to come, unperceived, upon the left flank of the Austrians and in their rear, by some low meadows which extended to the Elbe, and where Klenau's force was to have been posted; but it, unfortunately, had not arrived. While a fire of musketry from Victor's infantry, and a heavy cannonade from a battery which commanded the allied left, were kept up, Murat, who was joined by Latour-Maubourg, dashed upon the Austrians; and a part of his horse being armed with the lance, then a novel weapon, with which the Austrians were unacquainted, the line was broken, hundreds of the men being killed and wounded; the rest fled. As the rout commenced, Moreau, who was with the emperor Alexander, had both his legs carried off by a cannon-ball—a wound which occasioned his death. Soon after, Alexander, the king of Prussia, and the principal generals, assembled on horseback in a ploughed field, to consider the position of the army, and determine the course to be pursued. It was resolved to retreat, as the ammunition was nearly exhausted; but no backward movement was made till the next morning. Whilst daylight lasted, the allies continued on the defensive; the French, however, appear to have been exhausted, as the cannonade, which began to slacken about five o'clock, at six ceased entirely. They returned to Dresden, saturated with the rain which had fallen the latter part of the day; and "which ran in streams from the cape of Napoleon's grey great-coat, and caused the trimmings of his hat to hang down his back like a queue." That night Dresden became a general hospital for the wounded: the number of troops and prisoners rendered food scarce; and accommodation could not be obtained for hundreds who were crowded within its walls. The allies bivouacked in the field; and were in motion early the next morning, taking the road to Bohemia. They were pursued during the 28th; and St. Cyr reached Dohna; Marmont, Dippoldiswalde; Victor, Pritchendorf; and Murat penetrated beyond Freyburg. Napoleon halted at Pirna, where he received messengers announcing that the villages were full of prisoners, and the roads blocked up with the baggage and matériel the allies were abandoning. He sat by the road-side as the messengers arrived, and received their announcements. Then suddenly saying, "There is now nothing more to be done," he ordered a halt; and the young guard bivouacking at Pirna, he drove back to Dresden, where he spent the remainder of that day and the next, in examining papers. That delay changed the fortunes of the campaign.

The battle of Dresden has been styled, "one of the most remarkable victories ever gained by Napoleon;" and it was the last pitched battle he ever did gain. Its results threatened, at first, great disasters to the allies, whose losses were tremendous. The number of killed and wounded was 12,000; of prisoners, 13,000; and before they got clear of the mountains, 2,000 more were taken: they also lost twenty-six cannons, eighteen standards, 130 caissons, and a great number of baggage waggons. Amongst the killed was the poet Korner, who had recovered from the wound received in the action with Fournier, and whose loss was greatly felt throughout Germany. The loss of the French was about 7,000 killed and wounded.

In other quarters, the allies had, up to that time, met with more success than they achieved at Dresden. Oudinot, who had been sent to Berlin—having forced the defiles of Thyrow, and established himself on the heights in front of Mittenwalde; whilst Regnier, who was with him, had defeated the Prussian general, Thumen—was, on the 23rd, beaten by the Prussians and Swedes under Bernadotte, whom he attacked at the village of Gross-Beeren, eleven miles E.S.E. of Potsdam. The loss of the French on that occasion, besides the killed and wounded, of which no return was made, was 1,500 prisoners, thirteen cannon, and a considerable quantity of baggage. On the 25th, Bernadotte had taken Luckau, with its garrison of 1,000 men, nine pieces of cannon, and considerable magazines; and a division of the Prussians, under Hirschfeld, the same day, defeated Girard, who was marching from Magdeburg to Oudinot's assistance, with the loss of 1,400 prisoners, and six guns. On the 26th, the day that Napoleon again re-entered Dresden, Blucher obtained a decided advantage over Macdonald, who had been left by Napoleon, with instructions "to concentrate his troops, and march towards the enemy, so as to be in a situation to give his aid to the operations of the grand army against Dresden or Bohemia; but, if attacked by a superior force, to retire behind the Queiss, and hold Görlitz." Instead of observing the cautious directions of the emperor, Macdonald determined to take the offensive. For this purpose he divided his army into five columns, which were to cross the Katzbach—a river of Silesia, flowing past Goldberg, Liegnitz, and Parchwitz—and fall on the enemy's right. Blucher, hearing of Napoleon's backward movement to Dresden, had that same morning broken up his encampment in front of Jauer, where he had rested his troops on the 24th and 25th; and crossed the Katzbach, with the same intention which actuated Macdonald—to fight on the first opportunity. As the two armies were moving towards the same point, they approached each other about 2 P.M., and Blucher ordered the attack to be immediately made. Macdonald's right wing first came into action, as one portion was crossing the ravine of the Wüthende-Neisse—i.e., the mad or furious Neisse—and another was passing the Kroitsch defile. This wing was utterly routed, and left 1,500 prisoners, twenty-six guns, and their ammunition waggons in the allies' hands. The left, led by Sebastiani and Souham, came to the rescue, but was also defeated; as were two fresh divisions which Macdonald sent up, hoping they would change the fortunes of the day. The troops on both sides fought well on this occasion; but, from the first, success attended the operations of the Prussians. The French had to make a rapid retreat; they were pursued, and, from the 27th to the 29th, harassed and cut up in every direction. The result of these combined series of actions, from the 23rd to the 29th, was a loss to the French of 7,000 killed and wounded, 18,000 prisoners, 103 pieces of cannon, and thirty caissons.

Vandamme had been no less unsuccessful than Oudinot and Macdonald, because he did not obey orders—according to Napoleon; but according to Vandamme himself, because he was not properly supported with reinforcements. His orders were, to cross the Elbe, take the allies in the rear, and march upon Tetschen, Aussig, and Töplitz, and then, according to Napoleon, he was to wait the issue of events; but Vandamme says he was promised reinforcements to follow up his advantages. He commenced his operations on the 26th of August, by crossing the Elbe, and attacking the Russian divisions of prince Eugene of Würtemberg, and count Ostermann Tolstoi; with which he kept up a running fight on the 27th and 28th—compelling both to retire, and taking from Eugene 2,000 prisoners and six pieces of cannon. In the night of the 28th, Ostermann descended into the valley of Töplitz, where, on the 29th, he took up a position, with his front towards Kulm, and his right towards some dense forests which skirt the mountains upon the Bohemian side of the Erzgebirge range. All the roads from Saxony terminate in that range; and Vandamme was desirous of gaining possession of the plain, upon which the allies must debouch. Had he done so, their destruction would have been almost certain, pursued as they were by Murat, St. Cyr, Marmont, and Napoleon. On the 29th he descended into the plain, and attacked the Russians, who were much inferior in number; but they fought with great bravery, and the day passed with alternate changes of fortune. When night came on, the Russians occupied the positions they held in the morning, except one post called Priesten, which a French column had carried, and continued to hold. At the close of day, the grand-duke Constantine and general Diebitch arrived, with the cavalry and some grenadiers of the Russian guard; and Vandamme withdrew his troops to the ground he occupied in the morning. It would then have been prudent for him to have retreated; but Jomini says, he received a distinct order from Berthier, in the night of the 29th, to push on to Töplitz, and the young guard, numbering 28,000 men, was to have been sent from Pirna to join him. The Russians, on the morning of the 30th, were greatly reinforced by the arrival of several corps which had been engaged at Dresden. Barclay de Tolly took the command, Ostermann having lost his arm the day before; and Vandamme, instead of being the assailant, was the assailed. His force was reduced to 23,000 men: of which the right and centre were posted on the heights in front of Kulm; the left in the plain: and that was the point where the first attack was made. When it is stated, that the total force engaged, on the side of the Russians, was little short of 60,000 men, 10,000 of whom were cavalry, it is no wonder that the victory was theirs. The French were thrown into confusion, and rapidly giving way, when they heard firing on the summit of the heights towards Nollendorf. They thought it was the young guard; and the despair they were beginning to feel was changed into bright anticipations of victory. Soon, however, they saw the Prussian standards in the distance; and then they knew that even their retreat was cut off. They fought for some time longer; and Corbineau, at the head of the cavalry, charged up the defiles by which the Prussians were descending to the plain. The cavalry rode directly through the advancing column, rushed at the guns, cut down the gunners, and forced their way through. A few of the routed infantry also made their escape by the woods; the remainder were either killed or taken prisoners—Vandamme himself being amongst the latter. Thus the infantry of this division of the French army was completely annihilated; the loss, in the two days, being 18,000 men, 60 cannon, 300 ammunition waggons, and two eagles. The allies had about 5,000 killed and wounded.

These accumulated disasters completely neutralised the results of the battle of Dresden, and rendered a change necessary in the plans of the emperor. They had a serious effect also on the spirits of his troops, whilst they filled both the armies and the people of Germany with joy. Murmurs and dissatisfaction had, previously to the battle of Kulm, been heard in the camp of the allies, where the chiefs were jealous of each other; but that event restored unanimity and revived their ardour, which was not again cooled or abated till the final victory was obtained. The troops were now ordered to concentrate on Töplitz, where the sovereigns and their ministers repaired. The emperors of Austria and Russia, and the king of Prussia, took up their residence there. Lord Cathcart was also present, as the representative of England at the courts of Russia and Prussia; and the earl of Aberdeen, as her ambassador to Vienna. When these sovereigns and ministers met in congress, the first act was to ratify the preliminaries of Reichenbach; and next, to concert those means which were likely to be most successful against the common enemy. By the beginning of September, the Russians and Prussians had assembled 60,000 effective combatants at Kulm and Töplitz; the infantry occupying the former, and the cavalry being posted round the latter place. Their position enabled them to observe all the passes from which an enemy could debouch in that direction into Bohemia, and to assume the offensive whenever an opportunity presented itself. The Austrians, under Schwartzberg, being young raw troops, were withdrawn across the Elbe to Lichtmaritz, at once to complete their organisation, which was found sadly defective, and to watch the defiles of Zittau and Friedland.

Napoleon, after Oudinot's defeat, gave the command of the army of the north to Ney; and he himself resolved to march to the assistance of Macdonald, who, by the retreat of Oudinot towards Wittenberg, was exposed to the attacks of Tauenzien, and a strong body of Cossacks, from the neighbourhood of Luckau and Bautzen. Leaving, therefore, St. Cyr, Victor, and Murat to make head against the grand army of the allies on the left bank of the Elbe; and dispatching Marmont to Hoyerswerda, about thirty miles from the right bank of that river, and midway between the armies of Ney and Macdonald, to keep up a communication between the two;—on the 3rd of September, with the guards, the reserve cavalry, and Poniatowski's corps, he directed his march towards Bautzen and the banks of the Bober. Macdonald, who had been compelled to make a constant retrograde march since his defeat on the Katzbach, in which he was greatly harassed by the cavalry of Blücher, had, at last, concentrated his corps on the Buntzlau road, and was preparing to cross the river by the only bridge which the torrents, swelled by repeated rains, had not carried away. As Napoleon advanced, Blücher, whose army was not strong enough to stand against him, fell back, but without sustaining any loss. On the 4th, the wreck of Macdonald's army joined; but the emperor learnt that Lauriston's corps was nearly destroyed; and on that day the Cossacks made a daring descent upon a convoy of ammunition, between Bautzen and Bischofswerda, which they captured. On the 5th, the French were at Hochkirch; and there Napoleon, entering a deserted farmhouse, threw himself on some straw, and fell, it is recorded, "into a reverie so deep and sad, that his attendants became much affected, though they did not attempt to interrupt it." The result of his meditation was, that he ordered the troops to halt; gave the command to Macdonald; and, ordering the guards to follow, he returned to Dresden. On his arrival he heard of fresh disasters.

On the 4th, Ney had joined the army of Oudinot, which he found sheltered under the cannon of Wittenberg. He put the troops in motion the following morning, by way of Zahna and Saida, with a view to regain the high road from Torgau to Berlin, for the purpose of reopening the communication with Dresden, which Oudinot had completely cut off by the line of retreat he had adopted. The army reached Dennewitz on the morning of the 6th, Ney having then with him the remains of Oudinot's army, the corps of Regnier (Saxons) and Bertrand, and his own—in all, 70,000 men. They were attacked by the Prussians, under Bulow, who, during the day, was reinforced—first by general Borstl, and then by a portion of Bernadotte's army, which that general, though within a distance which enabled him to hear the firing, had kept singularly inactive for several hours. The battle was well contested, and victory was doubtful till Borstl's division came up. Ultimately, the French and Saxons were driven away from their positions: they retreated orderly at first, but their retrograde movement soon became a flight, which was continued the next day, when the rear-guard was harassed by the Prussian horse, which made 1,500 prisoners, capturing also eight pieces of cannon. On the 8th, Ney collected the remnants of his army under the cannon of Torgau. He had lost, in the battle and retreat, 20,000 men (6,000 of whom were prisoners), eighty pieces of artillery, seventeen caissons, and three standards. He wrote to Napoleon from Torgau—"I have sustained a total defeat, and the morale of the army is quite shaken. With the cavalry I can do nothing; and the spirit of the foreign troops is so bad, that I have little doubt of their turning their arms against us on the first opportunity." The allies lost nearly 6,000 men, 5,000 being Prussians; Bulow's army, only 45,000 strong, having maintained the fight several hours, against 70,000 French, before it was reinforced, first by Borstl's corps, and then by the Swedes and Russians from Bernadotte's army. That general, like Kutusoff, appears to have been unwilling to take extreme measures against the French: for, had he advanced earlier in the day, scarcely one of Ney's army could have escaped.

At Dresden, Napoleon gave orders for several new works to be constructed; and the ruthless destruction of the vineyards in the vicinity of the city—and of the famous porcelain manufactory of Meissen, which was converted into a fortress, the warehouses being used for military stores—added to the many outrages which were committed by the French troops—caused the Saxon people to become completely disgusted with their allies, and heartily to pray for a deliverance from the evils under which they were suffering. The hour of that deliverance was near at hand.

The emperor had scarcely reached Dresden, before the Russians and Prussians were in pursuit, pressing upon him on all sides. Wittgenstein advanced through the defile of Nollendorf, expelled the French from Pirna, and occupied that position; general Zeiten, driving back St. Cyr's light troops, descended into the plain, within a few miles of Dresden; and parties of Cossacks, Prussian cavalry, and partisans, cut off the convoys on all the roads between Dresden and Leipsic, and even beyond that city. Dresden being the pivot of Napoleon's operations, it was necessary to preserve that intact, and keep up his communications: he therefore himself headed a considerable force, with which, on the 8th of September, two days after he had re-entered the city, he set out to drive back the Russians and Prussians, who were advancing by the passes of the Erzgebirge. They retired leisurely as the French advanced—fighting occasionally, and not suffering more than their pursuers, if so much. On the 10th, the emperor gained the frontier ridges; and from a mountain, called the Nuttleberg, he was enabled to survey the allies, encamped from Kulm to Töplitz. He found that he was not strong enough to make an attack upon their position; and giving the orders to retire, he again entered Dresden on the 13th. He had no sooner arrived, than the allies, now joined by Schwartzenberg with 40,000 men, speedily advanced, harassed his troops, and pressed on the city. Again he attacked them, when they retired by the old route on Kulm, were pursued, and, this time, attacked when they halted; but the French were defeated, with the loss of 2,000 prisoners. Then Napoleon diverged, hoping to come up with Blücher; but the Prussian general would not hazard a battle; and the emperor returned dispirited, and beginning to despair of his prospects, to the Saxon capital, on the 25th of September. At this period, he had 208,000 men of all arms, under himself and his different generals, having lost upwards of 150,000 in six weeks. While this was the case, the allies had been gradually reinforcing and organising their army, till, before September closed, 300,000 men were pressing upon Dresden. On the 3rd of October, Blücher crossed the Elbe at a village called Elster, defeating the French under Bertrand, with the loss of 1,000 killed, 1,000 prisoners, and eleven pieces of cannon. Bernadotte, at the same time, crossed the river at two points, between Denau and Magdeburg; and what was called the "grand army"—40,000 men, under Benningsen and Tolstoi, being left to guard the pass of Nollendorf, and, if necessary, threaten Dresden—was, on the 8th, established at Chemnitz, on the Leipsic road.

Looking at the position of the French and the allies, there did not appear to be, at this period, any great preponderance of advantage on either side. Napoleon preserved Dresden, which he had strongly fortified; his line of defence was still unbroken; not one of the fortresses on the Elbe, held by his troops, had succumbed; and, where he appeared in person, victory still rested on his banners. He had, on several occasions since the resumption of hostilities, after the armistice of Plesswitz, evinced symptoms of despondency; but—when aware of the movements of the allies, he determined to march on Leipsic and give them battle—all his confidence appears to have returned. Having taken this resolution, on the 7th of October, he dictated to count Daru despatches to Paris; in one of which he said—"The emperor is about to give battle. Dresden will be occupied by 30,000 men. If his majesty lose the battle, he will cause the place to be evacuated; but, as his majesty will gain the battle, Dresden will always remain the centre of his operations. As in a hundred chances, his majesty believes he has eighty in his favour, we must act as if he were certain of success."

Napoleon sent his young guard from Dresden on the 6th of October. Leaving St. Cyr with 30,000 troops in the city, he set forward himself on the 7th. The king, queen, and the princess Amelia, of Saxony, were in his train; who accompanied him to Eilenburg, on the Mulde, where they arrived on the 9th. There had been much desertion among the Saxon and German troops; and general Thielman, with an entire Saxon brigade, had gone over to the allies. As the Saxon royal family were to leave the emperor at Eilenburg, he had all the troops of that nation then with the army, assembled in their presence, and addressed them very forcibly on the necessity of remaining true to their colours, unless they wished to see the dominions of their king dismembered for the aggrandisement of Prussia: but, he said, all who wished to leave him, were at liberty to do so. When he ceased speaking, he embraced the king, who was affected to tears; and the troops, touched by his emotion, vowed to be faithful to the last. Napoleon, when he left Dresden, had with him the old and young guard, the latter under the command of Oudinot; the 3rd, the 5th, and the 11th corps, Ney being at the head of the 3rd; with the corps of Bertrand and Regnier, then united: making a total of about 100,000 men. After the king of Saxony left him on the 10th, he established his headquarters at Duben, where he learned, that a partisan leader, Tchernicheff, having led his band against Westphalia, king Jerome had fled, and the kingdom no longer existed; and that the king of Bavaria had joined the allies, a treaty between them having been signed on the 8th. He, however, continued his march to Leipsic, where Augereau, in consequence of orders he received, had already arrived from the Valley of the Inn, having, between Naumberg and Weissenfels, been attacked by a portion of the allied army from Bohemia, through which the French gallantly forced their way. Murat's division, consisting of the 2nd and 9th corps, the 6th, under Marmont, and the remains of Poniatowski's Poles, had also reached Leipsic; and the united force there consisted of at least 60,000 men.—The allies, who threatened Leipsic, under Wittgenstein, Klenau, Meerfeldt, and Giulay, were estimated at 125,000 men. Benningsen and Calleredo, with 60,000, blockaded Dantzic. Bernadotte, on the advance of Napoleon from Dresden, would have recrossed the Elbe, but the bridges were destroyed. He halted at Köthen, the capital of the duchy of Anhalt-Köthen. Blucher had his head-quarters at Halle, nineteen miles to the south. These various positions had not been taken up without several actions between the hostile forces, in which the balance of advantage rested with the allies.

The position of the two armies, united with the loss of Westphalia, and the defection of Bavaria, caused the French marshals to press upon the emperor the propriety of returning to France. He felt that his fortune had indeed changed; and the confidence that inspired him at Dresden, gave way. "A thunderbolt," to quote his own words, "alone could have saved him." Still, nothing, he thought, "was quite desperate, so long as he had the chance of a battle; and in his position, a single victory might have restored to him the north, as far as Dantzic." Though professing, at the time, not to be convinced by the reasoning of his marshals, he determined to yield to it; and orders were given, to the great joy of the troops, to make their way to the Rhine. Leaving Duben on the 12th, Napoleon arrived at Leipsic on the 15th of October. That second capital of Saxony, and largest commercial town in East Germany, stands on the White Elster, where it is joined by the Pleisse and the Parde. It is nineteen miles south-east of Halle, and sixty north-west of Dresden; and rises from the midst of an extensive plain, which is covered with villages, hamlets, and country-seats. Gentle undulations, with numerous picturesque groves and woods, in 1813, surrounded the city and its suburbs: but they offered no impediment to a hostile army; and the old irregular rampart, the dilapidated curtain of masonry, and the ditch, almost filled up, and without a counterscarp, furnished only inadequate means of defence.

On reaching Leipsic, Napoleon was joined by Murat; and the troops were disposed as they arrived—so that the king of Naples, with his division, covered the approaches to the city from the south and south-west. Poniatowski, on the extreme right, occupied a village called Mark-luberg, and the space between it and the Pleisse;

Bertrand's corps held Lindenau; Augereau, with Victor's corps, and Milhaud's and Kellermann's cavalry, were in the centre, on the heights of, and behind, Wachau; Lauriston's corps, with Latour-Maubourg's and Sebastiani's horse, were on the left, where a space was left for Macdonald, whose debouch from Holzhausen was looked for every instant. The imperial guard, under Napoleon, formed a reserve near a hamlet, called Probstheyda. Marmont's corps, and two divisions of Ney's, were posted on the north-west, to meet the shock of the Swedes and Prussians, under Bernadotte and Blucher. The other divisions of Ney's corps, and Regnier's Saxons, were shortly expected to join. The numbers of the two forces have been variously estimated; but the allies had, at that time, undoubtedly the superiority. The French probably comprised, together, about 175,000 men, 35,000 being cavalry, with 720 pieces of cannon; the allies mustered 190,000 men, and 1,300 guns: but they were not judiciously posted, chiefly owing to Bernadotte's obstinacy, and Schwartzberg's deficiency in strategic ability.

The allied commanders resolved to attack the French in their positions on the 16th of October. At midnight of the 15th, a given signal—the discharge of two rockets from the headquarters of prince Schwartzberg, to the south of Leipsic—summoned the men to their posts: at daybreak, an animated proclamation from the prince, was read at the head of every company and squadron; calling on the men—"Russians, Prussians, Austrians—to fight for the liberty of Europe—for the independence of their children—for the immortal renown of their names;"—and, at nine o'clock, three guns discharged from the centre of the army, announced that the hour of attack had arrived. The fire immediately commenced along the whole line, being taken up by both armies—the allies pressing on towards Leipsic, as the musketry and artillery poured forth their messengers of death. The attack of the allies on the left and centre was repulsed, the village of Wachau being taken and retaken; and the Russians and Austrians were beaten back six times from that of Liebertwolkwitz, by Lauriston, who was supported by Macdonald and Sebastiani. An attack on the allied centre, specially directed by Napoleon, was also successful; and he sent word to the king of Saxony, who had arrived at Leipsic, that he had won the battle, and taken 2,000 prisoners; requesting his majesty, at the same time, to order the bells in the city and the surrounding villages, to be rung, to announce the victory. The Russian grenadiers, under Raefskoi, partly retrieved the disasters of the centre; and the Austrian cuirassiers—who had great difficulty in getting into action, owing to the injudicious arrangements of Schwartzberg—gallantly charged the French cavalry, and drove them back, in great disorder, to the heights beyond Wachau. The allied right, however, was broken by a gallant charge, headed by Latour-Maubourg and Murat, and twenty-six guns captured. But Alexander ordered charges to be made by the red Cossacks of the guard, and the heavy cavalry of Barclay, on the French flanks; whilst the reserve artillery was brought up, and opened a destructive fire on their centre. The French cavalry was driven back, and twenty-four of the guns retaken: Austrian reserves also coming up, the enemy was compelled to retreat. Cannonading was now heard in the north; and couriers from Marmont and Ney announced their inability to render Napoleon any aid, as they could scarcely maintain themselves against Blucher's impetuous assaults. The battle appeared to be lost; but Napoleon resolved to make one more effort. He ordered up the reserve cavalry, and Victor and Lauriston's corps, which succeeded in breaking Gortschakoff's division, and taking the village of Gossa; but they were driven out by the Austrians, and eighty pieces of Russian artillery arrested the progress of the French, and compelled them to retire. The firing, however, did not cease till night came on; when the left of the allies was considerably in advance of the position it occupied in the morning: but the French left and centre had also advanced; and if the balance of the day was rigidly struck, the advantage in this part of the field rested with them.

In other quarters, Meerfeldt—who, with an Austrian division, had been posted, by Schwartzberg, so that the swamps between the Pleisse and the Elster prevented him from getting into action—had just extricated himself, and was preparing to attack the French right, when he was driven back to the Elster by a sudden attack of the old guard and Poniatowski's Poles; and was made prisoner, with his battalion. Giulay, however, attacked and carried Lindenau. Napoleon, indignant at the loss of that post, as it interrupted his communications, ordered Bertrand to retake it at any cost. Returning, he took the Austrians, little anticipating such a movement, by surprise; and driving them out of the village, Giulay withdrew to his original position. To the north-west, Ney and Marmont were defeated by Blucher, who had 56,000 men to their 28,000; and the wreck of their army retired behind the Partha, having lost 4,000 killed and wounded, 2,000 prisoners, an eagle, two standards, and twenty guns; thirty cannon were also taken by the Cossacks in the night.

The fighting of the 16th, though indecisive, except on the part of Blucher's army, yet undoubtedly placed the French in such a position—their numbers diminishing rapidly, whilst the allies looked for large reinforcements—that prudence dictated a retreat. Napoleon, however, after having the bells rung to announce his victory, could not think of making a retrograde movement. As soon as the firing ceased, he sent for Meerfeldt, with whom he held some conversation, and then dismissed him, on his parole, urging him to use every means with the emperor of Austria, to induce him to retire from the Russian alliance, and offering, if an armistice were concluded, to evacuate Germany, and retire behind the Rhine till the conclusion of a general peace. Both armies remained quiet on the 17th, Napoleon waiting for an answer to his proposals for an armistice—which the allies declined noticing; and the latter anxiously looking for the reinforcements which were on their way. They came; and, on the 18th, the fighting was renewed; and never did more gallant men meet together. But the fortune of the day rested decidedly with the allies. Their left, under the prince of Hesse-Homburg, came first into action, and, after a brave resistance, drove the Poles, under Poniatowski, before them, and also the remains of Augereau's corps, to the suburbs of Leipsic. There the young and old guard, under Oudinot and Mortier, encountered the Austrians, and obliged them to retire. An attack upon the village of Probstheyda—made by prince Augustus of Prussia and general Pirsch, under the fire of the allied batteries which then occupied the heights of Wachau, from which the French had retired in the night—was defeated the first time, but was successful the second; and the troops by whom the village was occupied, were driven across the plain in the greatest disorder. Again the guard came to the rescue, and retook the village. The Russians under Wittgenstein, and Benningsen's reserve, attempted to recover the place; but failed. Finding that the enemy made so heroic a resistance in this part of the field, Schwartzberg withdrew his infantry and cavalry to the nearest hollow, where they enjoyed some protection from the enemy's batteries. He then brought forward the artillery of the allies, 800 pieces—arranged it in a vast semicircle, and opened a fire, which was incessantly kept up, on the French and their positions. The latter replied from 500 guns; but the allies had the superiority in position, and in number of cannon; and the slaughter was immense. The French repeatedly advanced, and endeavoured to reach the guns, but in vain; and for four hours this terrible affray continued.—Whilst this was the state of things on the south, on the north, Ney and Marmont, who had reorganised their forces after the defeat of the 16th, were again greatly outnumbered by Blücher, and retired to join Regnier and his Saxons. No sooner had they done so, than the latter went over to the allies, and opened a fire upon their former friends. The French were of course compelled to make a retrograde movement; but their extreme left remained at Schönfeld, where they were reinforced, as the position was of great importance to Napoleon. Five times was it attacked, and five times were the allies repulsed: but the sixth time it was taken; the loss of assailants and defenders being about equal—4,000 on each side. The success of the allies, who pushed their advantages further in that direction, was much accelerated by an English rocket brigade—that new and formidable weapon of modern warfare being then first brought into action. "Such was its effect upon the enemy," writes the marquis of Londonderry, "that a solid square of French infantry, upon the flank of which the brigade opened its fire, surrendered in a few minutes."

The result of the second day of the "battle of Leipsic" upon the French army, was, that it became so broken and disorganised, and was so in want of all the matériel of war, that to retreat appeared the only course left open; and that course the marshals and generals, who gathered round Napoleon after the troops had bivouacked for the night, strongly advised him to adopt. Worn out with fatigue, he fell asleep on the chair in which he sat, and slept undisturbed for a quarter of an hour. Suddenly awaking, he exclaimed, "Am I awake? or is it a dream?" The painful reality soon burst upon him, and he made up his mind to meet it. He gave immediate orders as to the fortresses which were to be abandoned; also directions as to the line of retreat: wrote to the king of Saxony, telling him that the French were about to leave Leipsic, and that he might either follow their fortunes or remain, and make a separate peace with the allies; and then leaving the bivouac, he retired to the Prussian hotel at Leipsic—not to rest, for he occupied himself till daybreak in giving orders to his officers. The king of Saxony had an interview with him after his arrival at the hotel; and there can be little doubt that the two were most sincerely attached to each other. Their parting is described as a scene which touched the hearts of those present. It was, says Alison, "the separation of the first in genius from the first in elevated feeling and fidelity in misfortune."

At daybreak on the 19th of October, the French were in full retreat. They had lost, on the 16th and 18th, 40,000 men; but 135,000 remained; and these endeavoured to make their exit by every route that conducted in the direction of the Rhine. Those who were first in motion were the most successful in getting fairly on the road; but it was no easy task to evacuate Leipsic, choked up as all the approaches were by artillery and baggage waggons, ambulances, and other conveyances. Napoleon, who did not leave till ten o'clock—and, before he departed, again went, and said farewell to the king of Saxony and the queen—got out of the city with the greatest difficulty. In the meantime, the allies were preparing for an assault; and the magistrates waited upon Alexander, to implore him to avert that dreadful catastrophe. Macdonald, also, sent a flag of truce, offering to surrender all that remained of the Saxon troops and the town, if the French garrison and their artillery were permitted to retire unmolested. This offer was refused, and the allies continued to advance. The defence of the city rested with Macdonald, Lauriston, and Poniatowski, whose first act was to set fire to 300 artillery waggons and chariots, which they knew they could not carry off. The French and Poles who remained, defended the gates and barriers as long as possible; but their resistance was unavailing—gate after gate, and barrier after barrier were forced. Then the contest was continued in the streets; and on both sides, says colonel Mitchell, quoting from the narrative of one who took part in it—"exasperation was at its height. The French had loopholed villas and garden-walls, and maintained their ground with bitter resolution. In a large building, called the Civic School, they fought from storey to storey, and from class to class, till the last defenders were absolutely thrown out of the upper windows, to perish by the bayonets of the enraged multitudes below. By degrees the fury of battle degenerated into an absolute thirst for blood:" and for some time this horrid strife continued. At length—whether from a conviction that further resistance was useless, or from absolute inability to continue it any longer—opposition to the allies began to die away; and all the French troops were soon in full retreat, making for the Elster, which they had to cross. There another disaster awaited them. The gunner whom Napoleon had ordered to blow up the bridge over this river, which had been undermined for the purpose, applied the match too soon, under the idea that nothing was left on the right bank but the baggage, and that the enemy, whose tirailleurs he saw in the gardens of the suburbs, were approaching. The explosion terribly alarmed the fugitives, who were directing their course to the bridge: a shriek of horror burst from their ranks as the truth forced itself upon them; and, rushing to the river, many threw themselves in, and attempted to get across. Few succeeded. Macdonald was one who reached the opposite bank; Poniatowski was amongst those who perished.

Whilst hundreds were thus miserably struggling for life in the Elster—and whilst the city presented, in all its approaches, and the streets which led to them, heaps of dead and dying, and the débris of much that was valuable in matériel, as well as in carriages and baggage—the allied sovereigns entered from the south, and the crown-prince of Sweden came in from the east. Surrounded by their numerous staffs, they met in the great square; and there all was exultation—the shouts of the people, the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, the display of banners and flags, and the merry peals from the bells of all the churches, evincing their joy. The king of Saxony was made a prisoner, but treated with the greatest respect.—The French lost on this day, in killed, wounded, prisoners, and drowned in the Elster, more than 20,000 men; Lauriston and Regnier, seven generals of division, seven brigadiers, and several hundred staff and other officers, were among the prisoners. The allies took, also, 200 cannon, and 900 caissons or waggons. Their loss, in men, was great—46,000 in the battles of the 16th and 18th, and the assault of Leipsic on the 19th; which included twenty-one generals, and 1,793 general officers: nearly one-half the total loss fell upon the Russians. Of the dead, on both sides, none was regretted more than prince Poniatowski; his corpse was found, and interred at Leipsic with every mark of respect.

Napoleon continued the retreat by Marc-Renstaedt, Weissenfels, Rippach, and Freyburg, to Erfurth, where the wreck of his fine army arrived on the 23rd of October. They had been harassed in their retreat by Blucher and Sacken, losing both prisoners and guns; and were glad to get under the shelter of the works of Erfurth, where they were supplied with ammunition, food, and clothing. Their German allies had now entirely deserted them: not a single soldier of that nation was left in their ranks. Many Poles had also deserted; and less than 90,000 men followed the eagles out of Erfurth: they were divided into six corps, under Victor, Ney, Bertrand, Marmont, Augereau, and Macdonald. St. Cyr still remained in Dresden; and numerous garrisons were in the fortresses on the Elbe, the Oder, and the Vistula; where the stragglers, sick and wounded, who could reach them, took refuge. The emperor left Erfurth on the 25th, and took the road to Hanau, a town of Hesse-Cassel, on the left bank of the Kinzig, near its junction with the Maine. There general Wrede, at the head of the Austro-Bavarian army, with the troops of Würtemberg—together about 60,000 men—had marched by another road, with a view to arrest the retreat of the French; whilst Blucher followed in their rear. The retreating army reached Hanau on the 30th of October, to find their advance impeded by this force, which was posted in the forest of Hanau, directly across the great road to Mayence, which the French must take. But though fugitives, the troops of Napoleon evinced all their old courage and determination. The remaining two battalions of the old guard, under general Curial, with their cavalry, under general Nansouty, supported by general Drouet and fifty pieces of artillery, made a desperate charge upon the enemy drawn up to receive them. They literally crushed down the ranks in the quarters where they came in contact with the Bavarians; and though the latter stood their ground well, the French fought their way through, with the loss of 7,000 killed and wounded; 3,000 of the latter were left in the forest. Wrede had 12,000 men put hors de combat. The next day Napoleon pursued his route to the Rhine, Mortier commanding the rear-guard; Marmont being left before Hanau to protect his retreat. Mortier drove a party of Austrians, who were with Wrede, from that town, and Marmont forced the right of the enemy back on the Maine. The French were pursued by Wrede, and at first discomfited, but they finally beat back the Bavarians. Wrede, severely wounded, had to relinquish the command: the pursuit was discontinued; and the rear-guard joined the main army at Frankfort. That army crossed the Rhine on the 1st of November, and entered Mayence, where the emperor remained six days, till he saw all the relics of his once splendid force collected. Then, leaving the command to Ney—for Murat had left him at Erfurth, under pretence that his presence was required at Naples—he took his way to France, and arrived at St. Cloud on the 9th.

The allied troops had followed the French, but had not been quite so rapid in their movements. Their advanced guard entered Frankfort on the 4th of November, the head-quarters of the sovereigns being fixed at Aschaffenburg, and those of Blücher at Geissen. The capture of Hochheim, and the tête-de-pont of Cassel, by Gölitz, closed the campaign, as far as the main armies on either side were concerned. The allies were then posted, for repose after their toil, around Frankfort, on the right bank of the Rhine, their bivouacs extending some way along the river, on both sides of the town. The French were principally stationed at Mayence and Coblenz; they had not a soldier, except in garrison, on the left side of the river. Though there was no more fighting in the field, the fortresses in the hands of the French were not neglected. St. Cyr was blockaded in Dresden by Klenau, after he had gallantly sallied from the city, and defeated the Russians, on the 17th of October. After suffering greatly from famine, hundreds of both soldiers and citizens dying of hunger, he capitulated on the 6th of November, on condition that the garrison—consisting of thirty-two generals, 1,795 officers, and 33,000 rank and file, 25,000 being effective—should be sent to France, not to serve till they were exchanged. It is a blot on the character of the allied sovereigns, that they refused to ratify this convention; and St. Cyr and his companions were detained prisoners of war. Stettin was taken on the 21st, Torgau on the 28th, of November. Other small fortresses were given up: Dantzic held out till the 1st of January, 1814, when it capitulated.

Thus the results of the campaign were very fatal to Napoleon. The disasters of the French re-established the independence of Germany. Of the possessions of France beyond the Rhine, Hamburg, Magdeburg, and Wittenberg, on the Elbe; Cüstrin and Glogau, on the Oder; and the citadels of Würzburg and Erfurth, alone remained. The Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved; and the domination of Napoleon beyond that river was at an end. More than 300,000 men had been lost to the empire; and of 1,200 cannon, 1,000 remained in the enemy's hands. These were the results in Germany; but the effects extended beyond that country, as will be shown in succeeding pages.

BEFORE we follow Napoleon to Paris, the affairs of Italy, and the events which transpired in Holland, in the latter part of the year 1813, connected as they are with the history of France, require a brief notice.

We have seen that Napoleon, when he joined the grand army, sent prince Eugene to Italy, for the purpose of organising a contingent in that country, which could be brought into action against Austria, if necessary.* The prince arrived at Milan on the 18th of May, to find that the once fine army of Italy was reduced, by the Russian disasters, to a few hundred privates, and about 300 commissioned and non-commissioned officers. His orders from the emperor were, to raise an army of 80,000 men, all native soldiers. The prince could not rally round the eagles so large a number; but in little more than six weeks he had enrolled 50,000 men, who had, however, a large Austrian force opposed to them; and instead of threatening Vienna, he had to defend himself from the attacks of the enemy.

Part of his army was stationed between Udina and Gorizia; and part was posted by Palma-Nuova to the heights of Tarvis and Villach; the two divisions occupying all the eastern passes which lead into Germany. Opposite to them was a respectable Austrian army of full 50,000 men, under field-marshal Hiller; and this force was, shortly after the campaign commenced, supported by the landwehr of Illyria and Croatia. On the 17th of July, two columns of this army passed the frontier stream of the Save at Agram, directing their march on Karlstadt and Fiume. General Jeannin, who commanded that part of the Italian army with whom this Austrian force would first have come in contact, was obliged to retreat: his retrograde movement was the signal for insurrection; and the inhabitants of Croatia, Illyria, and the whole Dalmatian coast, eagerly returned to their allegiance to Francis Joseph. Prince Eugene then found, that he must abandon a considerable part of the line he at first occupied. He withdrew, therefore, to an intrenched camp at Tarvis; and the Austrians having occupied Villach, he drove them out, and established his head-quarters there. The maritime coast was then occupied by the Austrians, general Nugent taking possession of Fiume towards the end of August. The Italians, however, carried the Austrian positions on Mount Leobel and at Fies-tritz; but were defeated, with the loss of 1,200 men, in an attack on the Austrian lines. Hiller having followed up this success by marching with the bulk of his army towards Trieste, prince Eugene took advantage of his having weakened his forces in that direction, and marching on Fiume, drove out the garrison which Hiller had left there, replacing it with Italians. These military events led to no decisive result; but as Istria followed the example of Croatia, and revolted against the authority of France, the advantage was certainly on the side of Austria, whose cause soon became triumphant. Hiller's army being reinforced by the landwehr of the adjoining province, he passed the Drave on the 19th of September; and the accession of Bavaria to the European alliance against France, having again given Austria the command of the Tyrol, he was enabled to advance his army so as to bring it in unexpected proximity to prince Eugene's force, which he drove from the fortified position of Tarvis; obliging the viceroy to fall back from the mountains to the plain of Friuli, and concentrate his troops on the banks of the Tagliamento. He had lost 15,000 men since the commencement of the campaign—a loss which he attempted to supply by ordering a levy of conscripts to that amount. But the conscripts did not readily obey the call; and the Austrians, supported by the spirit displayed by the population, successively drove the viceroy from post to post till he had to fall back on the Adige. Trieste was bombarded, and taken on the 31st of October; Dalmatia was subdued before the end of November; Palma-Nuova was besieged, and Venice invested; all the continental part of Venetia was taken possession of; and the country, to Ferrara and the banks of the Po, was in the hands of the Austrian troops.

Stimulated by the patriotic feeling evinced in Germany, and not ignorant of the enthusiasm with which the Croats, Illyrians, and Istrians were seizing the opportunity of turning against France, and reacknowledging the sovereignty of Austria—the inhabitants of Holland, after the battle of Leipsic, began to long for the presence of their old sovereign; and they soon had the opportunity of recovering their independence. There were only 6,000 French troops, and two German regiments, in the country. As the allies, under Bulow and Winzingerode, advanced by the road of Münster, the douaniers from the coast, and the garrison of Amsterdam, were withdrawn, and concentrated at Utrecht. The inhabitants of the capital immediately rose en masse, deposed the French authorities, hoisted the orange flag, and established a provisional government. Their example was followed by the people of Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Delft, Leybach, Haarlem, and the other chief towns: the provisional government issued a proclamation from the Hague, announcing that Holland was free; and the cry of "Orange Boven" resounded through the land. The prince of Orange, who was in England, was sent for, and reached the Hague on the 27th of November. The Russians, early in December, invested and took the forts of Mayder and Hafweg; Bulow captured Dornburg and Arnheim: the French then withdrew altogether from Holland; the fleet in the Texel hoisted the Orange flag; the prince of Orange entered Amsterdam in triumph; and when 1813 closed, the tricolour floated only over the walls of Bergen-op-Zoom, and a few of the fortresses on the southern frontiers.

When Napoleon arrived in Paris, in November,

* See ante, p. 223.

1813, he found the public, says Thiers, "in a state of profound sorrow, almost of despair, and particularly irritated against him." They "could not forgive him for neglecting the happy opportunity afforded by the victories of Lutzen and Bautzen, to conclude peace. They regarded his ambition as extravagant—as cruel to humanity, fatal to France." These feelings were very general amongst the people, but they had not yet extended to the council of state, which the emperor convoked immediately after his arrival. On their assembling, he laid before the members an exact account of his losses, described the position of his remaining army, and insisted upon the necessity of vigorous measures to avert the dangers which threatened France. "Why should we fear to speak the truth?" he said. "Has not Wellington invaded the south? Do not the Russians menace the north? What shame! and the nation does not rise, en masse, to drive them away. All my allies have abandoned me: the Saxons betrayed me on the field of battle; the Bavarians endeavoured to cut off my retreat. Never talk of peace till I have burned Munich. The same triumvirate which partitioned Poland has arrayed itself against France: we can have no truce till it is defeated. I demand 300,000 men; and, with what remains of my armies, I shall then have a million of soldiers. Councillors! what we want is energy; every one must act; and you must give an example of courage." The council, after this address, decided that, under the pressing emergency, it was necessary to have recourse to a dictator, and to call upon France to make great sacrifices to sustain her honour, and defeat the efforts of her enemies. Of those sacrifices, the emperor set the example, by appropriating 30,000,000 francs (£1,200,000) from his private coffers in the Tuileries, to the public service. He followed up this step by assuming the dictatorial power; and his first exercise of it was, to increase the land, window, and door tax thirty per cent.; to double the tax on movables; and to add three-fifths to the excise duties and the salt-tax. These harsh measures were necessary to afford funds for the unavoidable expenditure; for, at that period, the finances were at the lowest ebb. The sale of the communes* had not produced half the amount that was expected; and a loan was impossible, for no capitalist would advance his money to the government. The public were indignant, however, both at the measures themselves, and at the manner in which the taxes were imposed: their pressure increased the popular discontent, which manifested itself on various occasions. That discontent was still further heightened as the real state of the army became disclosed. Whilst he was candid with the council, the emperor caused articles to be published in the Moniteur, to the effect, that his forces were being rapidly reorganised; and that the marshals had received sufficient reinforcements to enable them to maintain the barrier of the Rhine. These representations, for a time, deceived the public; but, when the truth was known, indignant denunciations were heard on every side; pasquinades were circulated; and such was the demonstration at the theatres, when anything was said on the stage which could be applied to the then state of France, that new dramas were prohibited which contained passages permitting of this temporary application; and, from those in possession of the stage, all such passages were carefully expunged.

The senate assembled on the 15th of November, and immediately agreed to place at the disposal of the minister of war, the 300,000 conscripts demanded by the emperor. That body had, in the previous month, at the request of the empress, granted 280,000 men; and from both these levies the married men were to be exempt; but it was found impossible, after the levies in the early part of the year, to complete the 580,000 from the ranks of the single men. The senate also decreed, that the council and senate should assist at the sittings of the legislative body, and that the emperor should name a president of that body. He did so, and named Regnier, the duke of Massa, who was not a member; twenty-three vacant seats were also filled up by the same authority, instead of by election. Previous to the meeting of that body a correspondence took place with the allies, founded on proposals received from them, to reopen negotiations for peace. During their advance on the Rhine, the count St. Aignan, ambassador from France to the court of Saxe-Weimar, was taken prisoner. He was received with kindness by Metternich; and, when the allied sovereigns were at Frankfort, they sent for the count, to whom they repeated their desire for peace. He had permission to return to Paris, being entrusted with a private letter from the emperor of Austria to Maria-Louisa; and a diplomatic note, signed by the three sovereigns, in which they proposed, as the bases for negotiation, that "France should be restricted to its natural limits between the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees; that Spain should be restored to the ancient dynasty; and that the independence of Italy, Germany, and Holland should be secured." Maret, the duke of Bassano, replied to this note, on behalf of the emperor, "that a peace, concluded on the basis of the independence of all nations, as well in a continental as a maritime point of view, had been the constant object of his majesty's solicitude." This answer was not deemed sufficiently explicit by Metternich, as it did not positively accept the bases proposed by the allies. Maret, however, replied, "that in admitting, as the basis, the independence of all nations, the emperor really had accepted all for which the allies contended." This explanation was deemed satisfactory; and, on the 1st of December, the allies published a declaration from Frankfort, in which they expressed their desire of "obtaining a general peace, on a solid foundation;" and avowed, that "they did not make war on France (which they wished to see powerful and happy, its commerce reviving, and arts flourishing, and its territory more extensive than was known under its ancient kings), but on that preponderance which, to the misfortune of Europe and of France, the emperor Napoleon had long exercised beyond the limits of that country." It was to put down that preponderance they had taken up arms, and they would not lay them down "before they had attained that great and beneficent result; till the political state of Europe was once more secured; till the immutable principles of justice had resumed the ascendant over vain pretensions; nor till the sanctity of treaties had at length secured a real peace." If Napoleon had at once closed with these proposals, Caulaincourt admits that he might have arrested the march of the allies, and concluded peace. But the despatch of the latter, accepting the declarations of Napoleon as satisfactory, was sent off on the 10th of December, and he suffered the negotiation to linger; no answer being returned till the 6th of January, 1814. Of course the allies, with the experience of the armistice of Plesswitz, were not idle during that time; and when the emperor did resume the negotiation, circumstances were materially altered.

The session of the legislative body was opened by the emperor on the 19th of December. He addressed the members in a long speech, in which he spoke of the great victories gained in the late campaign, and expressed his desire for peace, which, he said, "added to the security of thrones and of families. Negotiations," he continued, "had been commenced with the allied powers; he adhered to the preliminary terms which they had offered; and had given orders that all the original papers should be communicated to the members." These papers were submitted to a joint commission of ten members; five being members of the senate, and five of the legislative body; and, in the nomination of the latter, the first symptoms of opposition were shown. Both lists were prepared by Maret, and circulated amongst the senators and deputies. The former accepted the list without hesitation; but the latter threw it aside, and nominated five independent members, of whom M. Lainé was chairman. Though a joint commission, separate reports were made. That laid before the senate by M. Fontanes was adopted by that body, and was highly approbatory of the government policy. The report presented to the legislative body was drawn up by M. Lainé. It was adopted by the commission on the 28th of December; and, on the 29th and 30th, was discussed in the legislative body, which adopted it on the latter day, by 223 votes to 31. The document was ordered to be printed, to the great indignation of the emperor, as he considered it reflected strongly upon his conduct. "To prevent the country from becoming the prey of foreigners," said the report, "it was necessary to nationalise the war; which could only be done by uniting the nation to the government in closer bonds. It was indispensable to give a satisfactory answer to their enemy's accusations of aggrandisement; and there would be real magnanimity in a formal declaration, that the independence of the French people, and the integrity of the territory of France, were all that they contended for. It was for the government frankly to propose measures that would at once repel the enemy, and secure peace on a durable basis. Those measures would be soon efficacious, if the French nation were persuaded that the government, in good faith, aspired only to the glory of peace, and that their blood would no longer be shed, except to defend their country, and to secure the protection of the laws. These words, however—'peace' and 'country'—would resound in vain, if the institutions were not guaranteed which secured those blessings. It appeared, therefore, to the committee, to be indispensable, that, at the same time that the government proposed the most prompt and energetic measures for the security of the country, his majesty should be supplicated to maintain, entire, the execution of the laws which guarantee to the French nation liberty and security, and the free exercise of its political rights." The Confederation of the Rhine, and the sovereignty of Holland, might be abandoned as useless to France; and the necessity of peace was insisted upon from the state of the empire, which "was menaced on all points;" whilst "commerce was annihilated, agriculture languished, industry was expiring, and there was no Frenchman who had not, in his family or fortune, some wound to heal."

As soon as the emperor was aware of the nature of this report, and that it was ordered to be printed, he was extremely indignant. He ordered the printing to be stopped; seized the proofs; and summoning the council of state, he inveighed bitterly against the deputies, who, he said, "had taken advantage of the communication made to them, to arm against him—that is, against the country. Instead of aiding him by their efforts, they restrained those that he would make. An imposing attitude could alone repel the enemy: theirs attracted him. Instead of exposing to him a front of brass, they laid bare the wounds of the country." Having exhausted his themes of reproach, he read a decree, which he told the council he intended to issue, and by which he put an end to the session.

Two-fifths of the members had served their term; that of another fifth would expire on the 1st of January, 1814: he therefore prorogued the body till the elections were completed. On New-year's-day, there was the usual levée at the Tuileries; and when some of the members of the legislative body presented themselves, he addressed them in language of taunt and reproach. "Messieurs," said he, "you might have done much good, and you have only done harm. One of you in twelve only are good; the rest are factious. What do you hope for by putting yourselves in opposition? To put yourselves in power?" * * * "Four times I have had the votes of four millions of men for me: I have a title to supreme authority, which you have not." * * * "M. Lainé is a conspirator—an agent of England: he is in correspondence with her, by means of the advocate Desèze. The others are actuated by bad motives." * * * "Your report is drawn up in an astute and perfidious spirit, of the effects of which you are well aware. Two battles lost in Champagne would not have done me so much mischief." * * * "You wish to imitate the constituent assembly, and bring about a revolution. Be it so. You will find that I shall not imitate Louis XVI. I would rather abandon the throne. I would prefer making part of the sovereign people, to being an enslaved king." * * * "As to the enemy, in three months we shall have peace. The enemy will be chased from our territory, or I shall be dead. We have greater resources than you imagine. Our enemies have never conquered us—never shall. They will be chased across the frontier more quickly than they have now passed it." This is not above one-third of the emperor's address, which was as undignified as it was intemperate. The deputies retired, soon after, from the Tuileries, and went to their different departments; and the emperor employed himself in preparations to resist the enemy, who—no answer having been received to the communication of December 10th, agreeing to negotiate upon the explanation of the proposed bases given by the emperor—were pressing forward into France. On the 6th of January, an answer was dispatched; but, after the month's delay, the allies were not disposed to negotiate, except on the condition that France should give up all her conquests. They have been very much blamed for departing from the conditions proposed at Frankfort. But Napoleon's conduct a few months previously in Germany, could only induce them to believe, when he was adopting the same policy of delay, that he had the same object in view at one period as he had at the other; viz., gaining the time necessary to enable him to recruit his army, disabled by the previous campaign. Napoleon's own friends and confidants admit that he might have concluded peace, if he had caused the negotiations to be followed up, and had not let a month elapse without taking a single step in advance.

That month was employed, not in acts of peace, but in preparations for war. When the allies first advanced to the Rhine, Napoleon had dispatched engineers to repair all the works of defence, fortresses, and forts on that river; and the marshals in command were ordered to make adequate preparations for resisting the advance of the enemy. Alison remarks, that "the great frontier stream, the Rhine, above 500 miles in length, extending from the foot of the Alps to the sands of Holland, and strongly studded with fortresses, presented indeed a most formidable line of defence." But it required from three to four hundred thousand men to garrison the works, and to oppose anything like an imposing front to an invader, such as threatened to enter France in the last month of 1813. To attempt to stem the torrent with sixty or seventy thousand broken and dispirited troops—troops not only worn out with fatigue, but who were then suffering from disease, and equally destitute of medical and military stores—was perfectly useless. These remains of the "grand army" were therefore ordered to fall back on the Vosges. In December, all the fortresses in the line of march which the allies were likely to take, were put in a state of defence; the levies of men voted by the senate were enforced; and in those districts which the enemy's forces seemed destined to enter, a levy en masse was ordered. By a decree of the 4th of January, the budget was fixed at 1,176,800,000 francs (£47,072,000); and the new taxes imposed were ordered to be rigorously enforced.—After his return from Mayence, as already noticed, Napoleon had concluded the treaty of Valençay with Ferdinand VII.* He was prompted to abandon Spain by the necessities of his position; and the same necessities urged him to endeavour, once more, to come to an accommodation with the pope. Early in January, he opened a communication with his holiness, through a lady, the marquise Anne Brignole, of Sienna, attached to the household of Maria-Louisa: rather a singular negotiator to employ with the head of the church. The negotiation failed, as the pope positively refused to accept or agree to any terms till he was restored to Rome. All efforts to move him from this determination failed; still the emperor appears to have been afraid to detain him at Fontainebleau. On the 22nd of January, he ordered him to be removed to the south of France. In hopes that his fortunes would change, however, he would not lose all hold of his victim, but caused him to be detained at Tarascon, near the mouth of the Rhone. There Pius was visited by the archbishop of Bourges, who had a similar mission to that entrusted to the marquise Brignole; but he equally failed in inducing the pope to alter his resolution.

Simultaneously with the events we have described, Napoleon was carrying on negotiations with Murat; and that intrusive sovereign was, at the same time, endeavouring to come to terms with the allies. He demanded from Napoleon, that he should put the provinces beyond the Po at his disposal, and he would engage that the Austrians should never cross the Adige. He urged a speedy answer, as time pressed, and he, "in his turn, would be driven to make a choice, and forced to join the enemy." Napoleon returned no answer to Murat's demand; and the latter joined the allies, on their guaranteeing to him his Italian dominions—marching to the Po with 30,000 men. Leaving 10,000 on that river, he entered Rome on the 19th of January, at the head of 20,000; the French garrison retiring into the castle of St. Angelo. Immediately on establishing himself in the once "imperial city," Murat issued a proclamation to his soldiers; in which he said, that "as long as he could believe that the emperor Napoleon combated for peace and the happiness of France, he fought by his side. It was no longer possible to give credit to that illusion. The emperor breathed nothing but war; and he (Murat) would betray the interests of his native country, of his present dominions, and of his troops, if he did not at once separate his arms from the emperor's, and join them to those of the powerful allies, whose magnanimous intentions were, to re-establish the independence of nations and the dignity of thrones."—The defection of Murat, like that of Moreau and Bernadotte, may confirm the opinion entertained of the policy of the emperor, as what they said of it corresponds with the facts known to the world, and the representations of those who remained his friends; but it was damaging to the character of the individuals—of Murat especially, the brother-in-law of Napoleon, who had elevated him to the rank of royalty, and had always been his fast friend.—Another friend and ally finally seceded from France about the same time that Murat abandoned the cause of the emperor. In the middle of January, the crown-prince of Denmark signed a treaty with Austria and Prussia; and Napoleon was left without an ally—almost without a friend; for even prince Eugene Beauharnais entertained overtures from the allies; and whilst he professed that he would not separate himself from one who had been to him so great a benefactor, he entered into negotiations with that benefactor's enemies, to serve his own interests.

When the allies began a fresh campaign, they had concentrated the entire forces of Germany against France. The princes of the dissolved Confederation of the Rhine all joined the new Germanic league, except the king of Saxony, who was detained a prisoner at Berlin. All his resources, civil and military, were, however, made use of by the allies, under whose banners the Saxon soldiers served as cheerfully as if they were led by their prince. The German princes acted much more zealously against Napoleon than they had done for him; and they each supplied a portion of their revenue to the fund for the maintenance of the army; the sum thus raised amounting to 17,116,500 florins, equal to £1,770,000. The twenty-one states that had formed the confederation, also engaged to raise seven corps d'armée—comprising 103,520 men. By this accession of force, and the all but universal arming of the German people, who, as landwehr or militia, eagerly came forward to support the regular armies, the allies were enabled to blockade all the fortresses on the Rhine, the Elbe, and the Oder, which remained in the hands of the French, and in the walls of which about 100,000 excellent troops were shut up, who would have been of the utmost use to Napoleon in the field. Several of his marshals persuaded him to evacuate these posts, and to concentrate their garrisons; but he could not reconcile himself to the loss of power and prestige which he thought such a step would imply.—Besides the force employed in these blockades, the allies had large armies under prince Schwartzenberg, Blucher, and Bernadotte, ready to invade France and the Netherlands. The first was called "the grand army;" and, besides the Austrian corps of Bubna, Giulay, and Lichtenstein, it comprised the Würtemberg corps, under prince Eugene; marshal Wrede's Bavarians; the Austrian guards and reserve, under the prince of Hesse-Homburg; the German confederates, under prince Philippe of Hesse-Homburg, and count Hochberg; the Prussian guards; and the Russian reserves, under the grand-duke Constantine and Milaradovitch: in all, nearly 250,000. Blucher's army was called the army of Silesia. It included the Prussian corps of York and Kleist; the Russian corps of Langeron and Sacken; and two corps of German confederates; and the total number of men was 137,000—of whom 50,000 were Russians. Bernadotte's army comprised the Russian corps of Winzingerode; the Prussians, under Bulow; 30,000 German confederates, under the dukes of Saxe-Weimar and Brunswick; Walmoden's corps; 20,000 Swedish auxiliaries; and 9,000 English: in all, 174,000 men. But this immense force did not constitute the entire military strength of the "grand alliance." There was an Austrian reserve, of 20,000, under the arch-duke Ferdinand; a Russian corps, blockading Hamburg, under Benningsen, 50,000 strong; a Russian reserve in Poland, of the same number 50,000 Prussian landwehr, by whom the fortresses on the Elbe and the Oder were invested; a Prussian reserve, of 20,000 men, in Westphalia, under prince Louis of Hesse-Homburg;

15,000 Russians and Prussians who were blockading Glogau; and an Austrian force of 80,000, under marshal Bellegarde, in Italy. Here was an additional force of 235,000 men: the entire military array comprising 796,000 men of all arms. No wonder that, ultimately, the power of Napoleon fell before such a stupendous force.

These various corps were scattered over an immense extent of territory; but it was estimated, that above 350,000 men could be immediately brought into action between the Rhine and Paris. To oppose them, Napoleon had the "grand army" of 105,700 men, which he commanded in person; and the army of the south, 30,000 strong, under Augereau. He had, also, 80,000 men in garrison in France, besides the 100,000 who occupied the forts on the Rhine, Elbe, and Oder; a corps of 20,000, under Maison, in the Netherlands; one of the same number, in Germany, under Davoust; the army of Italy, 50,000 strong, under Beauharnais; and the armies of the Pyrenees and Aragon, under Soult and Suchet, comprising 90,000 troops, the latter occupied by Wellington. Including them, Napoleon's military force was 496,000 men.

The campaign may be said to have opened on the 21st of December, 1813; when—prince Schwartzenberg and Blucher having issued a proclamation, declaring that it was against Napoleon and his principles that war was waged, and not against France—the first corps of the allied troops crossed the Rhine, and entered Switzerland, the entire army lying close to that country, which embraced the opportunity of again asserting its independence. Blucher's force extended from Mannheim to Coblenz; and, on the 31st of December, he crossed the river, blockaded Mayence with part of his force, and with the remainder pushed through France into Champagne, hoping to meet and unite with the other portion of the army before the end of January. To Bernadotte—who entertained the hope, if Napoleon were deposed, of becoming his successor, and was therefore reluctant, though he had joined the alliance, to act against France or Frenchmen—was left the task of completing the conquest of the Netherlands, where France had 70,000 men in garrison and in the field. It was with Bernadotte's army that the 9,000 English, under Sir Thomas Graham, were destined to act.

Napoleon, aware of his danger, but not anticipating the full extent of the disasters which awaited him, left Paris on the 25th of January, having, before his departure, again conferred the regency on Maria-Louisa; joining with her his brother Joseph as lieutenant of the empire—to whom he entrusted the management of his most important affairs. A very impressive and affecting scene took place on the 23rd, the day on which these appointments were made. It was

Sunday; and, having first heard mass, Napoleon assembled the principal officers of the national guard at the Tuileries; and, introducing to them the empress and the king of Rome—described as being "a most lovely child of three years old"—he briefly, but feelingly, addressed the officers, telling them that he left in their charge all he held dearest in the world—his wife and his son—and asking their protection for them. The enthusiasm of that moment was unbounded, and vows of attachment and fidelity were made. The next day was employed in making his last arrangements, which included the burning of a great many papers; and, on the 25th, he embraced his wife and child, and bade them farewell. He never saw them again!

By this time the army of Silesia had overrun the whole country from the Rhine to the Marne, and had descended into Champagne; whilst the allied grand army, having taken possession of Franche-Comté, Lorraine, and Alsace, had debouched on the plains of Burgundy, and opened a communication, by its right, with the army of Blucher. Napoleon joined his army on the 27th of January; and, directing his march on the Aube, he took up ground between the two invading forces. The Prussians occupied Brienne, near the right bank of that river; the approach to which was by an almost impenetrable forest. The emperor was guided through its mazes by a parish priest, who had escaped from the Prussians; and the passage of the army was greatly facilitated by the zeal of the peasantry, who, in that district, did not manifest any enmity against their emperor. On the 1st of February, Blucher himself was at Brienne, with Sacken's Russian corps. Here the first action of the campaign took place. On that day Ney drove in the outposts, which was the first notice Blucher (who was at dinner) received of the approach of the enemy, so well had Napoleon laid his plans. A destructive fire of artillery was then opened on the town, into which the infantry rushed, charged through the streets, and captured twelve guns. They were, however, soon expelled, the guns recaptured, and eight of their own taken. The fighting continued till nightfall—was renewed in the night, and again the next day, Blucher and Sacken being both very nearly made prisoners; whilst, on the other side, Napoleon narrowly escaped death from the lance of a Cossack. Ultimately Blucher withdrew his troops to Trannes, on the road to Bar-sur-Aube, where the allied grand army was cantoned. Each side lost about 3,000 men in this affair.

The allied generals now found it necessary to concentrate their forces, and employed the 30th and 31st of January in getting the grand army into line at Trannes—the corps of Wittgenstein and Wrede being stationed at Vassy and St. Dizier, to cover the right, and open up a communication with the corps of York. On the 1st of February, 100,000 men were collected under the emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia; but Schwartzemberg chiefly directed the movements of the mighty mass. The troops were drawn up on the heights of Trannes, the right being composed of the corps of the hereditary prince of Würtemberg; the centre, of the Prussians, under Blucher; and the left, of Giulay's Austrians; the Russians, under Barclay de Tolly, were in reserve on the centre, and Colloredo's corps on the left. As there were a great variety of uniforms—to distinguish them from the enemy, all, from the general to the private, wore a white badge round the left arm. Napoleon, finding that he was outnumbered, resolved not to give battle; but he did not decline accepting it when offered. His army was posted directly opposite the allies, on the plain bounded by the Aube, and its tributary the Voire; the right, under Girard, being based on Dienville, thirteen miles north-west of Bar-sur-Aube; the centre, at La Rothiere and La Giberie; and the left, under Marmont, at Chaumesnil and Morvilliers. Napoleon commanded in the centre, having Mortier, Ney, and Oudinot in reserve in the rear. His entire force amounted to about 50,000 men.

The morning of the 1st of February was dark and stormy; the snow fell thickly, and, till mid-day, everything was in gloom and obscurity. About one o'clock the sky cleared; and Schwartzemberg having vested the general command in Blucher, orders were given to attack the French in all their positions. Some delay occurred in getting up the artillery, owing to the state of the roads; but, by three or four o'clock, the action became general, and it continued till midnight, having been fought, during part of the time, while snow was falling so thickly as to compel the combatants to pause, being unable to distinguish each other. The French were, by the above hour, driven from all their positions, which they bravely defended, notwithstanding their disparity of numbers; and, in the darkness of the night, the emperor withdrew to Brienne, which lay about two leagues and a-half to the north. He lost, in this engagement, 5,000 killed and wounded, 1,000 prisoners, and seventy-three pieces of cannon. The loss of the allies was nearly as great in men; but it scarcely affected their numerical strength, whilst it was a serious matter for Napoleon, with his reduced force.

The French emperor had thus failed in preventing the junction of the allied armies, and suffered a great diminution of strength. But he did not despair. He fell back on Troyes, the capital of Champagne, Marmont commanding the rear-guard, and gallantly maintaining a running fight with the Bavarians under Wrede, who had 20,000 men to 10,000 French. The allies occupied Brienne on the 2nd of February; and the pursuit was very tardily kept up, which was attributed to the secret reluctance of the emperor of Austria to push matters to an extremity with his son-in-law—at all events, till the succession to the empire was secured to the son of Maria-Louisa. Whilst Blucher's cry was constantly "to Paris!" (and he was supported by the Russians), impediments were as constantly thrown in the way by prince Schwartzemberg. At Brienne, it was determined, once more, to divide the grand army from the army of Silesia—a step which very nearly ruined the allied cause. It was arranged that Blucher should advance on Paris, by Chalons and the Marne; and that Schwartzemberg should make his way to the capital, by Troyes and the Seine. As soon as Napoleon was aware of this division of forces, he resolved to leave the Austrians in the rear, and attack Blucher. The Prussians pursued their march rapidly, by Chalons, which was wrested, by York, from Macdonald, who retired by Epernay to Paris. They occupied Champaubert, and advanced upon Montmirail, without opposition; the Russian division of Olsoofief being at the former town on the 10th of February, where it was ordered to remain till further orders. Napoleon had received reinforcements since his defeat at La Rothiere; his army at this time, as we learn from a letter he wrote to his brother Joseph on the 9th of February, amounting to nearly 70,000 men. It was composed of three corps. On the right was Oudinot, with 25,000 men; in the centre, Victor, with 14,000; and the emperor himself had 30,000. On the 10th, the advanced guard, under Marmont, descended upon Champaubert, where the Russians, about 6,000, were preparing their breakfast, little dreaming that an enemy was so near them. They were attacked both in front and flank, the French being, this time, greatly superior in numbers. The gallant Russians defended themselves throughout the day, but were ultimately defeated. Generals Corneloff and Udom, with 2,000 men and twelve guns, succeeded in cutting their way through the attacking force, and reached Pont-à-Binson; but Olsoofief, two other generals, forty-five officers, and 1,800 privates were taken; twenty-one pieces of cannon were captured by the victors. The remainder of the division fell on the field.

The next day Napoleon marched to Montmirail, to which point Sacken was hastening, with a view to effect a junction with York. The French advanced guard reached the town first, and Sacken was obliged to fight, as Olsoofief did, the previous day, with inferior numbers. The battle began at eleven o'clock; and a courier soon after arrived, with a despatch from general York, who could not possibly reach Montmirail before three; and when he did arrive, he came without his cannon, which, from the state of the roads, he had been compelled to leave in the rear. Blucher was at Vertus, 16 miles W.S.W. of Chalons. At that place the resonance of the cannon at Montmirail could be heard. But he had few troops with him, being waiting the arrival of Kleist's and Kaptsevich's corps; he was also destitute of cavalry; and Marmont, with 15,000 horse, had penetrated between him and his lieutenants. Sacken had to maintain the fight, therefore, unsupported, till the arrival of York in the afternoon; and then his force was not equal to that opposed to him. After a desperate combat of several hours—with the loss of 3,000 killed and wounded, 1,000 prisoners, and nine pieces of cannon, which could not be carried off, on account of the deep muddy roads—the allies retired towards Chateau-Thierry: their retreat was covered by Wassilchikoff's dragoons, who beat off the repeated charges of the French cuirassiers. Napoleon slept, that night, on straw, at the farmhouse of Grenots, and the next day started in pursuit. The French cavalry came up with, and defeated, the Prussian cavalry under general Horn, and dispersed a body of Russian infantry, taking 1,000 prisoners and three pieces of cannon. The main body, however, reached Chateau-Thierry, and crossed the Marne, destroying the bridges: this arrested the pursuit for a time.

On the 12th of February, Kleist and Kaptsevich joined Blucher. Being then at the head of 20,000 men, he advanced to Etoges, where Marmont was stationed, who fell back at the approach of the allies, retiring on the road to Chateau-Thierry, where Napoleon had halted till the bridges were repaired; and where the excesses committed by the Russians and Prussians in their retreat, caused him to be most joyfully received. Napoleon, apprised of Blucher's advance, left Chateau-Thierry on the evening of the 13th; and, at eight in the morning of the 14th, was joined by Marmont, who had just evacuated the village of Vauchamps, and was retreating in the face of the Prussians and Russians. Greatly outnumbered, and convinced, from the spirited and determined proceedings of the French, that Napoleon was with them, Blucher ordered his men to retire, which they did, formed in squares, the artillery being placed in the intervals. Repeatedly charged by the French cuirassiers, these gallant fellows continually closed up the ranks as their comrades fell, and fought their way to Champaubert. They could not defile very quickly through the village; and Napoleon sent Grouchy, at the head of 3,000 horse, to make a circuit, and attack them en flank as they emerged on the road. The position was fearful; but the greater part of the allies, with prince Augustus of Prussia at their head, forced their way through. The French cavalry, however, closed on the last squares, which had exhausted their ammunition; and two Russian battalions were literally "cut to pieces;" whilst two Prussian regiments were taken. The Russian horse artillery, formed into a line by their colonel, Shusherin, and headed by Blucher, dashed at the French cavalry sword in hand, and, cutting and riding down all that opposed them, escaped. The different corps reached Etoges, but were closely pursued by Marmont; and they continued their route to Bergères, where they arrived at midnight, and early the next morning were again in retreat to Chalons: there Blucher collected the remains of his forces, placing them in cantonments on the north-east of the Marne. In this affair, known as the battle of Vauchamps, the allies lost 7,000 killed and wounded, 3,000 prisoners, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The loss of the French was also heavy. After the allies had retreated, Napoleon returned to Montmirail, where he slept; and the next morning, with his guard and cuirassiers, he again set off in pursuit, turning towards the Seine.

Schwartzenberg's army—after its separation from the army of Silesia—had pursued its route to Troyes, which was entered by the allies on the 7th of February. The occupation of that place was of considerable importance; for it had ample accommodation for the sick and wounded, and was a common centre where all the roads and communications in the province met. The allied sovereigns established their head-quarters at Troyes, under the walls of which 100,000 men encamped; whilst a corps of Würtembergers and another of Bavarians, under Wrede, were dispatched to defile along the road to Paris, following the track of Napoleon, after his retirement from La Rothiere. Soon after the allies arrived at Troyes, the first movement in favour of the Bourbons took place.

The royalists had long been powerless as a political party, though their scattered remnants were still numerous. The survivors of the nobles who perished by the guillotine were, many of them, deprived alike of property and influence. Some retained both; and after the amnesty published by Napoleon, many emigrants had returned, of whom a part took office under him, and a part retired to their possessions, if they retained any; or adopted some means of maintaining their position if they had no property left. But it appears, that a Royalist Association, or confederacy, had always existed at Bordeaux, with a branch at Paris, which—although hope, at one time, had entirely fled—had, after the disasters of the Russian campaign, commenced, in profound secrecy, to concert measures for taking advantage of any circumstances that might offer, to advance the cause of the Bourbons. The principal members of that family were residing in Great Britain, under the protection of the British government: the comte d'Artois, at Holyrood palace, Edinburgh; Louis XVIII., the duke and duchess d'Angoulême, and the duke de Berri, at Hartwell, near Aylesbury, a seat of the Lee family. The government at London, had promised Louis and his relatives "a secure and honourable asylum," but distinctly declined to recognise the former as king of France: and although he protested against the "usurpation" of Napoleon, he took no step to assert his rights till the Royalist Association communicated with him, after the retreat from Moscow. When Napoleon recrossed the Rhine, Louis addressed a proclamation to the senate from Hartwell, calling upon that body to return to their ancient allegiance; and at the same time secretly circulated an address amongst all official personages in France, who were thought to be inclined to favour the return of the Bourbons. In this address, which was dated from Hartwell, December 1st, 1813, Louis undertook, if restored, "to forget the errors of his subjects, to recompense services, stifle resentments, legitimatise rank, and consolidate fortunes; to bring about, in short, nothing but an easy transition from present calamities and alarm, to future tranquillity and happiness." Application was next made to the British government, that the princes might be permitted to join the armies on the French territories. After much deliberation, permission was given, if they went simply as volunteers. In consequence of this permission, on the 2nd of February, 1814, the comte d'Artois landed at Rotterdam from Holyrood; and the duke d'Angoulême sailed for Spain, from whence he proceeded to join Wellington in the south of France. When the allied sovereigns entered Troyes (which was the residence of many of the exiled families), and when it was announced that Napoleon was retreating from La Rothiere, several members of those families hoisted the white cockade; and two of them, the marquis of Widranges and M. Goualt, after some difficulty, obtained an interview with the emperor Alexander. Their object was, to entreat the allies to favour the desire evinced for the restoration of the house of Bourbon; but the czar told them, the allies did not come to give a king to France, but to allow the inhabitants an opportunity of declaring their own wishes. As no manifestation in favour of Louis XVIII. could be obtained, the marquis left Troyes, and joined the comte d'Artois at Bâle. M. Goualt remained at Troyes, where the marquis de Vitrolles, a devoted adherent of the Bourbons, arrived about that time, to entreat the allies to make no delay in their advance on Paris. The marquis travelled under the name of M. St. Vincent; and his real rank, if revealed to the allied sovereigns, was not generally known.

Schwartzenberg would not remove from Troyes till the 11th of February. The prince of Würtemberg then assaulted and took Sens; and the vanguard of Wrede's division defeated the French near Nogent. A good many prisoners were taken, from whom Schwartzenberg ascertained, that Napoleon was moving in the direction of Blucher's force. This occasioned an alteration in the plans of the Austrian general, who ordered Wittgenstein and Wrede to occupy Donnemarie and Provins; and dispatched the prince of Würtemberg and general Bianchi (the successor of prince Colloredo, disabled from attending to military duty by a severe wound), to establish themselves at Montereau. On the 12th, Moret, seven miles from Montereau, was taken; Platoff occupied Nemours, nineteen miles from Fontainebleau; a Russian division established itself near that imperial palace; and Montargis was captured and occupied by Seslavin, a part of whose detachment was dispatched to Orleans. Schwartzenberg fixed his headquarters at Nogent-sur-Seine, on the left bank of that river, twenty-nine miles from Troyes; and established reserves between that place and Bray-sur-Seine. These movements caused great consternation in Paris, and the city was filled with the most alarming reports. While they were in progress, Napoleon had advanced from Montmirail through the forest of Brie, to the valley of the Seine, to join Victor and Oudinot, who were retiring before the allies. The junction was effected on the 16th, and that night Napoleon established his headquarters at Guignes. The next morning he received large reinforcements from Spain; and the junction of several corps that had been acting against the army of Silesia, gave him a force of 55,000 men. Count Pahlen was then at Mormant, with 3,000 foot and half that number of horse. Hearing of the large army that was rapidly advancing to his vicinity, he retreated on Nangis, but was met by the French; and being so inferior in number, to avoid defeat was impossible. Wittgenstein came up with reinforcements, but only to be repulsed, and with difficulty to avoid being taken prisoner: the detachment was nearly destroyed; eleven guns, forty caissons, and 2,100 men were taken, and 900 killed. The same day, the Bavarians were defeated by Macdonald and Victor; but the French being too much exhausted for pursuit, they succeeded in crossing the Seine. On the 18th, Napoleon attacked the allies, under the prince of Würtemberg and general Bianchi, at Montereau, and again victory alighted on his banners. There were not more than 18,000 men opposed to 50,000: yet they made a most gallant defence, and the French lost 3,000 men in killed and wounded, before the allies were driven from their position, and compelled to cross the Yonne—retiring in the direction of Sens, after they had destroyed the bridge to arrest pursuit. In this battle, the allies also lost about 3,000 killed and wounded, 2,000 prisoners, and four standards. Whilst the contest was raging, Napoleon, standing on the heights of Surville, surveying the field, was greatly exposed to the fire of the allies. Being reminded of his danger by some of his staff, he laughingly replied—"Fear nothing! the bullet is not yet cast which is to kill me."

This victory caused him to believe that he could yet retrieve everything; and as he noticed the flight of the allies, he exclaimed—"Thank God! I have saved my capital!" For the time he had; as the allied commanders, astonished at the progress he had made, and at the prowess of his troops, withdrew their men from most of the positions they occupied, and cantoned them between Nogent, Bray, and Troyes. The grand army still mustered about 100,000 men; and Napoleon, thinking that much greater destruction might have been caused, and the rout made more decisive, if his generals had done their duty, blamed several of them very severely—Victor especially. He deprived that officer of the command of his division, bestowing it on Girard; but he afterwards relented, and gave him the command of two divisions of the guard; saying, "Let there be no separation between us." He directed his advanced guard to follow Schwartzberg; whilst Augereau was ordered to resume the offensive at Lyons. That officer had been so powerfully reinforced, chiefly by arrivals from Spain, that the Austrian general Bubna, who had not more than 15,000 men, was obliged to retire on Genoa. The line of communication with prince Eugene's army in Italy, which had been cut off by the allies, was reopened; the emperor thought, not only of expelling the enemy from France, but again advancing himself to the Rhine; and more than once is reported to have said, "I am nearer to Munich than the allies are to Paris."

Bernadotte, however, was advancing on his rear; as were Bulow and Winzingerode, who, with the English under general Graham, had been besieging Antwerp. Finding that city was likely to resist their efforts for some time, they converted the siege into a blockade; the Prussians and Russians entered France, took possession of Avesnes and Rheims without resistance—the former on the 9th, and the latter on the 10th, of February—and were received by the inhabitants of the country between the Sarre and the Meuse, as friends rather than as enemies. The town of Soissons interposed between Rheims and Laon; which was occupied by a garrison of 4,000 men, under general Rusca, who had been one of the emperor's companions in his Italian campaign. General Chernicheff, with 4,500 men and eighteen pieces of cannon, attacked and carried this city by a coup-de-main, on the 11th of February; in the attack, general Rusca fell. The captors took fourteen guns, and 3,600 prisoners. The disasters that had befallen the army of Silesia, however, intelligence of which reached the allies at Soissons, made it necessary to abandon this capture, important as it was; and the town was shortly after reoccupied by the French, under Mortier; whilst the Russians and Prussians joined Blucher at Chalons, where, on the 18th, he had concentrated 59,000 men, of whom 14,000 were cavalry. The gallant Prussian was ready again to resume the offensive; but, in the councils of the allied grand army, after the affairs of Nangis and Montereau, great despondency prevailed. The arrival of Augereau was positively dreaded; and on the 23rd of February, it was resolved, by a council of war, held at Troyes, in spite of the opposition of the emperor Alexander, to evacuate that city, and to dispatch an envoy to Napoleon, to propose an armistice. Prince Lichtenstein was the officer fixed upon to proceed to Chartres, where the emperor was at that time. He was the bearer, not only of the proposal for an armistice, but of a private letter from the emperor of Austria, in reply to one Napoleon had sent him after the battle of Nangis. This letter was very conciliatory; and to a question from Napoleon—whether the allies had recognised the Bourbons?—the prince replied in the negative. Napoleon was not satisfied; but he agreed to an armistice; and plenipotentiaries met at Lusigny to arrange the terms.—The allies began to withdraw from Troyes in the evening of the 23rd, and were marching all night. The French entered the next day; and the first act of Napoleon was, to order search to be made for the marquis de Widranges and M. Goualt, of whose visit to Alexander he had heard. The former had left the city, but the latter was taken, tried by a military commission, condemned, and executed by torchlight—placards being affixed to his back and breast, with the words—"Traitor to his country."—Up to this point, Napoleon, with about 70,000 or 80,000 men, had baffled the plans of the allies, and won several victories over them, though their force was so greatly superior to his own. For these results he was indebted to the divisions in the councils of the allies, and to the daring, incautious way in which Blucher advanced. Napoleon kept his men so concentrated, that he could always direct a competent force on any one point: the allies, on the contrary, were greatly divided; and, notwithstanding the inferiority of his whole force to that of the allies, he had the superiority of numbers in almost every engagement. If Austria had from the first acted as decisively as the emperor Alexander was resolved to do, and with a Wellington in command, the allies would have been in Paris before the first month of the year had expired.

Whilst the events we have narrated were taking place between the armies in the field, diplomatists were assembled in congress at Chatillon, for the purpose of negotiating terms of peace. This congress was opened on the 4th of February; the plenipotentiaries on the part of England, being lord Aberdeen, lord

Castlereagh, and Sir Charles Stewart. Austria was represented by count Stadion; Prussia by baron Humboldt; Russia by count Razamoffski; and France by M. Caulaincourt. The bases which Napoleon wished to treat upon, were those proposed by the allies at Frankfort;* but as there was no armistice—as the negotiations for peace were carried on amidst the din of war—the emperor of Russia, from the first, insisted that, those terms not being accepted at the time, they should not then be binding on the allies, if the successes of their arms warranted them in demanding others involving additional sacrifices on the part of Napoleon. All the plenipotentiaries, except count Stadion, agreed with Alexander; and Caulaincourt was expressly informed, that the terms of Frankfort, which he was authorised to accept, but nothing less, would not be granted; and France must go back to her limits under Louis XVI. The prospects of the French were then considered to be at the lowest ebb; as, not only were the allies in full march to Paris—but Joseph, when his brother urged upon him the necessity of forming an army of reserve at that capital, wrote to say, that he “had not 6,000 muskets; and therefore, the formation of an army of reserve of 30,000 or 40,000 men was out of the question.” Berthier, Maret, and Bertrand (who had succeeded Duroc as grand marshal), therefore, earnestly entreated the emperor to give Caulaincourt carte blanche. There was a stormy scene between the marshals and the emperor; the latter being especially averse to surrender Belgium—which was one of the conditions the new terms of the allies would impose. At length he yielded. He sent his plenipotentiary full powers; but before the terms of peace were finally agreed to, they were to be sent to Paris, to be laid before his council, which was to report upon them. It was on the 7th of February that full powers were sent to Caulaincourt. On the 9th, the conference being suspended, he wrote to prince Metternich, who was at Chatillon—and with whom he appears to have kept up a confidential communication whilst the congress was sitting—to state, that he was authorised to accept the bases of the ancient limits. On the 15th he received an answer from the prince, to say, that his letter would be taken into consideration; and the conference being resumed on the 17th, preliminaries were presented to him, the object of which was, to restrict France to her former boundaries, and restore to their rightful sovereigns the territories Napoleon had usurped. He was also to give up the titles of protector of the Rhine, mediator of Switzerland, and king of Italy. As a compensation for what France was asked to surrender, Great Britain offered to give up nearly all the French colonies she had captured, retaining only the isles of Saintes and Tobago in the West, and those of Bourbon and Mauritius, in the East Indies. Sweden also agreed to evacuate Guadeloupe and Cayenne. These terms conceded, the allies were prepared to suspend hostilities, and to recognise Napoleon as emperor of France. Caulaincourt asked for time before he gave an answer to the proposals; and on the very day they were presented, Napoleon wrote to him, saying—“I gave you carte blanche in order to save Paris and avoid a battle, which was the last hope of the nation. The battle has been fought, and Providence has blessed our arms. Sign nothing now without my order, because I alone know my own position. If they had accepted your proposals on the 9th, there would have been no battle. I should not have trusted to fortune at a moment when the slightest failure would have been the ruin of France.” * * * “Now it is just that I should reap the advantages of my good fortune. I wish for peace; but I would not agree to any which imposed on me harder conditions than those of Frankfort.” As Caulaincourt had returned no answer to the plenipotentiaries, on the 28th of February they demanded a “categorical” one. He still delayed, having received no authority from Napoleon to accept the preliminaries. The emperor had, however, ordered Joseph to lay them before the council at Paris; and whilst members of that body thought some of the propositions of the conference unfair, they were of opinion, that the ancient limits should be accepted, rather than the occupation of the capital should be risked. On the 5th and 6th of March, Caulaincourt wrote to the emperor, requesting him to reconsider his letter of the 17th of February. “If we don’t take care,” he said, “the opportunity will slip away as it did at Prague.” * * * “If we do not give in a counter-project, with a modification of the Frankfort bases, all is at an end.” * * * “The negotiations once broken off, will never be renewed; and I implore your majesty to reflect on the effect this rupture will have on France, and to weigh well the consequences.” The emperor, however, was not disposed to depart from his letter revoking Caulaincourt’s full powers; and, on the 10th of March, that envoy sent in a “counter-project,” as he termed it; but which was, in truth, little more than a remonstrance against requiring France to return to her old boundaries, when circumstances were so changed around her. Russia, Austria, and Prussia had all been enlarged, and increased their wealth and their population. England had vastly added to her territories in the East; and “if the population of that Indian empire could not be considered as an addition to the inhabitants of Great Britain, it gave her an immense increase of riches, the other great element of power.” When all was thus changed around France, if the equilibrium of power was to be preserved, she must change also; and the proposal to return to her ancient limits could not be entertained. The allied plenipotentiaries, considering this memoir no answer to their propositions, were on the point of breaking up the conferences. Then, at first verbally, and, three days after, in writing, a formal counter-project was sent in. The terms proposed were, that France should retain Belgium, and still have her frontier extended to the Rhine; that Italy, to which the Ionian Islands should be annexed, should be secured to prince Eugene and his descendants, the Adige being the boundary between the prince's dominions and the Austrian possessions; that Lucca and Piombino should be secured to his sister Eliza; that Berthier should retain the principality of Neuchâtel; and that Great Britain should surrender all her conquests—the island of Saintes excepted. These terms were so essentially different from those proposed by the allies, that the plenipotentiaries at once rejected them; and as no further proposal was made, the conferences were declared at an end on the 19th, when the congress broke up. The plenipotentiaries returned to the head-quarters of their respective sovereigns; and Caulaincourt—who says, in his Souvenirs, that “to all his letters he only received evasive answers” from the emperor, “who never replied categorically to his demands”—returned to Paris.

While it was yet doubtful what course Napoleon would pursue with respect to the proffered terms of the allies, their plenipotentiaries were engaged in conferences and negotiations amongst themselves, which ended in the treaty of Chaumont, signed on the 1st of March; the contracting parties being England, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. This treaty was only to be in force if Napoleon refused the terms of the 17th of February. In that case, each of the four powers agreed to maintain 150,000 men in the field; and Great Britain, besides defraying all the expenses of her own contingent, was to pay £5,000,000 per annum towards the maintenance of those of the allies. Many details followed, but these were the bases; and there were secret articles, stipulating, if the war had to be continued, the territorial arrangements which should be made when peace was concluded, and which were afterwards carried out in the treaty of Vienna. This treaty was ratified, and the congress broke up; after which the allies published an admirable answer to Napoleon's propositions, showing that they sought nothing for themselves, and only wished to restrain France within limits which would render her less dangerous to the peace of Europe. “The allied powers do not,” they said, in conclusion, “make war upon France. They regard the proper dimensions of that empire as one of the first conditions of a proper balance of power; but they will not lay down their arms till their principles have

It was a curious anomaly—that the congress, whose efforts were directed to conclude a peace, should be sitting at Chatillon; negotiations be going on at Lusigny for an armistice; and hostile operations be continued—all at the same time: yet so it was. On the 25th of February, Blucher crossed the Aube at Aughère, and advanced, on the 26th and 27th, to Ferte-sous-Jouarre, Marmont retiring before him till he effected a junction with Mortier, who had retired from Soissons on the advance of Winzingerode and Bulow, by whom that city was again threatened. On hearing of these movements, Napoleon left Troyes on the 27th (on which day the negotiations at Lusigny were broken off), with the view of directing his entire force on Blucher. To effect a diversion in favour of the latter, Schwartzberg, at the request of the king of Prussia, resumed the offensive. Wrede and Wittgenstein advanced on the road from Troyes to Chaumont, and defeated Oudinot at Bar-sur-Aube, with the loss of 2,500 killed and wounded, and 500 prisoners. The allies, who lost 2,400 men—general Wittgenstein being amongst the wounded—also captured the town. Oudinot, in his retreat, succeeded in forming a junction with Macdonald, who had advanced from La Vert-sur-Aube; and the united corps was defeated, on the 3rd of March, at La Guillotière. They retreated to Troyes, which they scarcely held twenty-four hours, when they were again on the march; having lost nine guns, 500 killed and wounded, and 1,500 prisoners: the loss of the allies amounted to 800. Apparently satisfied with these successes, Schwartzberg, establishing his head-quarters at Troyes on the 5th of March, posted his troops at Sens, Pont-sur-Yonne, and Montierender, where they were kept wholly inactive till the 13th. The French marshals retired behind the Seine, taking up the positions at Bray, Nogent, and Montereau, which the allies had previously occupied.

By the inactivity of the allied grand army, that of Silesia was left to contend alone, on the banks of the Aisne, with the concentrated forces of France, under Napoleon. Blucher, who had with him 55,000 men, when he received intelligence of the emperor's approach, crossed the Marne at La Ferte-sous-Jouarre, and, breaking down the bridges, took the direction of Soissons. Winzingerode and Bulow had united their forces, on the 2nd of March, on the right bank of the Aisne, opposite that town; and Blucher arrived in its vicinity, on the left bank of the river, in the afternoon of the same day, his rear-guard having had an engagement with the corps of Marmont and Mortier, and lost 500 men. The allies prepared for an assault on Soissons the next morning; but colonel Moreau, who commanded the garrison of 1,500

Poles, agreed to surrender, on condition that the troops should be allowed to march out with the honours of war, and carry off the guns, six in number. The allies had scarcely established themselves in Soissons on the 3rd, when they found the French were fast gaining upon them. Napoleon had been detained four-and-twenty hours at La Ferte-sous-Jouarre, till the bridges broken down by the allies were repaired, and then he lost no time in pursuing the retreating foe. The day gained allowed the army of Silesia and the two corps from the army of the north to unite; and now, being 100,000 strong, and 24,000 of the number being well-trained cavalry, Blucher determined to await the arrival of the French, and accept battle. He took up his position, with a part of his army, on the elevated plateau of Craone, between the Aisne and the Sarre, near the road from Soissons to Laon. Bulow, with his corps, was sent to defend that town; Radzewitz, with 6,000 men, occupied Soissons; York was posted on the high-road between Soissons and Laon; and Winzingerode, with 12,000 cavalry, sixty pieces of horse artillery, and the corps of Kleist and Langeron, was left at liberty, to operate on the flanks and rear of the enemy.

On his march to Soissons, Napoleon issued two decrees, both bearing date the 5th of March. The first commanded "all the French citizens to take up arms; to sound the tocsin as soon as they heard the cannon of the troops approaching them; to assemble together, scour the woods, break down the bridges, block up the roads, and fall on the flanks and rear of the enemy." If "any French citizen taken by the enemy should be put to death, he should be forthwith avenged by the shooting of a prisoner taken from the enemy." The second decree adjudged, that "all mayors, public functionaries, and inhabitants, who, instead of stimulating the patriotic ardour of the people, should strive to allay it, and should dissuade them from adopting measures of legitimate defence, should be considered as traitors, and treated as such." Thus, the emperor sought to establish a guerilla war in France, though he had himself punished the inhabitants of Pavia, and given up the town to pillage, for engaging in one; and his generals, Soult, Augereau, and Bessières, had issued decrees in Spain, denouncing death to all guerillas; the latter extending the penalty to their relatives.

The capitulation of Soissons irritated Napoleon excessively, and he ordered colonel Moreau to be tried by a military commission. It preserved the allies from being attacked at a great disadvantage, and enabled them to take up a most effective position for defence; notwithstanding which, the emperor determined to give them battle. The first point of attack was Soissons. This important place he ordered Marmont and Mortier to recover at all hazards; and they made the assault on the morning of the 5th of March. Both attack and defence were of the most daring and desperate description: but after fighting all day, and 1,500 men being killed and wounded on both sides, the French were obliged to retire. Disappointed in his desire to regain this important post, the emperor resolved to attack the allies on the plateau of Craone—a formidable position, being bounded on three sides by ravines, which offered great impediments to the operations of an army. The Russian infantry of Winzingerode's division, under Woronzoff and Sacken, 27,000 in number, were posted upon this plateau; and they were attacked in the forenoon of the 7th of March. The corps of Ney and Victor, and the dragoons of the guard, led by Ney, made the principal assault on the left flank of the Russians; and Nansouty, with the Polish dragoons and Excelman's division, took the right; the former having to climb a slope, descending to the valley of the Lette, and the latter to ascend one much steeper, which ran from Ouche and the Aisne. The attack on the neck of the plateau was made by the imperial guard, at whose head the emperor placed himself. The attacks on the three points commenced, under the fire of a hundred pieces of cannon from the side of the French, which was replied to by incessant discharges from sixty Russian guns. The assailants were 40,000 in number; but the nature of their position enabled the allies to repulse Victor's attack, and to withstand those made in the other directions for about five hours. Blucher was in the battle part of the time; but finding that the cavalry and horse artillery under Winzingerode, prevented by the badness of the roads, did not come up to assail the enemy's flank, he left Sacken in command, and rode off to endeavour to bring up those corps in another direction. The battle continued to rage for some time after he left; but the Russians beginning to be short of ammunition, and the French gradually gaining the summit of the plateau, whilst their numbers increased in the valleys, Sacken ordered a retreat. It was made reluctantly, and several attacks of the French on the retiring forces were repulsed; Woronzoff making a determined stand, to allow his wounded, his carriages, and his cavalry to get upon the road to Laon. All the defenders of the plateau finally fell back upon that town, which is twelve miles to the north-west of Craone. In this action—in which deeds of the greatest heroism were performed on each side—the French had 29,423 men under fire, and the Russians, 21,204. The latter lost 5,000, the former 8,000, killed and wounded: not a single prisoner, gun, or standard was taken as a trophy of the engagement. Amongst the French wounded, were Victor, Grouchy, Nansouty, Boyer, and two other generals.

On the 8th of March, Blucher concentrated his army round Laon—upon which position the French moved in two columns. Napoleon had collected his entire army for another attempt, and had 52,000 men round his standards: but the allies at Laon greatly outnumbered him—the total of Blucher's force being estimated at 80,000 foot, 24,000 horse, and sixty guns. No troops could occupy a finer position. Laon stands on a conical hill, at a height of nearly 250 feet from the surrounding plain. The town occupies the summit; gardens and orchards the slopes; and on the 9th of March, the irregular walls which surround the town were crowned with cannon; batteries were erected on the slopes; and detached houses which stood at the foot of the hill, were loopholed, and converted into miniature forts. Blucher's men were placed upon, and round, the hill of Laon and the adjoining heights, so as to support each other. The French arrived on the morning of the 9th; but Napoleon did not immediately make his attack: he waited for Marmont, who was coming up on the side of Rheims. Towards the middle of the day, favoured by a thick fog, Ney occupied Ardon and Semilly, villages at the foot of the hill; but he was driven out by the Prussians as soon as discovered. The French, however, retook Ardon, and captured the village of Clacy, and the abbey of St. Vincent, also at the hill foot.—The division of Marmont—which had marched in the morning from Bery-au-Bac, by the defile of Festieux—reached Athies, on the Rheims road; expelled the Prussians under York from that town; and having taken up their bivouac, sunk to sleep, overcome with fatigue. They were surrounded, in the night, by a Prussian division, under prince William; and being taken completely by surprise, were driven back on the road by which they came, and lost 2,500 prisoners, forty pieces of cannon, and 101 caissons. There were very few killed and wounded; but the division was entirely dispersed.—This untoward event rendered Napoleon's contemplated attack on Laon absolutely desperate; but it was equally dangerous to retreat. He therefore drew up his men in a firm, compact line, and awaited the movements of the enemy. Blucher recalled the infantry from the pursuit of Marmont; and in the course of the forenoon the French moved nearer the hill, and commenced a cannonade. The discharges of artillery from Laon soon obliged them to retire; and it is difficult to account for Blucher's not becoming the assailant. But only a desultory firing was kept up till about 4 P. M., when the French withdrew on the road to Soissons; having, in the two days' fighting at Laon, lost 6,000 men: the loss of the allies was about 4,000.

Soissons had been abandoned by Radzewitz, who had joined Blucher at Laon; and the former town now afforded a refuge for the fugitive French, whose movements were for some days uninterrupted by Blucher. The army of Silesia was exhausted by fatigue, and in want of provisions; and the general himself was suffering from ague and inflammation in the eyes, which rendered him unable to sit on horseback during the rest of the campaign. These causes delayed, for a short time, the catastrophe that was inevitable; and which, if it could have been averted by the efforts of a master-mind, most certainly Napoleon would have succeeded. He never evinced greater proofs of military genius than in the three months' campaign in France; and, after the retreat from Laon, he proved that he had lost none of his customary vigour.—General St. Priest, who had commanded the Prussian reserves at Chalons, finding that Rheims was left with a garrison of only 2,000 men and twelve pieces of cannon, resolved to make the attempt to take it; and he succeeded. Its capture was of importance to Blucher, as it established his communications with the allied grand army; whilst it enabled him to threaten Napoleon's flank. For these reasons, its occupation by the allies was detrimental to Napoleon; and he determined, at all hazards, to retake it. Leaving Mortier's corps to defend Soissons, he started, early on the 13th of March, with the rest of his army, for Rheims; and on the evening of the same day he appeared before its walls. The Prussian videttes were driven in; but St. Priest, for some time, refused to believe that there was anything to alarm him: he thought it was merely a few light troops that had extended their excursion beyond their bounds. He soon found his mistake. Napoleon himself followed his troops; and remarking, that "the ladies of Rheims would soon have a bad quarter of an hour," he ordered the attack. His dispositions were made with his usual skill, and they were all successful. The Prussians and Russians fought bravely, but they were overpowered; and St. Priest being early disabled by a wound in the shoulder, the command fell on general Emmanuel. The attack and defence continued during the day, and into the night for several hours; the French, though superior in numbers, being repulsed when attempting to enter the town. About midnight, it was found, that the assailants, by fording the Vede—a river which runs past Rheims to the Aisne, near Soissons—were surrounding the place. The occupants then resolved to retire; and leaving a gallant band of 200 men to defend the gate for which the enemy was making, the remainder of the troops defiled out by the others; some on the road to Chalons, and others on that to Laon. When the garrison was beyond the walls, an officer was sent to withdraw the troops from the gate, and he found them coolly dividing their remaining cartridges, resolved to hold out, even to death. It is gratifying to know that they retired in order, and left the town in the darkness—effecting their retreat in perfect safety. Soon after Napoleon entered by torchlight, his troops cheering; and the inhabitants, as soon as they knew who was their deliverer, are said to have rent the air by “enthusiastic cheers;” and “to have given vent to the general transport by a spontaneous illumination.”

Napoleon cantoned his forces in Rheims and its vicinity. He was joined there by general Jansen, and 6,000 men whom he had collected from the garrison of Ardennes; and now sensible of the impolicy of which he had been guilty, and of the injury he had inflicted on himself by keeping so many thousand men in garrisons on the Elbe, the Oder, and the Rhine, he permitted Ney to send messengers to all the forts and fortresses; who took secret orders to the commandants, to hold themselves in readiness to join the emperor as soon as they were commanded to do so: and the necessity for their presence was evident when Napoleon reviewed his troops at Rheims. Their melancholy appearance showed how weak they were both in physique and matériel: in numbers they were greatly diminished since they crossed the Marne; and their bodily strength was visibly “wasting away.” About the same time that Napoleon reviewed his troops, Blucher did the same with his army, greatly reinforced, at Laon. His men had recovered from their fatigues; and he had under his command, 80,000 infantry, 29,000 cavalry, and 265 guns.

The French emperor remained at Rheims till the 17th of March. The allies were then again pressing on Paris; and, on the 16th, Napoleon wrote to Joseph, giving him secret orders to send off the empress and the king of Rome, if the capital was seriously threatened. He had received reinforcements, besides those brought him by general Jansen; and was enabled to leave Marmont and Mortier, with 20,000 men, to operate against Blucher, on the Aisne; whilst he himself, with 26,000, marched to join Oudinot and Macdonald, who were at the head of 35,000 troops of all arms; and the united army was to operate especially against the communications of Schwartzberg, who was at the head of 100,000 men. Napoleon marched by Epernay, Fère-Champenoise, and Sens, to Plaucy, where the junction with the two marshals was effected on the 19th. Schwartzberg had, at the instance of Alexander, put his troops in motion; and they were, at the same time, concentrating between Arcis and Plaucy. Napoleon was not prepared for this: he had expected to cut off the enemy's communications, and he found them united; but still hoping to turn their right, he ordered his troops to take the route by the right bank of the Aube; and, on the 20th, he occupied the town of Arcis, on that river. There he found that he had the allied grand army in his front; and Schwartzberg, at last, took the offensive. The action commenced by an affair of outposts, which gradually extended to cavalry and artillery; and the French were ultimately driven back to the gates of Arcis. In another quarter, on the left, Wrede's Bavarians, and an Austrian battalion, maintained, from noon till nightfall, a combat with Ney's corps, with alternate success; but the French succeeded in regaining their original position, from which they had been driven, and maintained themselves there till darkness put an end to active hostilities for a few hours. In front, a tremendous cannonade was kept up for the same time; at ten o'clock at night it died away, and all was still.

The next morning, the contending parties, who had slept on the field of battle, again stood in hostile array; but hours passed without a shot being fired. At length, about 1 P.M., there were decided indications shown of the intention of the French to retreat: for two hours, however, Schwartzberg observed the movement without offering any interruption. At length he gave the signal. It was then three in the afternoon; and, though a fire was opened from a hundred guns, and the allies pressed on the right and centre of the French, the attack had been too long delayed to produce much effect. The greater part of Napoleon's army had passed the Aube; and the rear-guard, commanded by Macdonald, bravely covered their retreat. Before the day closed, prince Eugene of Würtemberg, at the head of his corps, reached Arcis, and drove out all the French who remained, and who rushed to the river, where they found the bridge blown up. The cavalry crossed over; but the infantry were mostly cut up by the pursuers, or drowned in the stream. The French defended the other side of the river by a heavy cannonade, which enabled Napoleon to reach Vitry—having lost, in the two days, 4,000 men, and six pieces of cannon. The loss of the allies was nearly, if not quite, as great.

The emperor's plan of falling upon the rear, and interrupting the communications of the allied grand army, having thus been frustrated, he resolved to draw near to the Rhine, for the purpose of availing himself of the garrisons as early as possible, and, on his way, to move on St. Dizier, on the right bank of the Marne, and still endeavour to cut off the communications of the enemy. He detailed his plan in a letter to Maria-Louisa: the courier who was conveying this letter was taken by the Cossacks, and his plan of operations was thus revealed to the allies. A secret despatch from Savary was also intercepted, which described the state of Paris in the most gloomy colours. The aspect of that city, and of France, seems to have changed very much since the report of M. Montalivet had been drawn up.* M. Guizot, in his work,† now (1860) in course of publication, to illustrate the history of his own time—writing of the state of things in the middle of March, 1814, says—"I have still before my eyes the aspect of Paris, particularly of the Rue de Rivoli (then in progress of construction), as I passed along on the morning of my departure. There were no workmen and no activity; materials heaped together without being used; deserted scaffoldings; buildings abandoned for want of money, hands, or confidence, and in ruins before completion. Everywhere, amongst the people, a discontented air of uneasy idleness, as if they were equally in want of labour and repose. Throughout my journey, in the high-ways, in the towns, and in the fields, I noticed the same appearance of inactivity and agitation, the same visible impoverishment of the country. There were more women and children than men; many young conscripts marching mournfully to their battalions; sick and wounded soldiers returning to the interior: in fact, a mutilated and exhausted nation. Side by side with this physical suffering, I also remarked a great moral perplexity, the uneasiness of opposing sentiments, an ardent longing for peace, a deadly hatred of foreign invaders, with alternate feelings, as regarded Napoleon, of anger and sympathy. By some he was denounced as the author of all their calamities; by others he was hailed as the bulwark of the country, and the avenger of her injuries. What struck me as a serious evil, although I was then far from being able to estimate its full extent, was the marked inequality of these different expressions amongst the divided classes of the population. With the affluent and educated, the prominent feeling was evidently a strong desire for peace, a dislike of the exigencies and hazards of the imperial despotism, a calculated foreshadowing of its fall, and the dawning perspective of another system of government. The lower orders, on the contrary, only roused themselves up from lassitude, to give way to a momentary burst of patriotic rage, or to their reminiscences of the revolution. The imperial rule had given them discipline without reform. Appearances were tranquil; but, in truth, it might be said of the popular masses, as of the emigrants, that they had forgotten nothing, and learnt nothing. There was no moral unity throughout the land; no common thought or passion, notwithstanding the common misfortunes and experience. The nation was almost as completely divided in its apathy, as it had lately been in its excitement." These divided feelings, however, were rapidly merging into one of discontent, which speedily made the movement in favour of the Bourbons generally popular.

Napoleon arrived at St. Dizier on the 23rd of March. There he learned the final breaking-up of the congress at Chatillon; and that all prospect of an accommodation was at an end.

The allies were then, in pursuance of the advice of prince Volkousky, marching direct on Paris, having dispatched 8,000 horse and forty-six pieces of artillery in the direction of St. Dizier, to operate against the French. This detachment was commanded by Winzingerode; and, as Napoleon was soon aware that it was following him, he imbibed the impression that the main body of the allies was in full pursuit. He therefore dispatched a messenger to Marmont and Mortier, who were retiring towards the capital, with orders to change their route, pass through Vitry, and join him in the vicinity of that town—little imagining that the prescribed route would lead them into the very arms of the enemy. The emperor of Russia, the king of Prussia, and prince Schwartzemberg, had their head-quarters at Vitry on the 24th of March. On the 25th, the allied grand army was marching through Fère-Champenoise, and the Silesian army from Chalons (which had been reoccupied by Blucher), with the intention of concentrating upon Meaux, twenty-five miles to the E.N.E. of Paris. The French, under the two marshals, were at the same time marching from the capital. They had with them 17,000 foot, 5,000 horse, and eighty-four guns. They were met by the advanced guard of the allies at Fère-Champenoise, and defeated with great loss. At the same time, a French division of 6,000 infantry, escorting artillery and bread, to join the emperor, and which had taken the route to Fère-Champenoise, to avoid the advanced guard of Blucher, and thus fell in with the allied army, was also entirely broken up; and whilst the convoy was captured, the troops were either killed or taken prisoners. The loss to the French was 7,000 prisoners, including two generals of division, and four of brigade; 4,000 killed and wounded, eighty guns, 200 ammunition waggons, a large quantity of bread, and the baggage.

By these successes, the road to Paris was opened to the allies; and they marched towards that city in high spirits. The detachment under Winzingerode was not so fortunate. Napoleon had moved on Doulevant, from St. Dizier; whilst the Russians had advanced in another direction, and occupied the latter town. But the emperor soon had reason to believe that he had mistaken the object of the allies; and, retracing his steps, he reappeared before St. Dizier with a force greatly superior to that under Winzingerode, who was defeated on the 26th of March, and driven back to Bar-le-Duc, losing in the action 1,500 killed and wounded, 500 prisoners, and nine guns. The French only lost 700 men. After this victory, Napoleon marched on Vitry, where he received full details of the defeat of the marshals, and that the allies were rapidly advancing upon the capital. Filled with dismay, he again returned to St. Dizier. There he shut himself up, and is said to have spent the night of the 27th in studying the maps. His determination was taken to turn from the Rhine, and try to reach Paris; and the troops were, on the 28th, ordered to advance in that direction, by Doulevant, Troyes, Sens, and Fontainebleau; which place he reached on the 30th of March.

The same day the allies arrived before Paris. News of their advance had preceded them; and on the 28th, the empress, the king of Rome, and the council of regency (with the exception of Joseph, Talleyrand, and Savary), quitted the capital, taking with them a large quantity of baggage, and all the money in the treasury. They retired, according to the orders of the emperor—who, in a note to Joseph, said, “he would rather see his son in the Seine than in the hands of the enemy”—beyond the Loire, taking the road to Rambouillet. On their departure, Joseph issued a brief proclamation to the inhabitants; in which he said—“The council of the regency has provided for the safety of the empress and the king of Rome. I remain with you. Let us arm to defend this city, its monuments, its wealth, our women, our children—all that are dear to us. The emperor marches to our succour; second him by a brief and vigorous resistance, and we shall preserve the honour of France.”

Although the people were called upon to arm, and there were 30,000 new muskets and a large quantity of ammunition then in the arsenals, no arms were given to them; and if they had been placed in their hands, resistance would have been vain, as the heights which commanded the city were occupied by 180,000 men. Marmont and Mortier (who, after the defeat at Fère-Champenoise, had fallen back on Paris) were compelled, having made a brave but unavailing resistance, to capitulate; being permitted to quit Paris with their arms, but leaving untouched the arsenals and military stores. Joseph made his escape; and by nine o'clock in the morning of the 31st, a great part of Paris was occupied by the allies. While they were entering the city, a party of royalists, with the white banners of the old régime waving in the air, paraded the boulevards, shouting, “Vivent les Bourbons.” This success had not been attained without great loss. In an attack on the heights of Montmartre (which were most gallantly carried), and in the battle of Paris, the allies lost more than 9,000 men,* and the French 4,500. The former took eighty-two guns on the field; and upwards of seventy more were surrendered by the capitulation.

Paris in the hands of the allies, prince Schwartzberg immediately issued a proclamation which had been prepared several days previously; it bearing date the 29th of March. The citizens were told, that the “allies were under their walls; their object being to obtain a sound and durable peace with France.” The allied sovereigns “desired to find in France a beneficent government, which should strengthen her alliance with all nations; and, in the present circumstances, it was the duty of the Parisians to hasten the general pacification.” They were assured, that “the preservation of their city and of their tranquillity should be the object of the allies;” that “troops should not be quartered upon them;” and they were called upon to “justify the confidence which Europe placed in their patriotism and prudence.” The Parisians, who had been alarmed by the fear of the plunder and devastation which usually follow the entrance of hostile troops into a conquered city, were reassured by this proclamation; and by learning that the corporation had waited upon the emperor Alexander as soon as they knew that the capitulation was signed, and had been assured of protection; and that “the allied sovereigns had come neither to conquer nor to rule France, but to learn and support what France deemed most suitable for its own welfare.” They were, therefore, prepared to give a cordial reception to the sovereigns. It was mid-day when Alexander and the king of Prussia, accompanied by prince Schwartzberg, lord Cathcart, lord Burghersh, lieutenant-colonel the honourable George Cathcart, and a brilliant suite, entered the city by the Porte St. Martin. A large crowd was assembled; and the cries of “Vive l'Empereur Alexander!” “Vive le Roi de Prusse!” “Vivent les Allies!” “Vivent nos Libérateurs!” were heard on all sides. As they passed along, the crowds increased, and the windows became filled with elegantly-dressed females, many of whom waved their white handkerchiefs, and “Vivent les Bourbons!” was heard from their sweet voices. Many of the fair sex in the streets begged to be taken up on the horses of the officers, that they might have a nearer view of the “great men”—a proceeding which excited the indignation of Savary, who says—“There were to be seen ladies, and even ladies of rank, who so far forgot the respect due to themselves, as to give way to the most shameful delirium. They eagerly broke through the circle of horses which surrounded the emperor of Russia, and testified an empressement more fitted to excite contempt than to conciliate kindly feeling.”

Amidst these demonstrations, the emperor of Russia proceeded to the hôtel of prince Talleyrand, where he was joined by the king of Prussia; and soon after, a number of the leading men of the city arrived. The subject of discussion was, what course should be pursued under the circumstances—whether the Bourbons should be restored? Talleyrand—who had been alternately royalist, republican, and imperialist—now became royalist again; and strongly advocated the cause of Louis XVIII. After several hours spent in consultation, it was resolved, that the abdication of Napoleon in favour of his son should be insisted upon; and a proclamation was issued, signed by Alexander, in which it was declared, that the allied sovereigns would not treat with Bonaparte, or with any member of his family: but their majesties were ready to acknowledge and guarantee the constitution which the French people might form: till that question was decided, the senate were called upon to form a provisional government, to administer affairs, and preserve order. Before nine o'clock at night on the 31st of March, this proclamation was printed and placarded all over Paris; and the next morning it was sent by post through the departments.

On that day (April 1st) the senate assembled. There had long been a party amongst its members hostile to Napoleon: that party found its number greatly increased by recent events; and, at this meeting, it agreed to appoint a provisional government, composed of Talleyrand, Bournonville, Jaucourt, the duc de Dalberg, and M. de Montesquiou. The members who had assembled—sixty-four out of 140—then solicited an audience of the emperor Alexander, by whom they were most graciously received; and their request for the liberation of the French prisoners in Russia was instantly granted. On the 2nd, the senate again assembled; when two decrees, addressed to the French soldiers and to the French people, drawn up by Talleyrand, were agreed to, and instantly promulgated. In the first, the army was told, that its members “were no longer the soldiers of Napoleon; that the senate and people of entire France absolved them from their oaths.” In the latter, addressing the people, the senate said—“That Napoleon had forfeited the crown; that the right of succession in his family was abrogated; and that the French people and the French army were absolved from their oaths of allegiance to him.” The second decree was prefaced by a declaration of the reasons by which the senate justified their conduct; and certainly they were amply sufficient, if they were founded in truth, to show that the late emperor had forfeited all claim to public confidence. He was charged with violating his fundamental compact with the French people, especially by levying taxes without the sanction of the law; that he had, without cause, prorogued the legislative body, and suppressed, as criminal, one of its reports; that he had undertaken a series of wars on his own authority, in violation of the law; that he had illegally issued several decrees, imposing the penalty of death; that he had annihilated the responsibility of monarchs, confounded all powers, and destroyed the independence of the judicial bodies; that he had trampled under foot the liberty of the press, by means of a corrupt and enslaved censorship; that he had put the finishing-stroke to the miseries of the country, by refusing to treat with the allies on terms which the national interest required him to accept, and which were not derogatory to the national honour; that, by the abuses he had made of the men and money entrusted to him, he had effected the ruin of towns, and the depopulation of the country, and had everywhere induced famine and contagious pestilence. These were among the reasons for which the senate declared, that the imperial government had ceased to exist. They obtained the sanction of the legislative body, seventy-seven of whose members assembled in Paris; and the provisional government, from that time, took the place of Napoleon's ministers, and immediately replaced all the members of his administration, and all the authorities appointed by him.

Napoleon, whose empire had thus suddenly terminated, was at Fontainebleau whilst the senate were taking these proceedings against him. Arriving there, as we have stated, on the 30th of March, he reposed during the night; and, the next day, gave orders to march upon Paris, which he expected would be able to defend itself till his approach at the head of the troops which still remained with him; and, though they had endured both disaster and fatigue, adhered with unabated loyalty to his fortunes. In the evening, the advanced guard encountered some stragglers from Paris, who informed them of the capitulation of that city. When the news was brought to Napoleon, he could scarcely be induced to credit it. At first he urged his men forward, and declared that he would himself, at all hazards, proceed to the capital. For some time he was deaf to reason; and it required earnest entreaties, almost amounting to force, to induce him to return to Fontainebleau. From thence he instantly dispatched Caulaincourt to Paris, with instructions to open negotiations with the allies. He arrived late in the day, and had an interview with Alexander in the night of the 1st of April. On the 2nd, he was dismissed with the following reply, received from the hands of that sovereign:—“Return to the emperor Napoleon; tell him faithfully all that has passed here, and, as soon as possible, come back with an abdication in favour of his son. The emperor Napoleon shall be suitably treated, I give you my word of honour.”—It was late at night when the envoy reached Fontainebleau. On stating to Napoleon the result of his mission, he refused to abdicate in the most peremptory terms, and ridiculed the idea of restoring the Bourbons. The allies might, he exclaimed, “take advantage of the stupor occasioned by the occupation of the capital, to proscribe him and his family; but to make the Bourbons reign in France!

Never!"—On the morning of the 3rd, he mounted on horseback, and presenting himself to the soldiers, addressed them in a few spirited words. "Some factious men," he said, "had mounted the white cockade, and surrounded the emperor Alexander." But "in a few days he would attack the enemy, and force him to quit the capital. He relied on his troops. Was he right? Their cockade was the tricolour, and, before they abandoned it, they would all perish on the soil of France." The soldiers answered this appeal with approving shouts; and some of the young officers supported them. But the marshals and old generals saw nothing but failure in any hostile operations, and were eager for an accommodation with the allies. Even Ney and Caulaincourt were of this opinion; the latter maintaining, that to establish a regency would be the best plan to propose. During the night, intelligence that the senate had declared Napoleon's reign at an end, was received. The next day, he held a council with Berthier, Bertrand, Lefebvre, Macdonald, Maret, Oudinot, Ney, and Caulaincourt; the result of which was, that he agreed, by the following declaration, to abandon his throne in favour of his son, and the regency of the empress.—"The allied powers having declared, that the emperor Napoleon is the sole obstacle to the re-establishment of the peace of Europe—faithful to his oath, he declares, that he is ready to descend from his throne, to quit France, and even life itself, for the good of the country, which is inseparable from the rights of his son, of the regency of the empress, and of the maintenance of the laws of the empire." As soon as this declaration was signed, Caulaincourt, Macdonald, and Ney were dispatched to Paris, to place it in the hands of Alexander.

Before these messengers reached Paris, another important event had taken place. On the 3rd of April, prince Schwartzberg opened a communication with Marmont, which led to that officer's giving in his adhesion to the provisional government. The terms of the convention, to which the parties affixed their signatures, guaranteed the life and personal freedom of Napoleon, who was to take up his residence in some place fixed by the allies. The convention accepted by the sovereigns, the 12,000 troops who were with Marmont, passed over to the allies; and shortly after, with their arms, cannon, and baggage, retired to Normandy, where they went into quarters; Marmont, in an order of the day, telling them, they required repose; and that "good cantonments, and his paternal care, would soon, he trusted, make them forget the fatigues they had experienced."—The same day (April 4th), Barclay de Tolly issued a proclamation to the Russian troops; to the effect, that "their perseverance and valour had delivered the French nation from the yoke of a tyrant, who acted for himself alone, and forgot what he owed to an estimable and generous people. That people had declared for the allies; the cause of both was now the same; from that moment, the French became their friends; and, if they had, by their arms, to destroy the considerable band of unfortunate men who still adhered to the ambitious Napoleon, the cultivators of the soil, and the peaceable inhabitants of towns, must be treated with consideration and friendship, like allies united in one common cause and with the same interests." The line of conduct proscribed in this proclamation was strictly adhered to by the allied troops; whose abstinence from pillage and acts of violence had a favourable effect upon the susceptible people of France.

The news of this capitulation reached Fontainebleau about the same time that Napoleon's envoys arrived at Paris. He scouted the idea of the senate and Marmont making terms for him; whilst the feeling in favour of the Bourbons was becoming so manifest in Paris, that the allied sovereigns found it would not be prudent to accept the conditional abdication, which would still leave Napoleon at liberty to act. The emperor Alexander admitted, that the regency of the empress for her son "sounded well;" but the restless spirit of Napoleon would not suffer him to remain quiet. "He would, ere long, put himself at the head of the regency, or in its place; and the very apprehension of such an occurrence would oblige the allies to keep their armies on foot, and thus frustrate all the intentions with which they made peace." In vain Caulaincourt and Macdonald pressed the emperor's proposition on the allied councils. "It is too late," was the reply; and they returned to Napoleon with the demand for an unconditional abdication, and a pledge to retire from France. Ney, for the time, abandoned his late master. He gave in his adhesion to the allies; and on the 5th of April, his declaration in their favour appeared in the Moniteur. "No course remained," he said, "to prevent a civil war, but to embrace the cause of the ancient kings." On that day the senate sent forth another decree, ordering all the armorial bearings, emblems, and other insignia connected with the imperial government, to be effaced from public buildings and other places; and if the emperor Alexander had not taken the public monuments under his protection—especially the monument of the Place Vendôme, surmounted by a statue of the emperor, which he engaged should be replaced by a figure of peace—such was the feeling of the populace, that they would all have been destroyed. This feeling was greatly stimulated by a pamphlet, entitled De Bonaparte et des Bourbons, from the pen of Chateaubriand; which was extensively circulated—a pamphlet which contributed, in an eminent degree, to give that practical direction to public opinion, which led to the re-establishment of Louis XVIII. on the throne of his ancestors.

When Napoleon was informed of the refusal of his conditional abdication, he burst into one of his uncontrollable fits of passion, in which he threatened, at the head of his guards, and with men summoned from Lyons, Italy, and the army from Spain, to retire to the Loire, and there defend his rights and those of the king of Rome. "I will rest on my sword," said he, "which has visited every capital in Europe. I will inscribe on my eagles, 'Independence and our country!' and they will again become terrible." His generals, however, refused to stand by him; after the first emotion had subsided, he grew more calm; and finally, declaring, that "he treated with a conquering enemy, and not with the provisional government, in whom he saw nothing but a band of factious traitors," he signed, on the 6th of April, the following declaration:—"The allied powers having declared that the emperor Napoleon is the sole obstacle to the re-establishment of a general peace in Europe, faithful to his oath, he declares that he renounces, for himself and his heirs, the throne of France and Italy; and that there is no personal sacrifice, not even that of life itself, which he is not willing to make for the interests of France." A formal treaty, based on this abdication, was drawn up. It was agreed that he should retain the title of emperor; that he should reside at Elba, as prince of that island, which he should possess in "full sovereignty and property;" with an income of 2,500,000 francs (£100,000) per annum, reserved from the revenues of the countries he ceded; the duchies of Parma and Placentia were secured to the empress Maria-Louisa, and her son, in full sovereignty; his mother, brothers, and sisters were to retain the titles of princes and princesses, and a collective revenue was secured to them, equal to that of Napoleon; 1,000,000 francs (£40,000) was allotted to the ex-empress Josephine; and all their personal effects and moveables were to continue the property of the Bonaparte family; but the furniture of the palaces, and the crown jewels, were reserved for the new sovereign.

This treaty was negotiated by prince Metternich, count Nesselrode, and baron Hardenberg, on the part of the allies; and by Caulaincourt, Macdonald, and Ney, on that of Napoleon. When signed, on the 10th of April, lord Castlereagh gave in the adhesion of his Britannic majesty; "but only to be binding upon him with respect to his own acts, and not with respect to the acts of third parties." His lordship objected to the treaty, generally, on the following grounds:—1st. That it recognised the title of Napoleon as emperor of France, which England had never yet done, directly or indirectly.

2ndly. That it assigned him a residence in independent sovereignty, close to the Italian coast, and within a few days' sail of France; while the fires of the revolutionary volcano were not extinguished in either country.—The protest had no effect at the time; events proved, however, how sound were the views which his lordship entertained.

The signing the treaty—the final vanishing of all his dreams of greatness and universal sovereignty—seems, for a time, to have prostrated the once gigantic mind of Napoleon. On the retreat from Moscow, he had a poison prepared for him, by Ivan, his favourite Mameluke, which he wore suspended from his neck, in a case covered with silk, intending to take it should he fall into the hands of the Cossacks. That poison he still possessed; and, on the night of the 11th of April, after laying thinking of his altered fortunes, he determined to drink it. He leaped out of bed, mixed the poison, and drank it, he told Montholon at St. Helena, "with a sort of happiness." But time had weakened its efficiency; and, though he suffered great pain, and alarmed all his attendants, he recovered: from that time, he resigned himself to his fate.

It was stipulated that he should leave Fontainebleau on the 20th of April. Amidst the general defection, Caulaincourt and Macdonald; generals Bertrand, Drouet, Cambronne, Belliard, Gorgaud, Kosakowski and Varsowich; colonel Anatole Montesquiou; barons Fain and De la Place, and M. Maret, remained with him to the last. He had also been expecting the empress, and was very unwilling to leave Fontainebleau before she arrived. Baron Köller assured him that she was absent of her own free will; and he then consented to depart. In the forenoon of the 20th, the soldiers at Fontainebleau were drawn up, and he took an affecting farewell of them. He then entered his carriage, and set out, accompanied by Bertrand, Drouet, and Cambronne, and 400 soldiers of the guard, who had obtained leave to accompany him. Four commissioners also formed part of his cortège; colonel Campbell, for England; baron Köller, for Austria; count Waldburg-Truchess, for Prussia; and general Schouvaloff for Russia. The journey was not a pleasant one. On the road through Burgundy and the Bourbonnais he met with nothing to occasion much additional mortification. But, remarks M. Thiers, "soon the journey became more painful. In the neighbourhood of Moulins, the cries of 'Vive l'Empereur!' ceased, and those of 'Vive le Roi!' were heard. Between Moulins and Lyons, the people only showed curiosity, without any significant demonstration. At Lyons, Napoleon had always counted many partisans, for what he had done for this city, and its industry; yet there was also a portion of the population quite the contrary. In order to avoid any manifestation, they passed through Lyons during the night; yet some cries of 'Vive l'Empereur!' received the imperial cortège. But these were the last." As the party approached the coast, the manifestations became decidedly against him; and the fear of violence caused him to assume an Austrian uniform. A week was occupied in the transit to the coast. Napoleon and his escort arrived at Frejus on the 27th; on the 28th, he and his attendants embarked on board the British frigate, the Undaunted, which conveyed him to Porto-Ferrajo, the capital of Elba, where he arrived on the 4th of May. He was received by the mayor, who presented to him the keys of the town; and he took up his residence at the Mairie.

The empress Maria-Louisa, with the young Napoleon, were at Blois when the abdication was signed. Their court at once forsook them; and when the empress left Blois for Orleans, on the 9th of April, no one but her chamberlain accompanied her. At Orleans, she met most of the members of Napoleon's family; who, a few days after the abdication was signed, left France. Madame la Mère, and the cardinal Fesch, went to Rome; Louis, the ex-king of Holland; Jerome, the ex-king of Westphalia; and Joseph, the ex-king of Spain, to Switzerland. The empress had a great desire to join Napoleon; but she was induced, instead of going to Fontainebleau, to proceed to Rambouillet, where her father and the emperor Alexander met her. By them she was persuaded to make Vienna her residence till a more settled state of things prevailed; and she set out for that city, taking with her her infant son, then about three years of age. She left Rambouillet on the 25th of April, and crossed the Rhine on the 2nd of May, when her husband, whom she was never to meet again, was on the seas, proceeding to Elba.—Josephine, who was residing at Navarre, when the treaty was signed, was seriously affected by the change in the fortunes of one whom she had never ceased to love. She went to Malmaison, at the request of the emperor of Russia, who treated her with the greatest respect. But she was melancholy and depressed, and never rallied, expiring on the 29th of May, with the words, "Island of Elba" on her lips. She evidently did not exult at, but mourned over, the disappointment and mortification of the man, whose ambition had tempted him to obtain a divorce from her, in order that he might contract an alliance with royalty.

In Belgium and Italy, the fortunes of Napoleon had also been on the wane. In the former, after the independence of Holland had been re-established, Napoleon was particularly anxious to maintain Antwerp, which he considered one of his most important fortresses, and in whose port the fleet which he had been building for the invasion of England, was collected. He conferred the command, in Belgium, on count Maison; but instead of an army of fifty-five battalions, which he was promised, that officer could not command 20,000 men for the defence of the French dominions in that quarter. He, therefore, gave up all idea of re-establishing the Napoleonic rule in Holland; and confined himself to defending Belgium, which was threatened, on the side of the sea by England; and on that of the Meuse by the Prussians and Russians. An English division of 6,000 men, under Sir Thomas Graham, acted in concert with general Bulow, till the latter had to pass into France. On the 13th of January, 1814, these allies defeated the French, with the loss of 1,000 men, at the village of Merxem, near Antwerp. On the 25th, the Prussian took Bois-le-duc by escalade; and Maison felt himself compelled to leave Antwerp, with its garrison of 15,000 men, to its own resources, and to retire to Louvaine. The former city was invested by the allies, and bombarded, but with little effect; attempts to destroy the fleet by missiles being frustrated by the precautions of admiral Missiessy, who covered the ships with turf and wet blankets. Early in February, Napoleon and Carnot were reconciled. The latter, a stern republican, who had refused all offers of employment after Napoleon assumed the purple, wrote to him on the 24th of January, offering him his services. "The offer is little, without doubt," he said, "of an arm sixty years old; but I thought that the example of a soldier, whose patriotic sentiments are known, might have the effect of rallying to your eagles a number of persons, hesitating as to the part they should take, and who might possibly think, that the only way to serve their country, was to abandon it." To this letter Napoleon replied: "Since Carnot offers me his services, I know he will be faithful to the post which I assign to him: I appoint him governor of Antwerp." The measures taken by him and admiral Missiessy, were most judicious. Repeatedly did fire break out in the city and the docks, from the shell and shot thrown in by the bombardment, and as repeatedly was it extinguished. No impression was made on the walls, when Bulow was summoned to France. Sir Thomas Graham not having a sufficient force to continue the investment, raised the siege, and went into cantonments near Bergen-op-Zoom. On the 8th of March, he attempted to take that fortress by a coup-de-main, which was defeated, great gallantry being evinced on both sides.—At the close of February, another Prussian corps, under the Prince of Saxe Weimar, had entered Belgium, and in the middle of March he was reinforced by the arrival of general Thielman, and 15,000 Saxons. These forces caused the enemy to evacuate Brussels; Gorcum was taken; and Maison was driven from before Courtray, under the cannon of Maubeuge and Lisle. Attempts to take those places were defeated; and the French flag also continued to float over Antwerp, Bergen-op-Zoom, Condè, and Ypres: all the rest of Flanders was in the hands of the allies.

In Italy, Eugene Beauharnais, who occupied the line of the Adige, with 36,000 men, was opposed by 50,000 Austrians, under Bellegarde. The defection of Murat compelled the former to fall back to the Mincio; and he cantoned his troops behind that river, his right being at Mantua, his left at Peschiera. A British expedition from Sicily, under lord William Bentinck, had also landed on the Etrurian coast, and threatened Leghorn and Genoa. The viceroy had thus three armies to contend with. He resolved to attack Bellegarde first, before Murat could join him. The Austrians were equally desirous of assuming the offensive; and there were several days fighting on the Mincio early in February, the advantages of which were on the side of the French. About 3,000 were killed and wounded on both sides; the Austrians also lost 1,500 prisoners. The capture of the castle of Verona by the Austrians on the 14th, and of Ancona, by Murat, on the 16th of February; added to the desertion of great numbers of his Italian troops, compelled Eugene to withdraw from the Mincio to the Po. Offers were now made to him to join the allies, but he refused, though, according to the Rapport Confidentiel of M. Bignon, the kingdom of Italy was offered to him, if he would separate himself from the emperor; but he refused to do so. The successes of Murat, however, induced Fouchè, who was still governor of Rome, to enter into a convention with him, by which Pisa, Leghorn, and Lucca were delivered to the allies; as were Volterra, Civita-Vecchia, Florence, and the castle of St. Angelo; the garrisons of those places, it was arranged, should be sent to France. Fouché, soon after, had an interview with Murat, in which he contrived to extract some money from the Neapolitan's coffers; and he then set off to Paris, to take his share in the events transpiring there, with a view of seeing whether he could not turn them to his own advantage. A proclamation of the hereditary prince of Sicily, claiming the throne of Naples, annoyed Murat, and was very near inducing him again to declare for Napoleon. As it rendered combined operations with him impossible, lord William Bentinck directed his movements on Genoa, in co-operation with another English detachment which had landed in the gulf of La Spezia. Murat attacked the French on the Po, and was defeated at Guastalla, by general Grenier; who made himself master of Reggio, which was retaken by Murat, who then remained inactive before Parma. When Napoleon signed his abdication, a good part of Italy had been wrested from his dominion.

From January to April, there had been marching and countermarching, from Lyons into Switzerland by the force under marshal Augereau, and much fighting with the Austrians, generally to their advantage; and ending in the capture of Lyons, twenty-two cannon, and a quantity of military stores. The French were compelled to retire behind the Isère; and there Augereau heard of the capture of Bordeaux; and Napoleon having promised him 10,000 men of Suchet's army, wrote to say, that 6,000 of them must join him. Augereau now began to despair of the emperor's cause; and he wrote to prince Eugene, calling upon him to cross the Alps, and give Napoleon the support of his troops. Eugene could not leave Italy; and Augereau kept up a position on the Rhone. In April, he went to Valence; and there, on the 16th of that month, after he had heard of the deposition of Napoleon by the senate, and his abdication, he addressed a proclamation to his soldiers, telling them, that the senate, worn out by the despotism of Napoleon, had dethroned him and his family. He would be replaced by a new dynasty, strong and liberal, descended from the ancient kings. "Soldiers!" he said, "you are absolved from your oaths; you are so by the nation in which the sovereignty resides: you are still more so, were it necessary, by the abdication of a man, who, after having sacrificed millions to his cruel ambition, has not known how to die as a soldier." When Napoleon was on his road to Frejus, he met Augereau coming from Valence. They alighted from their carriages, and, after embracing, walked together, conversing in the most amicable manner, for a quarter of an hour. They separated as friends; and when Napoleon, shortly after, entered Valence, the first thing he saw was, the proclamation we have quoted on the walls!

BOOK VIII.

THE RESTORATION; THE BOURBONS, AND THE ORLEANISTS.

CHAPTER I.

THE BOURBONS RE-CALLED; ENTRY OF THE COUNT D'ARTOIS INTO PARIS; ARRIVAL OF LOUIS XVIII. AT CALAIS; DECLARATION OF ST. OVEN; ENTRY OF THE KING INTO PARIS; RETURN OF THE POPE TO ROME; THE FIRST MINISTRY OF LOUIS; THE CHARTER; THE TREATY OF PARIS; MEASURES OF THE GOVERNMENT; STATE OF PARTIES IN FRANCE; THE CONGRESS OF VIENNA.

WHILST the armies of the allies and of the emperor were engaged in the field, the chief members of the provisional government, joined to deputies from the senate, were consulting upon the question, of what constitution should be adopted, now that the despotism of Napoleon was at an end? The members of this committee, under an impression that what they might determine upon would not be acceptable to the Bourbons, sought to obtain the sanction of the allies to their proceedings. At their request, count Nesselrode attended their meetings, and they did not finally conclude upon any proposition, till it had received his approbation. In this committee MM. Lambrechts and De Tracy, members of the senate, more especially represented the liberal sentiments; while the Abbé de Montesquiou supported the abstract claims of the Bourbons. A proposed declaration that the people "freely" called Louis XVIII. to the throne, he termed "a monstrosity;" and maintained, that "the crown belonged of right to the brother of Louis XVI.;" he also asserted, that it was the sole privilege of the king to create peers, and scouted the pretensions of the senate to declare that body to be a permanent one, and their office hereditary. By the influence of count Nesselrode, concessions were made on both sides; on the 6th of April the committee made their report to the senate, by whom it was adopted, and the next day it was published to the people.

This report, or draft of a constitution, contained twenty-nine articles, of which the first three were as follows:—1st. "The French government is monarchical and hereditary, from male to male, in the order of primogeniture." 2nd. "The French people freely call to the throne of France Louis-Stanislaus Xavier, of France, brother of the late king; and, after him, the other members of the house of Bourbon, in the ancient and usual order."—3rd. "The old nobility resume their titles, and the new nobility preserve theirs." The following articles established the senate and the legislative body, and affixed limits to the royal authority. The public debt was also guaranteed; and many of the establishments and conquests that flowed from the revolution, were preserved. The decree of the senate, promulgating this constitution, was published on the 8th of April, accompanied by several orders from the provisional government. One of these related to the press, and regulated the censorship. A second put down the tricolour, and declared the white cockade to be the true emblem of France. A third set at liberty all prisoners of war then in the French territory. The publication of these decrees was followed by the adhesion of many of the leading men of the empire, and of public bodies, to the new order of things. Amongst the latter was the university. That body, in an address to the senate, signed by Fontanes, Villaret, Delambre, de Beausset, Cuvier, and others, said—"It eagerly hoped for the time when it should be enabled to present to the descendant of St. Louis, of Francis I., and of Henry IV., the homage of its love and fidelity."

On the 10th of April, being Easter-Sunday, a general thanksgiving was solemnly performed in the Place Louis XV., by the allied sovereigns, their suites, many members of the senate, and the Parisian authorities. The next day the provisional government issued a proclamation to the army, stating, that the new constitution would assure to them their honour, their grades, and their pensions. On that day the comte d'Artois, who had assumed the title of lieutenant-general, which the senate, at first, refused to recognise, arrived at Livry; and, on the 12th, his royal highness made his solemn entry into Paris. He was on horseback, and surrounded by a large number of officers and gentlemen, who had gone out to meet him. They received him with cheers, and the cortège, which had a brilliant appearance, advanced to the barrier of Pantin, where it was met by the marshals of France in full uniform. Ney was at their head, who, addressing the comte, said—"Monseigneur, we have served with zeal a government which commanded us in the name of France; your highness and his majesty will see, with what fidelity we shall serve our legitimate king." The comte replied—"Messieurs, you have made the French arms illustrious; you have carried, even into countries the most remote, the glory of the French name: the king claims your exploits: what has ennobled France can never be foreign to him." The procession then proceeded to Notre-Dame, where a solemn service was performed in the midst of an immense congregation. The comte returned thanks for being enabled, once more, to set foot in his native country; and he said to those by whom he was surrounded—"There is nothing changed, only a Frenchman more in Paris. This is the first day of happiness I have experienced for twenty-five years."

Two days after the comte d'Artois had entered Paris, Talleyrand, having overcome the objection of the senate to recognise him as lieutenant-general of the kingdom, waited upon his royal highness with a decree, appointing him to that office, till the arrival of his brother. In his reply the comte said, he was not authorised by the king to accept the constitution; but he was sufficiently aware of the sentiments his brother entertained, not to doubt that the bases laid down would be admitted by him.—The first acts of the new lieutenant-general were, to enforce obedience to the decree of the senate, abolishing the tri-colour; and, in conjunction with the provisional government, he took measures to withdraw the French garrisons from all the fortresses they still occupied in the countries of the allies. The ports were also opened for the admission of the produce of England and her colonies, which the decrees of Napoleon had excluded; and as this measure caused the price of the most useful commodities to be greatly reduced, it had an excellent effect on the public generally, though it irritated the producers, who found that the value of their articles was proportionately diminished. The convention, by which the fortresses were surrendered, was signed on the 23rd of April; under its provisions, all the guns, ammunition, and stores, contained in those strongholds, nearly sixty in number, were given up; and the garrisons, amounting collectively to upwards of 100,000 men, returned to France. On the 27th of April the allied sovereigns and the comte d'Artois signed another convention or treaty, by which they acknowledged the sovereignty of the Isle of Elba to be vested in Napoleon Bonaparte.

The decree of the senate, recalling Louis XVIII., was communicated to that monarch with all possible speed. On the 20th of April he left Hartwell, and proceeded to London, where the prince-regent received him with all the honours due to royalty. The king displayed great emotion at the meeting. "Sire," he said, "I shall always consider that, under God, I owe my restoration to your royal highness, as well as that happy state of things which enables me to close wounds, calm passions, and restore peace, repose, and happiness to all nations:"—a declaration, which, when the emperor Alexander became acquainted with it, offended him greatly. There is reason to believe, however, that the prince-regent of England's urgent advice and recommendation, not to treat with Napoleon or any of the Bonapartes, but to recall the Bourbons (pressed upon count Lieven, the Russian ambassador to London, in an interview on the 25th of January, 1814,) gave the initiative to the steps taken by the allied sovereigns, and had very great effect in producing the result so important to the restored monarch. Louis did not remain in London, but went on to Dover, accompanied by the prince-regent; and embarked for Calais, where he landed three days after he quitted Hartwell. Received by general Maison, and a deputation of officers, he accompanied them to Compiègne, where he arrived on the 29th, and was met by Berthier, Ney, Moncey, Brune, Lefebvre, and several other of Napoleon's marshals, of whom Ney and Berthier were the most demonstrative in their professions of attachment. The legislative body followed the marshals; the greater number of its members arriving at Compiègne on the 30th of April, and they were received by Louis with great respect, as the real representatives of the people. The next day the emperor of Russia visited the newly-restored monarch; and, as his majesty was completely in the interest of the senate, being influenced by Talleyrand, he endeavoured to induce Louis to accept the constitution, which that body had drawn up; and which, as it recognised the rights of the people, the senators expected would give them a fair ground to demand that they should be constituted into a permanent hereditary body, resembling the English house of lords. But Louis would not give up the point of his hereditary right, and refused to accept the constitution, which recognised the right of the people freely to call him to the throne. There certainly was some force in the arguments used by the monarch, to support his own view, "that he was now king of France by the right hereditary, or the right divine," and "through no other claim." Exclusive of that right, he said, "What was I?—An infirm old man, exiled, and condemned to beg for bread afar from his country. Such I was a few days back. That destitute old man was, however, in right, the king of France. And this right, alone, has induced the nation, enlightened as to its real interests, to recall him to the throne." The discussion between the two sovereigns resulted in a compromise; and, on the 2nd of May, the king issued the following declaration, known as the declaration of St. Ouen:—

"Louis, by the grace of God, king of France and of Navarre, to all, by these presents, greeting.

—Recalled, by the love of our people to the throne of our fathers, enlightened by the misfortunes of the people we are destined to govern, our first thought is to invoke that mutual confidence so necessary to our repose and happiness. After having attentively read the plan of a constitution proposed by the senate, we have recognised that the bases are good; but that many of the articles bear such essential marks of the precipitation with which they were drawn up, that they cannot, in their actual form, become the fundamental laws of the state. Resolved to adopt a liberal constitution, wishing that it should be wisely combined, and not having it in our power to accept one, which it is indispensable to rectify, we convoke for the 10th of next June, the senate and legislative body, undertaking to lay before them a constitution, which we will draw up, in concert with a commission to be named by the two assemblies. This constitution shall have the following principles for its basis:—The maintenance of a representative government, divided into two bodies—the senate and the chamber of deputies—sent by the different departments. Taxes shall be freely imposed; public and individual liberty insured; the freedom of the press respected, such regulations only being adopted as are necessary to secure public tranquillity; the liberty of worship shall be guaranteed, with the rights of property, which is to be inviolable and sacred: the sales of national property being irrevocable. The ministers of the crown are to be responsible; they may be impeached in one chamber, and judged in another. The judges shall be irremovable and independent; the public debt guaranteed; pensions, grades, and military honours preserved, whether belonging to the old or new noblesse; and the legion of honour, of which we shall fix the decoration, shall be maintained. Every Frenchman shall be admissible to civil and military employment; and no individual shall be disquieted for his previous votes or opinions.”

On the 3rd of May, Louis made his public entry into Paris. At this period Chateaubriand describes him as having “a superb head;” his look being “that of a king, and a man of genius.” Another authority says—“though gouty and fat, he was lively, and made himself agreeable.” Owing to his gout and obesity, “he walked with difficulty, yet in a manner touching and noble.” When he entered Paris he was in an open caleche, the duchess d’Angoulême sitting by his side, attired in the English fashion, which greatly offended the French ladies. The English head-dresses, at that period, were worn very low, whilst the French were as disproportionately high; and the enthusiasm of the royalist ladies, so prominently displayed on the arrival of the allied sovereigns,* seemed to evaporate, because the bonnet of the duchess was not in the fashion. The entrance was made in the midst of a large concourse of spectators, the streets being lined with the old guard. The populace and the officers displayed much enthusiasm, real or assumed; but the privates of the guard—“covered with wounds, the conquerors of all Europe,” except England, which never succumbed to, or quailed before the victor of the continent,—“these men, robbed of their old captain, were brought,” says Chateaubriand, “to grace the triumph of an old king, invalid with years, not wars, whilst an army of Russians, Austrians, and Prussians surrounded and watched them.” They showed their disapprobation unmistakably to those who narrowly regarded them.” “Some made their large hats fall over their eyes, so that they could not see what was passing around them.” “Others lowered the corners of their mouths, in the contempt of their rage; others athwart their moustache, displayed their teeth, like those of tigers.” A slight thing would have caused a collision, in which such were the numbers opposed to them, that the guards must have perished. But all went off, as if by clock-work. Louis proceeded first to Notre-Dame, where he returned thanks for the change in his fortunes; and then to the Tuileries, where the duchess d’Angoulême was so overcome by the recollection of her parents’ fate, that she fainted, falling down insensible at the king’s feet, as they entered the palace. It was some time before she regained composure; and the king did not instantly recover his equanimity. He did not, however, suffer private griefs or personal regrets to interfere with the important demands upon him. Those which most immediately pressed, were, the formation of his government, the grant of a constitution, and the conclusion of a peace with the allies. To those essential matters he turned his attention without loss of time.

Previous to the arrival of Louis, the provisional government had ordered the pope—who, when Napoleon abdicated, was still in Provence—to be set at liberty, and had given directions that he should be conducted to the frontiers of Italy with the greatest respect. The health of Pius was affected by his long confinement, and his bodily strength was greatly reduced, so that he had to travel very slowly. It was the 23rd of May before he reached the environs of Rome, and he entered that city the next day. There had been divisions amongst the former subjects of the pope as to the propriety of his restoration; and many of the leading nobles had signed a memorial to the allied sovereigns, praying that the Roman states might be put under secular government, and incorporated with some of the adjacent sovereignties. Murat had this document intrusted to him, and he treacherously put it into the hands of the pope, whom he went to meet soon after his holiness crossed the Italian frontiers. The prelate, understanding the purport of the document, without looking at the signatures, threw it into the fire. This generous act had its due effect; the return of Pius was generally hailed as a most welcome event; and he resumed the exercise of his functions at the Vatican with general approbation.

Louis selected, for his leading ministers, M. de Talleyrand, the abbé de Montesquiou, and M. de Blacas, whom he made ministers of foreign affairs, of the interior, and of the household; D'Ambray was the chancellor and minister of justice; general Dupont, who had signed the capitulation at Balen, of war; baron Louis, of finance; and baron Malouet, of marine. Of the first three, not one, according to M. Guizot, was "suited to the government they were called upon to found." M. Talleyrand had acted with cool determination, and exerted the influence he undoubtedly possessed, very beneficially, when the fortunes of Napoleon and of the Bourbons were suspended in the balance. At Vienna he had displayed considerable diplomatic tact, and ably supported the interests of France. But he had no sincerity, no decided honesty of purpose; being "a diplomatist without scruples, indifferent as to means, and almost equally careless as to the end, provided only that the end advanced his personal interests." Of true freedom, of the principles of rational social liberty, he had no conception. The abbé Montesquiou was an old royalist. He had always been faithful to his principles, his friends, and his order. He had that honesty, which was so glaringly deficient in Talleyrand. He had, also, great natural talents, and a richly-cultivated mind. He, however, liked the old system better than the new one, and would rather have recurred to the splendid despotism of Louis XIV. than have seen the sovereign shackled with the constitutional restrictions which limited the authority of Louis XVIII. M. de Blacas, as honest as the abbé, and thoroughly devoted to the king, was much more fitted for the atmosphere of Hartwell than for that of Paris. He had "no political genius, no ambition, no statesmanlike activity." A sovereign, who had been himself fitted to rule, and to a mind to conceive, united the will to execute, might have made these ministers—different as they were—useful to their country; but Louis XVIII. had scarcely any of the qualities requisite in the governing head of a great nation. "Outwardly imposing, judicious, acute, and circumspect, he could reconcile, restrain, and defeat; but he could neither inspire, direct, nor give the impulse while he held the reins. He had few ideas, and no passion. Persevering application to business was as little suited to him as active movement. He sufficiently maintained his rank, his rights, and his power, and seldom committed a glaring mistake; but, when once his dignity and prudence were vindicated, he allowed things to take their own course, with too little energy of mind and body to control men, and force them to act in concert for the accomplishment of his wishes."*

The ministry was formed on the 13th of May, and, directly after, a commission—comprising nine senators, nine members of the legislative body, and four members appointed by the king—met to frame a constitution. They commenced their labours on the 22nd, and concluded them on the 27th of May. The result was the Charter, based on the declaration of St. Ouen, which the king adopted. It declared the person of the king inviolate, vesting in him the executive power, the command of the forces of the kingdom, the right of declaring war, and concluding peace, of appointing officers, conferring titles, as the "fountain of honour," and of proposing and publishing the laws. It established the legislative power in two bodies—the chamber of peers, substituted for the senate, and the chamber of deputies, which took the place of the legislative body, with power so enlarged, that it became, in fact, like our house of commons, the depository of almost all the actual executive powers of the government. Neither that body, nor the senate, however, had the privilege of proposing or initiating laws: by the 14th article, that power was reserved for the king, who was also "to make rules and issue ordinances, necessary for the execution of the laws and the security of the state." The king named the members of the chamber of peers, whom he could appoint for life only, or declare their titles and office hereditary. The members of the chamber of deputies were to be elected by colleges of electors, composed of persons who paid direct contributions to the state, of 300 francs (£12) yearly; and no person was eligible to be elected a deputy, who was not forty years of age, and did not pay 1,000 francs (£40), annually, in direct contributions. The deputies were to be elected for five years, one-fifth retiring every year. The power of convoking and proroguing the legislature was vested in the sovereign, and also that of dissolving the chamber of deputies; whenever that step was resorted to, another chamber was to be summoned within three months. All laws relating to imposts and taxes, were to be first presented to the chamber of deputies. The personal rights of Frenchmen, as set forth in the declaration of St. Ouen, including freedom of speech and action, and security of property, were all established in the charter, which also abolished the conscription. Still it pleased none of the parties into which France was divided. The liberals complained that it sought "to cover the retreat of royalty as the revolution had sought to protect its own;" that "it replied to the pretensions of the revolutionary system by the pretensions of the ancient form;" and that it "presented itself as purely a royal concession, instead of proclaiming its true character, and what it really was—a treaty of peace after a protracted war—a series of new articles, added, by common accord, to the old compact of union between the nation and the king." The strict legitimists objected, that it restricted the kingly power, which should be absolute, that being "the only form of government which suited France." The moderates, led by M. de Villele, condemned the charter as "being an importation from England, foreign to the history, the ideas, and the manners of France;" and which, they said, "would cost more to establish, than the ancient organization would require for repairs."*

* Guizot's Memoirs of my own Time, vol. i., p. 41. Guizot was appointed secretary-general to the minister of the interior; his first introduction to official life.

Louis, amongst his first acts, created the comte d'Artois colonel-general of all the national guards of the kingdom; and as the charter abolished the conscription, he issued an ordonnance, authorising the conscripts of 1815 to return to their homes. The publication of this ordonnance was followed, on the 30th of May, by the signature of the treaty of Paris. By this treaty, France was restored to her ancient limits, as they existed on the 1st of January, 1792, with a few exceptions. Small strips of territory were annexed to the departments of Ardennes, Moselle, Bas Rhin, and Aix; a part of Savoy was still considered a portion of the kingdom; the principality of Avignon, the territories of Venaissin and Montbeliard, were also reserved. The territory of Flanders—lying between Holland, the sea, and the Meuse—was appropriated to Holland, very much to the annoyance of Talleyrand, through the efforts of the English plenipotentiaries; it being the opinion of England, that the formation of two Protestant kingdoms, stretching, with Hanover, across the continent to the north of France, would afford an impassable barrier in that direction, should French ambition prompt to future conquests. The Rhenish provinces were ceded to Prussia; and the free navigation of the Rhine to vessels of all nations, was guaranteed. The independence of Italy was recognised; but Murat remained at Naples. The king of Sardinia, restored to his dominions, received Genoa in exchange for Chambery, which remained attached to France. Switzerland was once more declared free and independent. England agreed to surrender to France all her conquests, except the islands of Tobago and St. Lucie in the west, and the Isle of France, in the east. The portion of St. Domingo which had belonged to Spain was seized by France, and retaken by the English, was ceded to its former possessor; England was declared protector of the Ionian

Isles, and Malta was ceded to her in perpetuity; France regained the right of forming commercial establishments on the coast of India, and of fishing in the seas of Newfoundland, and in the gulf of the St. Lawrence. Provisions were also made for the payment of the debts which France had incurred when her troops occupied other European countries; for the abolition of the slave trade, on the condition of the restoration of her West Indian colonies; and for the retention, by France, of various works of art, brought to Paris from the countries once occupied by her armies.

Directly after this treaty was signed, preparations were made by the allies for withdrawing their troops from France. Whilst they were in progress, Louis summoned the senate, in the chamber of peers, and the legislative body, in the chamber of deputies of departments, to meet in the Palais de Bourbon. Only sixty of the senators were summoned; some being set apart as regicides, and others because their opinions were not considered favourable to the present order of things. That number was increased to 152 by the addition of some of the ancient noblesse, and of Ney, Berthier, Suchet, Masséna, Oudinot, and Mortier. The two bodies met on the 4th of June; and were joined by the king, attended by all the princes of his family. His majesty addressed the assembly briefly, but pertinently; telling them, that, "Entering that hall for the first time, surrounded by the great bodies of the state and the representatives of the nation, who had given him the most touching proofs of their affection, he was proud to be the dispenser of those benefits which Divine Providence had vouchsafed to his people." He announced the conclusion of peace, and remarked, that "the rank which France occupied amongst nations remained hers—it had been transferred to no other state. What other states had acquired in the shape of security, augmented, also, the security of France, and, consequently, its true power. The cession of conquests it had been unable to preserve, did not diminish its real strength, and the glory of the French arms had received no tarnish: the monuments of its valour still remained amongst them, and the chefs-d'œuvres of art now belonged to them by rights more stable than those of victory. The paths of commerce, so long closed, were free; the market of France would not be the only one open to the products of its labour and soil: but their manufactures would again flourish, their seaports be resuscitated; and everything promised that long tranquillity abroad, and durable felicity at home, would be the happy fruits of peace." A feeling tribute was paid to Louis XVI.; who, said his majesty, "lives in the immortal testament which he destined for the use of his august and unfortunate son. My eyes being fixed on that immortal production, and my mind penetrated by the sentiments which dictated it—guided by the experience and seconded by the counsels of many among you—I have drawn out the constitutional charter, which you are about to hear read, and which establishes the prosperity of the state on a solid basis.” The charter—which concluded with the words, “Given at Paris, in the year of grace, 1814, the nineteenth of our reign”—having been read, the two chambers voted addresses thanking the king for his speech, in the sentiments of which they generally concurred; and the address of the deputies closed with a declaration of the conviction of that chamber, that the people of France would “owe much happiness to Louis the desired.”

On the 16th of June, France felt once more restored to her independence. From the 31st of March, hostile armies had occupied her capital; and so numerous were the various nations whose representatives had assembled there, that, as has been aptly remarked, “The dream of Ariosto was realised;”

“For not the walls of Paris could contain
From various nations such a counterstrain,
There rich and poor—there all degrees on earth,
Of Grecian, Latian, and Barbarian birth,
Throughout the world—that tongue can scarce relate,
The lords and envoys sent from every state.”

There were soldiers and civilians from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south; and Paris never presented a more magnificent spectacle than when the allied troops, 70,000 in number, with eighty-two guns, were reviewed previous to their departure; and the sovereigns, with the plenipotentiaries, and the various personages connected with them, appeared on the ground. The soldiers were drawn up in a line three deep, which extended from the barrier of Neuilly to the bridge of St. Cloud; and a finer set of men were never collected together. This review took place on the 14th of June; two days after which the allied sovereigns and their armies left Paris, the former visiting London, before they returned to their own capitals, a visit which impressed them all deeply with convictions of the freedom, the power, the wealth, and the vast resources of the British people.

The difficulties of the restored king now began to commence; and it is probable, that, had the whole of his measures been as wise and judicious as some of them were most undoubtedly the reverse, he would have failed to satisfy all the parties which soon sprang up in France. Properly administered, the charter contained within itself the elements of sound constitutional freedom; and, as the Code Napoleon remained in force, and a general amnesty was proclaimed, there was good reason to hope for a reign of peace, and a return of prosperity. But from the first, many who would probably have been satisfied with the provisions of the charter, per se, were displeased with a speech of the chancellor D’Ambray, in which he said, that the king was “in full possession of his hereditary rights over that noble kingdom;” and with the date affixed to the charter—“the 19th year of our reign.” They thought this indicated a determination to ignore all that had passed in the last twenty-five years; and even many royalists were not desirous of a return to the ancient state of things. Discontent, therefore, existed from the first, which was not long before it was openly manifested.

Public attention was soon called to the acts of the legislature. The chamber of deputies had a difficult task to settle the financial question. The king, upon having the names of five members presented to him, in pursuance of the charter, nominated as president M. Lainé, who appears to have been one of the few men who had a just view of what the government could effect to satisfy the national moderate party. Soon after his appointment, his majesty communicated to the chamber a report from the minister of the interior, upon the enormous losses which France had sustained in the last two years, in various ways connected with the military events of the empire. The total amounted to 1,305,000,000 francs [£52,320,000]. In adjusting the budget for the year, the expenditure, though considerably reduced, amounted to 618,000,000 francs, whilst the receipts, with undiminished taxes, were estimated at 545,700,000 francs. The deficiency was provided for by government bills, bearing an interest of eight per cent., to be repaid in three years; and to afford security for this repayment, it was resolved, on the proposition of baron Louis, that 300,000 hectares of forest land, belonging to the state, should be sold. The discussion of this proposition introduced the question of the propriety of restoring to the church and the emigrants so much of their property as remained unsold. A law was proposed to that effect; but the violent and imprudent language of M. Ferraud, a member of the administration, caused it to be dropped. The legislature, however, adopted a law, making the state liable for the debts contracted by Louis XVIII., during his exile, amounting to 30,000,000 francs. The civil list was fixed at 25,000,000 francs; and by a provision of the charter, that was to be the amount during the reign of Louis. The other members of the royal family were to receive 8,000,000 francs per annum, which was independent of the extensive and valuable royal demesnes. These measures did not call forth much public censure; but the press, having become very violent, in opposing some measures of the king and his counsellors, especially with respect to the army, the minister of the interior, on the 5th of July, laid before the chamber a law for regulating the press, and subjecting all works containing less than 30 printed sheets, or 480 printed pages, to a preliminary censorship, whilst it was proposed that newspapers and periodicals should only appear with the permission of the king; and that no person should become a printer or publisher without a royal license. This law was strongly opposed by the public and in the chamber; the committee appointed in the latter to consider it, unanimously resolving, that "the censorship was unjust, dangerous, and unconstitutional." It was debated at great length, and a majority was obtained for it at last, by reducing the extension of the works, to be subjected to the censorship, from 30 sheets, or 480 pages, to 20 sheets, or 320 pages. With this alteration, the law was adopted, on the 21st of October, by 317 votes against 217. The legislative session did not end till December 30th, when the chambers were prorogued to the 1st of May, 1815; but, with the exception of those named, none of the measures brought before the peers and the deputies were of any particular interest.

While the legislature was in session various acts were adopted by the king and his government, some of which were unobjectionable, whilst others became a fruitful source of increasing the public discontent. Those for which his majesty was more immediately responsible, were an ordonnance, providing that from the day of the abolition of the charter, the names then remaining on the list of emigrants should be effaced. On the 3rd of August he formed a new council of state. About the same time the royal orders of the Holy Ghost, of Military Merit, of St. Louis, and of St. Michael, were revived; the order of the Silver Lily was founded; and the Legion of Honour was re-organised, receiving a new decoration—the portrait of Henry IV. If the ministers had done nothing more unpopular, there would have been less angry excitement. But Dumont, the minister of war—by putting many of the officers on half-pay, and replacing them by royalists, members of the old families; by substituting the white flag for the tricolour; by altering the numbers of the regiments, and the designations of the officers, reviving those of the old monarchy; by compelling the protestant as well as the Roman-catholic soldiers to attend mass, and to go to confession; by removing the imperial guard from the Tuileries, and replacing them with Swiss troops and Vendéans; and by the suppression of the military schools of the empire and the restoration of that established in 1751; most of which measures, though done in the name of the king, were ascribed to his influence—had rendered himself so extremely unpopular, that, before the year closed, he was removed, and replaced by Soult, who was made a member of the chamber of peers. He became soon as unpopular as his predecessor, by accepting the presidency of a commission, formed to superintend the erection of a monument on "the very spot where the victims of Quiberon were immolated," who were styled (if truly, still imprudently, as it revived old acerbities and animosities), "Christian warriors, whose last words were words of affection for their king, and prayers for their country."

Whilst these measures affected the army, the general public felt the heavy pressure of the taxes, which, as they had been promised relief, excited great discontent; and this was increased by the injudicious measures of the priests, who had obtained a complete ascendancy over the comte d'Artois; and whose importunity frequently gained the assent of Louis to measures of which he secretly disapproved. One of the first acts interfering with the liberty of the subject, was an ordonnance issued by the director-general of the police, Benquot, at the instance of the priests, forbidding any one to work on Sundays; and ordering wine-sellers, the keepers of cafés, billiard-rooms, and other establishments of the kind, to close their doors on Sundays and fête-days, during the hours of divine service. This ordonnance, however defensible on religious grounds, was such an interference with the public habits, that no prudent man would have recommended its abrupt introduction. As Napoleon had dealt unfairly with the priests, so they now endeavoured to tyrannise over the laity, especially in the matter of education. The services of the Roman catholic church, with every superstitious observance, were restored at the Tuileries; crosses and prie Dieux were placed in the public roads; and one historian tells us, that "France was covered with ceremonies, and monuments, and vows for expiation for crimes, or for deeds committed during the quarter of a century of revolution." The old prejudices against certain classes were, also, attempted to be revived. Thus, in January, 1815, on the death of Mademoiselle de Rancourt—a celebrated actress, a lady, whose latter years, at all events, had been marked by an unostentatious piety, and by a most extensive exercise of benevolence—the clergy resolved that the funeral service of the church should not be read over her corpse. It was taken to the church of St. Roche; but the gates were closed. The populace soon collected in great numbers, forced their way into the church, and insisted that a priest should be found, and compelled to read the prayers for the dead. It is impossible to say how this affair would have ended, if the king, hearing of it, had not sent one of his own household priests to perform the ceremony. This caused the tumult to cease; but the irritation of the people continued; and it led them to ridicule and treat with contempt a procession of the clergy through the streets of Paris, in honour of the Virgin Mary, as the especial protectress of France, to whom Louis XVIII. owed his throne. And when, on the 21st of January, 1815, the remains of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette were removed from their unworthy resting-place in the garden of Des-clozeaux, Rue d'Anjou, to St. Denis, the populace regarded it as a complete return to the principles of the old régime; especially as the owner of the garden, who had endeavoured to preserve the remains, was named a knight of St. Michael, and had a pension settled upon him and his daughter; while it was ordered, that, on the 21st of January, in every year, a service should be celebrated for the repose of the soul of Louis XVI.; that the court, and all civil and military authorities should wear mourning; and that the courts of justice and the theatres should be closed. These causes of discontent were heightened by what the ladies of the empire considered an insult to themselves. Every place at court was given to the wives, daughters, or relatives of the old noblesse. However amiable and deserving, those of the princes, dukes, and counts, created under the imperial dynasty, were rigidly and systematically put on one side. No wonder that the ladies felt indignant, and that this indignation was also entertained by those with whom they were connected in the most intimate relations of life. The personal character and conduct of Louis, contrasting so strongly with those of Napoleon, were also influential, after a time, in strengthening disaffection, where it did exist, and in creating it where it did not. He liked ease, indeed he was unable to bear fatigue, and was seldom seen. He could not mix with the army or the people, had he been inclined. If he witnessed the movements of the former at all, it was from a balcony of the palace; and the only notice he took of the latter was sometimes to kiss his hand to them, and then place it on his heart. Reading the journals and reports of the police, and hearing mass, were his chief occupations. He was well disposed; but quite destitute of that physical energy which could have rendered him popular with an animated and excitable people.

The causes of irritation we have enumerated gave rise to various parties, which, towards the close of 1814, and early in 1815, began to assume great significance. There was a party desirous of seeing the imperial dynasty restored, the members of which rallied round Hortense, the daughter of Josephine, and the ex-queen of Holland, who was aided by the counsels and personal influence of the dukes of Bassano and Rovigo, and count Lavalette. Some still longed for a republic, the beau idéal of governments, in their opinion. Carnot, Barras, and Grégoire were members of this division of the political world; and the name of Fouché was classed with them; but of his sincerity there are great doubts. La Fayette led a number of men, of great talents and ability, who contended for a constitution in which the rights of the people should be placed above the claim of kings to reign by a divine dispensation. With his name we find associated those of Benjamin Constant, Lanjuinais, Boissy d'Anglas, and De Broglie. These two latter parties were desirous of restricting the royal power; but there was a party who wanted still further to increase it. At their head was the comte d'Artois; and there can be little doubt that the unwise tendency of the policy of Louis XVIII. to despotism, and an entire disregard of popular opinion, was owing to the influence of the comte over his much better-disposed, but too easily led, brother.

During the last three months of 1814, and the two first of 1815, important events were taking place at Vienna. When the allied sovereigns left Paris, it was with the intention of assembling, the next month, in congress at that capital. But the visit to England, and other circumstances, prevented their meeting till the 25th of September. There were then present, in that capital, the emperor Alexander, the kings of Prussia, Denmark, Bavaria, and Würtemberg, with a number of the minor princes of Germany, who were joined by lord Castlereagh on the part of England, and M. Talleyrand, on that of France. Before the proceedings closed, the duke of Wellington, who had been appointed ambassador from the court of London to that of Paris, joined the congress, and took part in its deliberations. The sittings extended into March, 1815, much time being occupied with discussions, now of little interest; the results being what it is necessary for the reader to be acquainted with. In deciding upon those results, France, Great Britain, Russia, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, and Sweden had votes; and the plenipotentiaries of the kings of Naples, Sicily, Bavaria, the Low Countries, Saxony, and Denmark; and of the Swiss and Genoese republics, were in attendance, to urge the interests of those states. The decisions at which the congress arrived (some of them not come to, without great difference of opinion, which, at one time, nearly led to war), were:—1. That Belgium should be united to Holland, and form the kingdom of the Netherlands.—2. That Norway should be annexed to Sweden, and the two should be called the kingdom of Sweden and Norway.—3. That Hanover, with a considerable accession of territory taken from the kingdom of Westphalia, should be restored to England. 4. That the German states should be formed into a Germanic Confederation, bound to support each other against the attacks of foreign foes, and whose federal concerns should be regulated by a Diet, in which Austria and Prussia should have two votes, the other kingdoms one each. 5. That the great fortress of Luxembourg, with its territory, should form part of the Germanic Confederation; the title of the king of Holland being in future, king of the Netherlands and grand-duke of Luxembourg.—6. That Holland should cede to Great Britain the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice; Great Britain restoring Java to that power.—7. That the nineteen original cantons, with the Valais, Geneva, and the principality of Neuchâtel, should form the independent federal republic of Switzerland.—8. That Saxony should cede all Lower, and a part of Upper Lusatia, Wittenberg, Thuringia, and some other territory, on the banks of the Elbe, in all containing 1,100,000 souls, to Prussia; a much smaller portion, with a population of about 250,000 to Hanover; and the king should retain the remainder.—9. That the navigation of the Rhine, the Necker, and the Elbe should be free.—10. That measures should be taken to abolish the slave trade.

The questions of the future destiny of Poland produced such angry discussions, arising out of the claims for large additions to their territory from that kingdom, made by Russia and Prussia—the latter country also claiming Saxony, in the first instance—that the conferences were interrupted, and in danger of being broken up. These disputes led to a secret treaty between France, Great Britain, and Austria, signed on the 30th of February, 1815, in which the contracting powers agreed to sustain the principles of justice and equity, advanced in the negotiations preceding the treaty of Paris; and mutually to support each other, if attacked. The negotiations were, however, resumed; and the point in debate was, whether Murat should continue to be recognised as king of Naples, several of the powers contending that he had so completely failed in keeping his engagements, that the allies were liberated from theirs. Before this question was decided, reports which were received of a correspondence being carried on between Napoleon in Elba, and certain persons in Italy, gave rise to another, as to whether the late emperor of France should not be removed from that island? These discussions were carried on with some acrimony, in the midst of great gaiety, Vienna being the centre of balls and fêtes, given in honour of the illustrious visitors; when, on the 7th of March, intelligence arrived that Napoleon had departed in secrecy from the island where he was placed. This alarmed all the sovereigns, and particularly irritated the emperor of Russia, who had earnestly contended against his removal. All differences were now at an end, as the necessity for union was apparent. The discussions on the future of Poland and Naples were suspended; and the sovereigns agreed to a declaration that Napoleon Bonaparte, by breaking the convention which had established him in the island of Elba, had destroyed the sole legal title to which his political existence was attached; that he had placed himself out of the pale of civil and social relations; and, as the general enemy and disturber of the world, was abandoned to public justice; that the allies were firmly resolved to maintain the dispositions sanctioned by the treaty of Paris; that they would give the king of France all necessary assistance; and make common cause against those who should disturb the public tranquillity.

AT GHENT.

WHEN Napoleon landed in Elba, accompanied by his sister Pauline and a few only of the many hundred apparently devoted adherents, who had paid court to him at Paris, whatever were his real thoughts and intentions he never betrayed them, not even to Bertrand and Cambronne, his two most intimate associates. The island was within a few hours' sail of his birth-place, Corsica. It is, says Lamartine, "nothing but a block of iron, covered with rocks, notched and jagged by the winds, and with a layer of earth accumulated in the hollows of the hills—displays but few narrow valleys, winding between the mountains and little creeks, half opening to receive the waves of the ocean. Amidst these meanderings, and upon the slopes of hills which look upon the sea of Italy, nature and cultivation have enclosed some rural domains and some gardens, shaded by olive trees, and watered by scanty streams. It is in one of these creeks that the town of Porto Ferrajo presents its roadsteads, its ports, and its fortifications to the wanderers of the deep." Napoleon established himself, his sister, household, and guard in the old chateau and the principal houses of the town, and placed his 1,500 troops in barracks. His first efforts appeared to be directed to get his civil and military followers properly and comfortably arranged, and to place himself on good terms with the people of the island and with the commissioners of the allied powers, especially with Sir Neil Campbell, the English commissioner. The instructions of that gentleman were couched in the following terms:—"You will pay every proper respect and attention to Napoleon, to whose secure asylum in Elba it is the wish of his Royal Highness to afford every facility and protection; and you will acquaint Napoleon, in suitable terms of attention, that you are directed to reside in the island till further orders, if he should consider that the presence of a British officer can be of any use to protect the island or his person from insult and attack." This commissioner was repeatedly in the habit of breakfasting with the emperor, at his request, after which they generally joined the other commissioners in a stroll on the beach; and then very often Napoleon would detach Sir Neil from the rest, and, embarking in a small boat with that officer alone, under the pretence of fishing, would enter into an apparent confidential communication with him. So the mornings were most usually spent. Au reste—we cannot describe Napoleon's Life in Elba more graphically nor, we believe, more accurately, than it has been done by Lamartine.

The emperor—for such was still his title—did not abandon his military habits. Besides attending to the discipline of the small body of troops which accompanied him, he armed and organised the militia of Elba, paying great attention to minute details, and endeavouring to animate them with a spirit of military patriotism. He also devised new buildings, new roads, and other improvements in his limited territories. In his house, or palace, "he retained the habits, and surrounded himself with all the luxuries, of his French palaces, having, to all appearance, only changed the seat of government." In this manner he passed the autumn and the winter—"luxury mingling with simplicity, and festivity with retirement, in his residence. The wreck of his immense fortunes, and the first instalment of the allowance secured to him by treaty, appeared to have been devoted to the embellishment of the island, and to the acquisition of a small fleet, destined, as he alleged, to the commercial and military service of his new subjects. To this flotilla he gave a flag, as to a naval power, intended to maintain a position, and to make itself recognised and respected in the waters of the Mediterranean. Works of art, furniture, books, and the journals of Europe, arrived for him, incessantly, from Genoa, Leghorn, and Paris." Visitors, also, continually arrived from all parts of Europe, especially from England. They were received cordially, entertained pleasantly, and left delighted with the attentions of the man who—once dictator of Europe—seemed now to have forgotten all his former greatness, and to have devoted himself to the duties of the confined sphere in which he was placed. Nor were any of these visitors insensible to the attractions and charms of Pauline Borghese, who, having been one of the most popular personages of the imperial court, did not appear to be regarded with less interest in her present position. "She adorned the exile of her brother, gave life and soul to it, impassioned it with her charms, and made it touching by her fidelity to misfortune. She constituted the splendour and the grace, while she did the honours, of his salons." But there was an under-current at work. Pauline "travelled, under the pretext of visiting her sisters and brothers, from Elba to Rome and Naples, and from Rome and Naples to Elba." Important events were dependent upon these journeys, apparently of pleasure or duty; and Pauline was the medium of communication between Elba and the continent,—“an ambassador, without seeming importance, and free from suspicion;” one “whose very volatility shielded her, in the eyes of the continent, from all imputations of sinister intentions.”

If Napoleon did not go to Elba with a determination to return to France, and attempt to recover his position, he formed that determination soon after his arrival. It is probable that after events induced him to make another throw for fortune; and if the Bourbons had wished to favour his pretensions, they could not have acted more unwisely than they did. As we have seen, their measures offended all parties, except the extreme royalists; and some of them were justly offensive to that part of the nation it was their interest to have conciliated and attached to their cause by every honourable means—the army. The dukes of Bassano and Rovigo—still warmly attached to their old general—were made the depository of the complaints of the men and officers, whose discontent they encouraged; and, as Hortense also resided in Paris—her hotel and fortune being secured to her through the interest of Alexander,—a central-point was afforded, round which all the Bonapartists could rally; and M. de Lavalette, late post-master, being also a strong Bonapartist, afforded the means of keeping up a communication, through Pauline, with the exile. No wonder, with these materials and facilities at his command, that Napoleon succeeded in organising a conspiracy in Paris, against the Bourbons, which was, before he took his culminating step, spread throughout almost every department in France. Whilst progress, if gradual, decided, was thus making towards the desired end in France, the pope, like the Bourbons, not having learned wisdom from misfortune, seemed bent upon doing all he could to render himself unpopular, and to make the people long for another suspension of his rule. His first act was, as we have seen, generous and politic; but he had scarcely fixed himself again in the Vatican, than he revived all his former policy. He immediately recalled the Jesuits; then he restored the Inquisition, annulled the sales of church property, restored the monastic orders, issued restrictive and offensive regulations respecting the Jews; prohibited the receipt of foreign books in Rome, and also the lighting of the streets; the latter an act of pure barbarism, which it is difficult to account for. Victor Emmanuel, of Savoy, restored to his kingdom of Piedmont, rivalled the pope in his restrictive and reactionary policy; whilst Austria showed a disposition to renew all her objectionable system in Italy; and, to enable her to carry it out, she removed the Italian troops from her restored dominions, to Hungary and Bohemia, and supplied their places, in garrisons and cantonments, by Germans. In Spain, the reaction had commenced; Ferdinand having placed himself entirely in the hands of the monks, at whose suggestion, he revived the Inquisition, and abolished the constitution of the cortes. Thus, the fatuity of rulers, quite as much, or more, than the inclination of the people, prepared the way for the return of Napoleon to France.

Early in February, M. Fleury de Chabillon, who had been one of Napoleon's auditors of his council of state, presented himself at Elba, and had some long and confidential interviews with the emperor, informing him of the state of feeling in France, and the measures to which it had given rise. He received from the emperor assurances of his intention to take advantage of the change in public opinion, and again try his fortunes in the field. On dismissing De Chabillon, he said—"Depart, and tell those who have sent you what you have seen. I am determined to brave everything to meet their wishes, and those of the nation. I shall leave here, on the 1st of April, with my guard, perhaps sooner." What De Chabillon had seen, was, that Napoleon was silently, and, as secretly as he could, making preparations for an expedition. He was accumulating provisions and munitions of war, reviewing his guard, inspecting the arms of the few troops he possessed, and endeavouring to establish the most rigid discipline amongst them all. When he told De Chabillon that he should not leave Elba till the 1st of April, he did not intend to move before that date, as he wanted to give ample time to his friends in France to complete their arrangements. But he learned that there were other conspirators besides the imperialists—that there was a party, which, discontented with Louis, was endeavouring to raise a feeling in the army and the people for the duke of Orleans; and fearing that he should be anticipated by his royal highness, he hastened his movements. He had also cause to apprehend that his designs were suspected by the allied commissioners, who might at any time prevent their execution. It is certain, from a despatch sent by Sir Neil Campbell to lord Castlereagh, on the 26th of February, that his motions were observed, and his intentions suspected. Sir Neil had been some days at Leghorn, from whence his despatch is dated; and he left that day, on his return to Elba. His object had been to see lord Burghersh, and arrange for a line-of-battle ship and frigate, which lay at Genoa, being sent to cruise off the island. In his despatch, he expressed his conviction that Napoleon meant to evade the supervision of the allies; and his opinion that, leaving general Bertrand to defend Porto-Ferrajo, he would take with him Drouet, Cambronne, and such of the guards as he could depend upon, and, embarking in the Inconstant, L'Etoile, and other vessels, would land either at Gaëta or Civita Vecchia,—Italy, it was supposed, as the nearest coast, being the point for which he would make. At that time Pauline had just returned from one of her visits to Italy. In her trips to that country she had had several interviews with Murat, who had been wavering and undecided as to the course he should take; but she succeeded in inducing him to declare for his brother-in-law and early patron and friend—a resolution, probably as much the result of a conviction that he had so completely excited the suspicions of the allies, that they would not keep terms with him, and the knowledge that an army of 30,000 men, which Soult had assembled at Chambery, was intended to watch his movements, as by the persuasion and intreaties of Pauline. Having taken his ground, Murat was very anxious that his brother-in-law should not linger over his plans at Elba, but act at once; and, when he learned that he might rely upon Murat's making a diversion for him in Italy, Napoleon appears to have resolved upon immediate action. On the evening of the very day that Sir Neil Campbell's despatch was dated, the princess Pauline gave a ball to the principal inhabitants of the island and the officers of the army, and it was attended by some English travellers, with whom Napoleon, who was present, chatted on the most easy and familiar terms. He remained till a late hour, and when he retired, he took with him generals Bertrand and Drouet, to whom he said, on separating for the night:—"We depart to-morrow. Let the vessels which are at anchor be seized to night; let the commander of the brig Inconstant be ordered on board, to take the command of my flotilla, and to prepare everything for the embarkation of the troops; let my guards be embarked in the course of to-morrow; let no vessel whatever leave the port or the creeks till we are at sea; and, until that time, let no one, except yourselves, be acquainted with my intentions." These orders were exactly obeyed; and at mid-day, on the 27th, 400 grenadiers of his guard were embarked on board the Inconstant, and he had, besides, embarked on board the L'Etoile and three small merchant vessels, which had been seized during the night, 200 infantry of the guard, 200 Corsican light infantry, and 100 Poles. All being ready, he was taken on board the Inconstant by the barge of that vessel; and the little flotilla, of five vessels, with twenty-six guns, sailed without molestation. Elba—round which the allies ought always to have kept several vessels of war—had been entirely unwatched, except by an English brig, which was then on its way from Leghorn, bringing back Sir Neil Campbell; and the flotilla had no opposition to encounter. The captain of the Inconstant started with sealed orders, which he opened when two leagues from Porto-Ferrajo, and found that he was to make for St. Juan, on the coast of Provence. As soon as he had read the orders, the emperor being on deck, as well as most of the troops, Napoleon exclaimed to the latter—“Soldiers! we are going to France! we are going to Paris!” They shouted, in reply, with one voice—“To France! to France! Vive la France! Vive l'Empereur!” It is said, however, that the enthusiasm soon subsided when, after the first moments of excitement, there came leisure to reflect on the fearful odds they would have to encounter.

Napoleon employed himself, during the voyage, in drawing up proclamations to the people and the army, which he promulgated as soon as he set foot on shore; numerous manuscript copies having been made by the soldiers and sailors who could write. In the first, he attributed the disastrous result of the campaign of 1814 to the defection of Augereau at Lyons, and of Marmont at Paris. Under the circumstances, he “consulted only the interests of the nation, and exiled himself upon a rock, in the middle of the sea, as his life might be still useful to the people. He did not suffer the great number of citizens who wished to accompany him and share his fate, to do so, as he thought their presence at home would be useful to France; and only took a handful of brave men, necessary for a guard.” He proceeded to show, that the prince who had succeeded him, and who was seated on the throne by the power of those armies which had ravaged the French territory, had “endeavoured to bolster himself up by the principle of feudal rights, by which he could only serve the honour and the interests of a few individuals, enemies of the people; and the internal tranquillity, and the estimation in which France was held abroad, would be lost for ever. In his exile he had heard the complaints of Frenchmen, who claimed the government of their choice;” and “he had crossed the seas amidst dangers of every description, and was come among them to resume his rights, which were identical with theirs. All that had been done, written, or said by individuals, since the taking of Paris, he would be ignorant of for ever; it should have no influence whatever in the recollection he preserved of the important services they had rendered; for these were events of such a nature, that they were beyond the control of human organisation.” The proclamation to the soldiers, denied that they had been conquered: “but two men from their own ranks had betrayed their laurels, their country, and their sovereign, their benefactor.” He asked, whether they would suffer those whom they “had seen, during five-and-twenty years, overrunning all Europe to raise up enemies against them, to inherit the fruit of their glorious labours, and seize upon their honours and estates, that they might calumniate their glory?” In “his exile he had heard their voices; he was home again, through every obstacle and every peril; their general, called to the throne by the voice of the people, and raised on their shields, was restored to them;” and he called upon them “to come and join him:” to “fling away those colours which the nation had prescribed, and which for twenty-five years had served as a rallying-point to the enemies of France; to hoist again the tricolour cockade, which they had worn in their glorious battles;” and “to range themselves under the standard of their chief, who existed only in their welfare; whose rights were only those of the people and theirs; whose interest, whose honour, and whose glory, were identical with theirs.” The first proclamation was signed by Napoleon alone; the second by him, and counter-signed by Bertrand, as “the grand marshal officiating as major-general of the grand army.”

The voyage was performed without incident; and, at 3 A.M. on the 1st of March, the flotilla entered the Gulf of Juan, where it anchored. The first step taken did not prove successful. Twenty-five men of the old guard were sent on shore, to secure the battery on the coast, if there was one: there was no battery; and the officer who commanded the men, marched them on to Antibes, expecting that the garrison there would hoist the tricolour. General Corsin, the commander, however, was true to his trust; he made the men prisoners, as he did a second party who presented themselves; but this did not interfere with the proceedings of Napoleon. The little army with him was disembarked at 5 P.M.; and, having bivouacked till the moon rose, at 11 at night, the emperor put himself at their head, and advanced into the interior. On the night of the 3rd, he slept at Bareme; on the 4th, at Digne; and, on the 5th, at Gap, where the proclamations were printed and distributed throughout Dauphiné, amongst the military and the people. On the 6th, the little band advanced on the road to Grenoble. The garrison at that place was commanded by general Marchand, who remained faithful to his trust. He had under his orders colonel Labedoyère, “an officer of handsome figure and elegant manners; descended from a respectable family; young, enthusiastic, pleasing." Though he owed his appointment to the royalists, he was seduced from his allegiance by the fascinations of Hortense, and promised to lead a regiment he commanded, which was part of the garrison, to join Napoleon. Marchand received intelligence of the landing, and the near approach of the "exile from Elba;" and he sent a battalion of infantry towards Vizelle, to observe his movements. This battalion encountered the advanced guard of Napoleon, under Chambronne; and, instead of receiving the imperialists with open arms, seemed resolved to resist their advance. As Chambronne found he was outnumbered, he fell back three leagues, and sent an aide-de-camp to the emperor, with the information. Napoleon immediately joined his general, and advanced to meet the detachment from Grenoble, which consisted of about 800 men. He first sent the chef d'escadron, Raoul, to inform these troops of his arrival, but the officer could not obtain a hearing. Dressed in his well-known grey surtout, the emperor then went himself to the spot where the men had bivouacked, being followed by his guard, with their arms reversed. He preceded them till he got so near the troops that he could make his voice heard, when he exclaimed—"Comrades, do you know me again?" "Yes, sire," was the immediate response. He rejoined—"Do you recognise me, my children? I am your emperor; fire on me:" uncovering his breast, he continued—"If you wish, fire on your father; here is my bosom." These words appeared to electrify the soldiery; they broke their ranks, and rushed towards him, with shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" They must have been provided with the tricoloured cockades, for one was seen immediately displayed on the breast of every man; the eagles also were restored, as if by magic, to their standards; and the men, sent out to arrest the progress of the emperor, ranged themselves on his side. Labedoyère had assembled his regiment on the afternoon of the same day, and, setting at defiance alike general Marchand and the prefect, who endeavoured to keep him to his duty, he marched his men out of the city. As soon as they were clear of the walls, he took an eagle from his pocket, which he placed on the standard; a drum was brought up, and, the head being broken in, it was found filled with tricoloured cockades, which the men placed on their breasts, or in their shakos, and marched, apparently in a tumult of excited enthusiasm, to meet Napoleon, who had now a column of near 3,000 men, with which he arrived, about 10 P.M., before Grenoble. The authorities here ordered the gates to be closed and locked, and the troops to line the walls; but the latter would make no resistance: they hailed the approach of the emperor with shouts; opened the gates to admit him; and he entered the town by torchlight—the inhabitants and troops alike giving him joyous shouts of welcome. He took up his head-quarters at the Cheval Blanc, kept by an old soldier of his guard, and all was quiet for the night.

At Grenoble, assuming the imperial power, Napoleon issued three decrees; the first declaring, that all the acts of government should, from that date, be in his name; the second ordered the enrolment of the national guards of the five neighbouring departments; the third entrusted to them the care of the fortress of Grenoble. He also published a proclamation to the inhabitants of Grenoble; in which, contrary to the tenor of that to the people of France, printed two days before, at Gap, intimating that the government, forced upon the people by foreigners, had "endeavoured to bolster itself up by feudal rights"—he said, "the Bourbons had accustomed the people to political rights; he was prepared to follow out the same system: in a word, to apply to the cause of the revolution the results of a constitutional government." He had, he added, "been too fond of war; he would wage it no longer; he returned to restore its rights to the nation, and desired to be only its first citizen." The municipality did not wait for the appearance of this proclamation before they made their submission; the people also flocked round the hôtel where Napoleon had taken up his abode; and, on his appearing to review the troops of the garrison, who had hoisted the tricolour, he was received with shouts of, "A bas les Bourbons!" "A bas les ennemis du peuple!" "Vive l'Empereur! et un gouvernement de notre choix." When he returned to his hôtel, "All is settled now," he exclaimed, "we are at Paris."

The king and the authorities at Paris, meantime, were in a state of consternation. The intelligence of the landing of Napoleon was announced, on the morning of the 3rd of March, in the French capital; and, though some of those by whom Louis was surrounded ridiculed the enterprise, and thought, or pretended to think, that it was the act of a madman, and would meet with the most signal discomfiture, Louis, from the first, thought that it would be attended with very serious results. For three days it does not appear that the government took any steps, either to arrest the progress of Napoleon, or to defend the capital. On the 5th of March, they issued a proclamation, which was more abusive than dignified, and reflected no honour on those by whom it was drawn up. It announced the escape of Bonaparte, "the man who, when he abdicated his power, retained all his ambition and his fury;" and who "was covered with the blood of generations." This man was come to "dispute, in the name of his usurpations and his massacres, the legitimate and mild authority of the king of France." * * "A few treasonable attempts, excited by his insane brother-in-law, inflamed the pride of the cowardly warrior of Fontainebleau. He exposed himself, as he imagined, to the death of a hero; he would only die that of a traitor. France had rejected him—he returned—France would devour him."

The king, contrary to the advice of some of his ministers, followed up this proclamation by ordering troops to be concentrated at Grenoble and Lyons; an army to be formed in Franche-Comté, to close up to the invader all the routes to Paris; and a third army to cover the south. He also directed that the patriotism of Vendée should be roused by a spirited appeal to the inhabitants, to rally once more round their old standard. It was arranged, that the count d'Artois and the duke d'Orleans should go to Lyons. M. de Vitrolles advised that the latter should be united in the command with the count, and sent from Paris, as he was aware of the wish of some parties to place that prince on the throne. Overtures had indeed been made to the duke; and before he left Paris, in an interview with the king, he revealed to him all that had occurred, tendered some excellent advice to his majesty, and pledged himself not to separate his own cause from that of Louis and of legitimacy. Of the other armies, that in Franche-Comté was placed under the orders of the duke de Berri. The duke d'Angoulême, who, with the duchess, was at Bordeaux, was directed to place himself at the head of 12,000 troops, assembled at Nismes, with instructions to take Napoleon in flank and rear, if he appeared with his followers on the Rhone. The troops in Britany were put under the command of the duke de Bourbon, son of the prince de Condé. The ministers fully expected that both troops and people would be animated with a spirit of loyalty, by the presence amongst them of these branches of the royal house; and as they were all utterly inexperienced in military matters, marshal Soult arranged that the most illustrious men of the imperial army should be under their orders, for the purpose of giving them the aid of their strategetic knowledge, and also, by the example of their fidelity, to induce the troops to imitate it. Ney, who was at Paris at the time, was ordered into Franche-Comté, with the duke de Berri: the marshal took leave of the king on the 6th of March; and, when he kissed the royal hand, he said—"Farewell, your majesty; Bonaparte shall pay dear for his audacity. I will bring him to your majesty, bound hand and foot, in an iron cage." The monarch was touched with his apparent loyalty and devotion; and replied, with great feeling—"Farewell! I rely upon your honour and fidelity!"

Napoleon remained four-and-twenty hours at Grenoble, and then marched, by Bourgancy, on Lyons, where the count d'Artois and the duke d'Orleans had arrived, and been very coldly received. Marshal Macdonald, who commanded, could obtain no demonstration from the troops in favour of the king: they at first offered no resistance to the marshal's orders, and took up positions on the bridges and quays looking towards Dauphiné, in which direction it was expected Napoleon would advance. When, however, it became known that the emperor was drawing near the city, two battalions of infantry refused to follow the marshal to defend the entrance of the bridge, on the side of the faubourg on which Napoleon was approaching; and when their general endeavoured to induce them, by a sense of honour, if not of duty, to obey him, two drunken Polish hussars dashed at him with drawn swords, and he with difficulty escaped with his life. The disaffection soon spread amongst the rest of the garrison; the marshal and the princes were obliged to leave the city; and the emperor entered in triumph. He took up his residence at the palace of his uncle, cardinal Fesch, and passed part of the night in drawing up nine decrees, by which he again took possession of the empire. Of these decrees:—No. 1 re-established all the magistrates who were in office in 1814, and dismissed those whom the Bourbon government had appointed in their place. 2. Expelled from the different corps d'armée all the emigrants who had returned with Louis XVIII. 3. Abolished the white flag and the lilies; restored the tricolour; and ordered that all the decorations which the government had conferred, should cease to be worn or displayed. 4. Reconstituted the imperial guard. 5. Confiscated all the property of the Bourbons. 6. Abolished the ancient noblesse, and restored that of his own creating. 7. Banished all the emigrants who had returned with the Bourbons, and placed their property under sequestration. 8. Annulled all the alterations made by Louis XVIII. in the Legion of Honour. 9. Dissolved the chambers of peers and deputies; abrogated the charter; and promised that a champ-de-mai—a sort of states-general of the nation—should be held, to deliberate on the nature of the institutions to be conferred on the people.

Having issued these decrees, Napoleon left Lyons on the 13th of March, his army being dispatched by the route of Burgundy. He slept that night at Villefranche, and the next day proceeded to Macon. On the road, according to Lamartine, he only received shouts of welcome from the "fickle, vulgar, and irresponsible mob;" all "who had anything at stake were silent." At Macon, he was also disappointed of the brilliant reception which he had expected: the crowd, who came to welcome him, was evidently composed of those classes whose support confers no honour on its object; and he indignantly inquired of the municipal authorities, whom he had summoned to his presence, "if they had nothing but that populace to show him?" From Macon, he forwarded the proclamations issued at Grenoble and Lyons, to marshal Ney, who was then at Lons-le-Saulnier, in the department of the Jura, where he had removed his head-quarters, with advanced posts at Poligny, Dôle, and Bourg, ready to march, either on Lyons or Dijon, as the movements of Napoleon might require. After he left Paris Ney's enthusiasm for the Bourbons appears to have subsided, not gradually, but at once. He was met by emissaries of the emperor, who conveyed to him accounts of the reception given his majesty by the people and by the troops; and he sent one of his officers, M. de Rochemont, in disguise to Lyons, to ascertain the real state of public opinion. At Lons-le-Saulnier, he summoned his officers around him, to learn their feelings; and he met with little encouragement from them to be treacherous to the monarch to whom he had lately, and so warmly, protested fidelity. But, finding the soldiers, generally, were for the emperor, his mind was made up; and, on the 13th of March, the day Napoleon left Lyons, he drew up a proclamation to the army he commanded, in which he told the troops, that "the cause of the Bourbons was for ever lost. The legitimate dynasty, which the French nation had adopted, was about to reascend the throne. It was to the emperor Napoleon, their sovereign, that the sole right of reigning over their beautiful country belonged." * * "Liberty was, at last, triumphant, and their august emperor would consolidate it for ever." This proclamation, scouted by the generals when it was laid before them on the evening of the day it was drawn up, was received with enthusiasm when the marshal read it to the troops the next day, at a review he had arranged for the purpose. Then a scene of tumult ensued. The officers who refused to follow Ney in his apostasy—the inhabitants, most of them royalist in heart as well as profession—were insulted and threatened; and the troops spread through the town, as inclination or caprice dictated; all discipline for the time being at an end, and licentiousness and inebriety prevailing in every quarter. The next day things looked better. Ney had sent a messenger to Napoleon, with the proclamation enclosed in a letter, in which he promised to meet him at Auxerre. The receipt of this letter removed all Napoleon's doubts, as the defection of Ney opened to him the road to Paris, leaving Louis without an army in the vicinity of the capital. The imperialists, therefore, pursued their march without apprehension. On the 17th of March, at Auxerre, ninety-three miles from Paris, Napoleon and Ney met; and whilst the latter, with the circumstances of his last interview with Louis fresh in his memory, earnestly entreated the emperor not to believe all he heard of the king, as many untruths were in circulation—his old master assured him that he was, as ever, beloved by him, and considered as "the bravest of the brave." No delay, longer than was absolutely necessary for rest and refreshment, was made on that day, or the next. On the route, at Montereau, a few of Louis's household troops, mixed with some infantry and cavalry of the old army, were encountered; when the latter, amidst cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" attacked and drove off the royal troops, and joined those which were advancing. All the regiments, on the roads to Melun and Fontainebleau, followed the example; and, on the evening of the 19th, Napoleon entered the latter town, in the midst of a torchlight ovation, and once more took up his residence in its palace. He then declared, that the march from Frejus had been the happiest period of his life. Indeed, he had reason to be perfectly satisfied with the events of the three last weeks; and had, no doubt, the fullest conviction that his enterprise would be crowned with success.

And what was going on in Paris? A complete net-work of intrigues—some royalist, some imperial, some Orleanist; others for moderate constitutionalism, in which Lafayette and Benjamin Constant were the principal actors; Fouché—the versatile, unscrupulous, treacherous, but inimitably clever Fouché—being deep in the secrets of all. It was he that was the means of disconcerting the movement in the army, in favour of the duke d'Orleans, which he had at first promoted; and he held himself ready to join, as he had always done before, the party whose prospects of success seemed the brightest. Louis remained at the Tuileries, his mind divided and distracted between hope and fear. Receiving intelligence on all sides of the defection of troops, he determined to summon the chambers; and, as his ministers objected, he drew up the proclamation with his own hand. The disturbance of that tranquillity which had been established, and which he had hoped would have led to a general and durable peace, was assigned as the cause for reassembling the legislature, which had been adjourned to the 1st of May. "Full of confidence" said the monarch, "in the zeal and devotion of which the chambers have given so many proofs, we hasten to summon them around us. If the enemies of their country have founded their hopes on the divisions they sought to foment, its legal defenders will destroy the criminal hope by the unattachable force of their indestructible union."

The 10th of March was the day when the members were again to meet in Paris. Only sixty-nine deputies obeyed the summons of the king, and the number of peers was much less. The same day, both chambers voted addresses to his majesty. That of the deputies, drawn up and signed by M. Lainé, a decided royalist, set forth that faults had been committed by the government, but that what was not the time to examine them. The events of the last few days called upon them to unite against the common enemy, in order to render the crisis profitable to the security of the throne, and of public liberty. The peers professed their loyalty and attachment to the sovereign, "whose intelligence," they said, "had taught him that the constitutional charter, the monument of his wisdom, would ensure, for ever, the stability of his throne, and the security of his subjects." Simultaneously with the meeting of the chambers, the ministers drew up two ordonnances, which were signed by the king, and issued on the 11th. In one, his majesty declared that he relied on the patriotic feeling of the French people, upon their inviolable attachment to the throne, and to the constitutional charter, by which their destiny was fixed. The other document ordered the national guards to be organised, and volunteers to be enrolled; and denounced the punishment of death against deserters, and the encouragers of rebellion.—The same day, a spirited proclamation appeared, drawn up by Soult on the 10th, and addressed to the army. "Soldiers!" he said, "this man, who but just now abdicated, in the face of Europe, an usurped power, of which he made such fatal use—Bonaparte—has made a descent upon the soil of France, which he never ought to have seen again. What does he want?—civil war. What does he seek for?—traitors. Where will he find them? Is it amongst the soldiery, whom he has so often deceived and sacrificed, by misdirecting their valour? Is it in the bosom of those families which his name alone still inspires with horror? Bonaparte despises us enough to believe that we can abandon a legitimate and well-beloved sovereign, to share the fate of a man who is nothing more than an adventurer. He believes it, the madman! His last act of lunacy shows him in his true colours." The troops were then exhorted to be faithful as they were brave; and to "rally round the banner of the lilies, at the voice of the father of his people—the worthy heir to the virtues of the great Henry."

Neither the ministerial ordonnances, nor the proclamation of Soult to the army, had much effect; and, notwithstanding the strong language of the latter, there was a prevalent feeling abroad, that the marshal was not sincere in his professions of loyalty to the Bourbons. The constitutional party, with whom he had never been a favourite, pressed upon the king the propriety of dismissing him; very reluctantly Louis found himself obliged to comply; but he accompanied the note of dismissal with another, expressive of his personal approbation of the marshal's services. Clarke, duke de Feltre, was made minister of war in the place of Soult; and the latter immediately proceeded to join Napoleon. At the same time, Louis dismissed M. d'André, the chief of the police, whose incapability and inactivity had kept him ignorant of the various plots which had been concocted in the capital; and replaced him by Bourrienne, the former private confidential secretary of Napoleon; who, dismissed

A few days were passed in all the fever of uncertainty; then the king summoned, on the 16th of March, the peers and deputies to a "royal sitting," which he attended, and addressed the members present with great emotion. He had come amongst them, he said, "to draw still closer those ties which, uniting them together, constituted the strength of the state." Having returned to his country, and "reconciled it with all foreign powers, he had laboured for the happiness of his people, and had received, and still continued to receive, the most touching proofs of their confidence and love." At his age, he could not do better than die for his country; but he feared for France; as he who came to bring amongst them the torches of a civil war, would inflict upon them the scourge of a foreign one. He would also impose upon them his iron yoke, and destroy that charter which he (Louis) had given them! Then, giving way to great animation, and in an impassioned voice, the monarch continued—"That charter I swear to maintain. Let us rally round it! Let it be our sacred standard! The descendants of Henry IV. will be the first to range themselves beneath it. Let the co-operation of both chambers lend to authority all the power of which it stands in need; and this truly national war will prove, by its happy issue, what a great people, united by love for their king and the great fundamental law of the state, can achieve." This address roused all the loyalty of the chambers. Cries of, "Long live the king!" "War against the usurper!" resounded through the hall. And when the count d'Artois, who had arrived the evening before from Lyons, proposed that they should "swear to live and die faithful to the king and the constitutional charter," all at once assented, and, with enthusiasm, exclaimed—"It is our duty to cover with our bodies the king, the country, and the laws! The king, in life and in death! We will live and die for the king!"

This was the last ray of the expiring flame. On the 18th, the chamber of deputies again assembled, and resolved "that the war against Bonaparte should be declared a national war, and that all the French should be summoned to take arms against the common enemy." The same day, Louis addressed another proclamation to his troops, telling them that he had pledged himself to the allied sovereigns for their fidelity; and calling upon those who had deserted their standard to abjure their error; to come and throw themselves into the arms of their father, and, he pledged his honour, all should be forgotten. The next day, a review of the royal and national guards was ordered, but few attended. The defection of Ney, the subsequent one of Masséna, and the march of Napoleon upon Fontainebleau, were known in the evening; and when Louis sat down to dinner, he announced to the few friends who remained around him, that he meant to quit the Tuileries that night. The next morning, a proclamation in the Moniteur announced his departure, and dissolved the chambers; the members being directed to separate, and assemble again wherever the king might appoint. Whilst the Parisians were reading this document, the royal party was far on its way towards Abbeville. That night the fugitive sovereign arrived at Lisle, where he stopped two or three days; when, finding that there treason was gathering round him, whilst his royal guard was rapidly disappearing, he went on to Ghent, where he arrived on the 20th of March, and held his court at that city till he was recalled to Paris, after the battle of Waterloo.

The news of the departure of Louis soon spread through Paris; and amongst the first who heard of it was count Lavalette. He immediately went to the post-office to get letters and collect news (such was his own account); but he found count Ferrand, the postmaster, eager to resign his office to him; and all the clerks and subordinates at once recognising his authority, he reinstated himself in his old office, and immediately dispatched a courier to Napoleon, to inform him that the palace of the Tuileries was vacant. When this courier reached Fontainebleau, he had an immediate interview with the emperor, to whom he delivered a letter from M. Lavalette. On reading it, the emperor exclaimed—"To Paris! the king and the princes have fled. I will sleep this night at the Tuileries." The cry, "To Paris," was re-echoed on all sides; and, very soon, the emperor and his staff were en route for the capital. They reached it about 9 P.M., when, passing under the arc de Carrousel, a number of the inhabitants met the cortège, and, thronging round the emperor, he was literally taken up in the arms of several Parisians, in their blouses, and carried to the palace. There, says one of the narrators of the events of that period, "the crowd of women from above, who had been employed in preparing the apartments vacated by the royal family for the emperor, stopping the influx of men from below, forced the latter to place the emperor on his feet, and he walked up, pale, but smiling, into those halls, the scenes alternately of princely splendour and of princely ruin."

The next day, the emperor, once more reinstated in the Tuileries, proceeded, first to review the troops in Paris, who were all enthusiastic in their cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" and then to form his government. In this he found more difficulty than he expected: his old friends, Caulaincourt, Cambacérès, Molé, and others, did not appear to be impressed with a conviction of the permanency of the renewed empire, and refused office, which Napoleon had to force upon them. After much trouble, the following appointments were made:—Caulaincourt, duke of Vicenza, minister of foreign affairs; Cambacérès, minister of justice; Carnot, minister of the interior; M. Molé, minister of roads and bridges; Davoust, prince of Eckmühl, minister of war; admiral Decrès, minister of marine; M. Gandin, minister of finance; M. Mollien held an office equivalent to our secretary of the treasury; M. Maret was secretary of state; and Fouché, duke of Otranto, again became minister of police. The direction of the civil list was given to M. de Montalivet; M. de Champagny was entrusted with the direction of naval stores; Savary, duke of Rovigo, took the command of the gendarmes; and Masséna was made commander of the national guard of Paris. The emperor also arranged his personal staff, on which he nominated all those officers who were upon it previous to his abdication. All accepted their appointments except Lauriston, who honourably refused to break the oath he had taken to the Bourbons. Labedoyère was appointed to the post Lauriston declined.

The ministry being formed, the constituted authorities, on the 26th of March, presented addresses to the emperor. M. de Cambacérès spoke for the ministers, and reminded Napoleon that he had promised "there were to be no foreign wars, except to repulse unjust aggression; no reaction within France; no arbitrary acts; but security for person, security for property, security for public opinion." In his reply, the emperor said—"These sentiments were his own; all for France, all for the nation, was his motto." The address of the council of state was drawn up by M. Thibaudeau, and read by M. Fermon, their orator. It stated, that the emperor had "returned to reign by the only principle of legitimacy which France had recognised for the last twenty-five years, and to which all the authorities were bound by oaths, from which only the people could absolve them." The emperor was called upon to "guarantee anew the liberal principles of individual liberty and equality of rights," the liberty of the press, the abolition of the censorship, the freedom of religious worship, the voting of contributions and of the laws by the representatives of the people; the independence and irremovability of the judges, with the responsibility of ministers and of all government agents. These institutions were to be revised, said the address, by a grand assembly of the people's representatives; and, till it met, the emperor was to exercise all power. In his reply, the emperor said—"Princes are the first citizens of the state. Their authority is greater or less, as the interests of the state they govern may require. Sovereignty itself is only hereditary, because the interests of nations demand it. I have renounced all idea of the great empire, of which, for fifteen years, I had only been laying the foundation; henceforward, the happiness and consolidation of the French empire shall be the sole object of my thoughts." The municipality of Paris were present on this occasion, and, in their address, reminded the emperor of his promise to grant a constitution.

Napoleon complied with the wishes of the council of state, by issuing decrees establishing the liberty of the press, abolishing the censorship, and decreeing the free election of municipalities. Another measure was of a highly objectionable nature. When he landed from Elba he proclaimed a general amnesty; but, fifteen days after his arrival in Paris, he issued a decree ordering the trial, and sequestration of the property, of the prince de Talleyrand, the duke of Ragusa, the abbé de Montesquiou, M. Bellard, and nine others, who had been active agents in promoting the restoration of the Bourbons. General Bertrand, who was his grand marshal, positively refused to countersign this decree, as being a breach of good faith in violating the amnesty; and M. Labedoyère was heard to say—"If the reign of proscriptions and sequestrations recommences, all will soon be at an end."

The decrees we have enumerated did not satisfy the council of state, nor the Parisians generally. The emperor was not disinclined to do something more; and he spent several weeks in consulting with Carnot and Fouché as to what measures he should originate. Not satisfied with the results, he summoned Benjamin Constant to the Tuileries. That statesman had, no longer ago than the 11th of March, made an indignant protest against the return of Napoleon, whom he termed "the man stained with the blood of France"—"who had stirred up against France all the nations of Europe, and brought upon her the humiliation of an invasion;" the man "who had thrice shamefully forsaken his troops, in Egypt, in Spain, and in Russia;" the man who "returned poor and greedy, having nothing to claim and nothing to offer:" and, after all this abuse, had declared that he, Benjamin Constant, "would not go like a miserable turncoat, crawling from one power to another, covering infamy by sophistry, and stammering out impious words to purchase a life of shame." This protesting civilian imitated the example set him by the military and by other civilians, and repaired to the palace—accepted the office of councillor of state, and agreed to assist Napoleon in forming a constitution. The result of the combined deliberations was, that on the 22nd of April, a supplementary or additional act to the charter was promulgated. By this document two legislative chambers were acknowledged—an hereditary chamber of peers, and a chamber of deputies, elected by delegates chosen by the people. This chamber was to consist of 629 members, not under twenty-five years of age. The "additional act" also re-established the penalty formerly connected with the crime of high treason, but which had been abolished by the charter—viz., confiscation of property; and the last article declared the Bourbons to be a proscribed race, prohibiting the people from recalling them.

Both royalists and constitutionalists received this "additional act" with disapprobation; but the emperor resolved to submit it to the test of universal suffrage. On the 24th of April, a decree appeared in the Moniteur, convoking a champ-de-mai for the 26th of the following month, to be composed of the members of the electoral colleges and departments, who were to bring the returns of the provincial votes. On the 30th of April another decree appeared, convoking the electoral colleges for the election of deputies to the chamber, who were also to assist at the champ-de-mai. These elections caused that gathering to be put off to the 1st of June, when it took place amidst great pomp and ceremony—a throne being erected for the emperor, who took his place amidst the shouts of the assembled crowd, which appeared to comprise all the population of Paris. After mass had been performed, Cambacérès read the result of the voting, which, including the army and navy, gave 1,532,457 ayes, against 4,802 noes—only a small proportion out of the gross number of voters—upwards of 6,000,000. The herald then proclaimed the acceptance of the "Act," and Napoleon took an oath to observe it.

The next day, the emperor created 118 peers, who assembled on the 3rd in the palace of the Luxembourg, where they first became acquainted with each other. The list included the emperor's brothers, Louis, Lucien, Jerome, and Joseph; cardinal Fesch; prince Eugene; four archbishops, ministers, former senators, military men (one of whom was Masséna), and a miscellaneous selection from the old revolutionists; viz., Carnot, Fouché, Siéyes, Quinette, Thibaudeau, Roger Ducos, and Boissy d'Anglas. The deputies assembled the same day, and chose Lanjuinais for their president, to the great displeasure of the emperor. He was, at first, disposed to resist the choice; but Carnot, and some other of his councillors, told him, they would not be answerable for the consequences if he did. M. Lafayette, M. Dupont de l'Eure, general Grenier, and M. de Flaugergues, were the vice-presidents. Two of them were hostile to the government; and that hostility was manifested by the chamber in various ways. The session was formally opened by the emperor on the 7th of June; his brothers, cardinal Fesch, his mother, and queen Hortense, being present. His speech was very different to those he had been in the habit of addressing to the legislature. He now avowed, that "the desire of his heart was accomplished in commencing a constitutional monarchy, as he desired to see France enjoy all possible liberty;" especially "the liberty of the press, which was inherent to the actual constitution." He concluded his address by saying, "the sacred cause of the country would triumph;" and by giving several recommendations to the chambers. The replies of those bodies were far from adulatory: they were couched in perfectly independent terms; and great interest was at first excited, to know what measures the peers and deputies would adopt. The events which were taking place, however, at Ghent and Vienna, and which led to the recommencement of hostilities, diverted attention from legislative proceedings.

It is necessary now to glance at the proceedings in the provinces, where, after the arrival of Bonaparte in Paris, some manifestations were made in favour of the Bourbons. The duke and duchess d'Angoulême were in the southern provinces when Napoleon landed from Elba; and at Bordeaux—where they had gone to be present on the 12th of March, the anniversary of the display of the white cockade in that city, in 1814—they had been the object of fêtes and ovations, given in honour of the daughter of Louis XVI.; ceremonies in which the army, under the command of general Decaen, appeared heartily to participate. When the advance of Napoleon became known at Paris, the command of the army of the south, as we have already stated, was given to the duke, with instructions to collect all the troops on the right bank of the Rhone; to put himself in communication with those under Masséna on the left flank; and the two armies to endeavour to crush Napoleon when his progress was arrested, as it was confidently expected it would be, under the walls of Lyons. The duchess remained at Bordeaux, where 15,000 of the inhabitants enrolled themselves as a national guard. The duke was also favourably received at Toulon; and as Masséna, at that time, remained firm in his allegiance, a combined plan of operations was agreed upon, which, if it could have been carried out, would have greatly impeded, if it had not entirely retarded, the advance of Bonaparte. But though the civil authorities and the people were on the side of the royalists, in this quarter of France the name of the emperor had not lost its magical influence with the army. When it was learnt that he was successfully marching towards the capital, Grouchy was enabled to lead a large force against the duke d'Angoulême; and Clausel, at the head of a considerable number of troops drawn from the central provinces, marched upon Bordeaux. The royalists of Vendée rallied round the duchess; and a body of volunteer national guards obtained some advantage over Clausel at the bridge of Dordogne. But the garrison of Blaye mutinied, and was followed by the other regular troops, amongst whom Clausel had caused the proclamations of the emperor to be distributed; and though one and all declared that they would not suffer any injury to be done to the duchess personally, not one would pull a trigger for the king. The duchess appealed to their patriotism, their honour, and their chivalry; but all in vain. She was obliged to leave Bordeaux; and, after having to anchor on the coast of Spain from stress of weather—and, while there, the king offered her a hospitable reception at Madrid—she proceeded to England, and soon after joined Louis XVIII. at Ghent.

The duke d'Angoulême, at first, had a prospect of better success than attended the duchess. After Bonaparte had entered Lyons, leaving the royalist, M. Vitrolles, in command at Toulon, the duke marched into the department of the Gard, and took the command of the troops from general Gilly. On the 18th of March he made a triumphant entry into Marseilles, where, being joined by from 3,000 to 4,000 volunteers, and at the head of about 13,000 men, he divided his force, and, sending general Loverdo with 6,000 men, to take the left bank of the Rhone and march on Grenoble, he intended himself to march on Lyons. The regular troops of Loverdo deserted him when he drew near Grenoble, and he had no resource but to send the volunteers back to their homes, to prevent them from being cut to pieces. The duke pursued his march towards Valence, and at Montelimart obtained a decided advantage over general Debelle: at the bridge of La Drome he also defeated a body of troops which opposed his progress, and soon after entered Valence. There he found that the troops of another detachment of his army, under general Ernouf, who had occupied Sisteron on the 27th of March, and who were to have co-operated with him against Lyons, had hoisted the tricolour; those with him did the same, except one regiment, the 10th. He also learnt that troops were advancing against him on all sides, and that if he would not sacrifice his volunteers he must retreat. He therefore fell back to Point St. Esprit; and there he ultimately surrendered to general Gilly, on condition that an entire amnesty should be awarded to all who had taken part with him and the duchess. At first Grouchy refused to ratify this convention; but Maret prevailed upon Napoleon to do so; and, by a despatch of the 11th of April, the emperor authorised Grouchy to conduct the duke to Cette, where he embarked for Spain. The duke de Bourbon soon after retired from Britany.

When Louis left Paris, the count d'Artois, the duke de Berri, and Marmont, were at the head of a small armed force, with which they followed the king, and, on the 23rd of March, occupied Bethune, the last fortified town on the French frontier. As a force was concentrating against them, the princes issued a proclamation, releasing the troops they commanded from their oaths to the king, and leaving them at liberty to return to their families or to follow his majesty. The prevailing feeling with the troops was, that they must not take a step which probably would cause them to be arrayed in arms against their country; therefore they escorted the princes to the frontiers, and then returned to Bethune, closing the gates, and maintaining their position against a force sent by Napoleon, till they obtained honourable terms, being permitted to return to their homes and families, only giving up their horses. About the same time, the duke d'Orleans passed the frontier into Belgium, and went to England; leaving a letter for Mortier, in which he said he was too good a Frenchman to sacrifice the interests of France; released the marshal from the orders he had given him; and gave up the joint command he held in Flanders with that officer; whom he recommended "to do everything which his excellent judgment and pure patriotism would suggest to be best for France, and most conformable to all the duties which he had to fulfil."

—The attempt of the duke de Bourbon and M. Larochejaquelein to raise an insurrection in Vendée, also failed; not from any want of spirit or royalist principle in the people, but from the overwhelming force sent against them.—On the 20th of April salutes were fired from the Invalides, at Paris, and from all the fortresses in France, to commemorate the suppression of the civil war and the re-establishment of the imperial authority. The people of Vendée, however, rose again under their leaders, Augustus and Louis Larochejaquelein, d'Autichamp and Lapineau, and that part of France was not completely tranquillised till the return of the Bourbons. Whilst the members of that family had nearly all left France, the Bonapartes, madame La Mère, and the emperor's brothers, had returned; they took up their abode at the Palais-Royal, Lucien fixing himself in the apartments of the duke d'Orleans. Napoleon permitted the dowager duchess d'Orleans and her daughter, the duchess de Bourbon, to reside in France, with pensions between them of nearly 600,000*f.* per annum. These concessions to members of that house, and the letter of the duke to Mortier, caused a suspicion, both at Ghent and Vienna, that there was an understanding between this branch of the house of Bourbon and the emperor: we are assured, however, that such was not the case.

At Ghent, Louis XVIII. inhabited a private mansion, and when the count d'Artois and the duke de Berri arrived there, they took possession of an hôtel in the principal square of the city. The steps taken by the allies encouraged Louis to maintain his title, and assert his claims as king of France, and he held his court with all its formalities. On his arrival at Ghent he had only one minister with him, M. Blacas; soon after he had taken up his position there, as M. Talleyrand still remained at Vienna, he made M. de Jaucourt, the intimate friend and confidant of that diplomatist, his minister for foreign affairs, ad interim; the duke de Feltre continued minister of war; the abbé Louis, minister of finance; M. Beugnot, minister of marine; Beurnonville and Lally Tollendal, ministers of state; and (according to Lamartine, "simply to give him a right to take his place at court, and have a voice in its political transactions,") Chateaubriand was named ambassador to Sweden. There was a handful of troops at Ghent, which were commanded by marshal Marmont, under the duke de Berri. The count d'Artois had also his privy council, composed of the count de Bruges, MM. de Vaublanc and Capelle; and during the months of April and May there were cabals of all descriptions carrying on in the little city. There was a general impression that the reign of Napoleon at the Tuileries would not be a long one; and different parties were endeavouring to establish and strengthen their own interests, under the impression that "favour in Ghent would be fortune in Paris." The count de Bruges and M. de Blacas acted together, and endeavoured to maintain harmony between the king and his family, as well as their own supremacy. There was another party, composed of the friends of Talleyrand and Fouché; the latter, though Napoleon's minister of police, being in correspondence with the Bourbons. A third class favoured the duke de Richelieu, perhaps the most honest of all the men by whom Louis was surrounded. As for Louis himself, he appeared to feel no diminution of confidence, and he never evinced the slightest idea of descending from the rôle of kings. "He felt so confident of his right," says Lamartine, "that he threw back upon adversity all the wrongs of his situation, he reigned in all places to which he bore his name and his blood, and nothing was altered in his habits except the palace." He did not want for money: the baron Louis had secured several millions of his civil-list, which served to maintain both his civil and military establishment for some months. Avoiding the appearance of either luxury or indulgence, he followed his usual pursuits; dividing his time between his exercises of devotion, his councils, his family, and in reading and conversation with literary men. The count d'Artois was much less reconciled to his fate; and it was rumoured amongst the friends of the Bourbons who remained in Paris that, principally under his auspices, some changes were organising, to adapt things more to the ancient régime when the Bourbons got back to the Tuileries. This induced the friends of Louis at Paris to send M. Guizot to Ghent, for the purpose of laying before the king, without reserve, their opinion of the state of affairs, and of the line of conduct it behoved him to adopt. The envoy, who left Paris on the 23rd of May, was courteously received both by Louis and M. de Blacas, though the latter wanted to know what brought him there? In his interview with the king, M. Guizot cautioned his majesty against a reactionary policy, and mentioned the objections entertained by the constitutionalists of Paris to many of the persons by whom he was surrounded. The king's reply was, "I will fulfil all that I have promised in the charter (names are not concerned with that); France has nothing to do with the friends I entertain in my palace, provided no act emanates from them injurious to the country."

The battle of Waterloo took place, and found M. Guizot still at Ghent; where he had made no further progress in the object of his mission.

HELENA; HIS CHARACTER.

THE allies followed up their declaration of the 13th of March* by a treaty, which was signed on the 25th, by the plenipotentiaries of Austria, Great Britain, Russia, and Prussia. By this treaty, the four powers engaged to unite their forces against Bonaparte and his faction, in order to prevent him from again disturbing the peace of Europe. Each agreed to furnish 180,000 men for the prosecution of the war: one-tenth to be cavalry; and, if necessary, to embody all their military forces of every description. A second treaty, which was kept secret, bound the powers to prosecute the war, till the complete subjugation of Napoleon was effected. The ratifications of both these documents were interchanged on the 25th of April; the English government declaring, that the allies were bound by these agreements to make an united effort to displace Napoleon Bonaparte; but they must not be understood as obliging his Britannic majesty to continue the war, for the purpose of forcing the people of France to accept any particular government. The lesser powers of Europe assented to the first treaty, as soon as it was published, and agreed to furnish their contingents—that of Bavaria being fixed at 60,000; that of Hanover at 26,000; and that of Piedmont at 30,000 men. The great powers applied themselves, without loss of time, to the reorganisation of their armies; and England, having concluded a peace with the United States, was enabled at once to send a considerable force into Belgium. Sweden and Denmark, Spain and Portugal, also joined the general league; so did Switzerland; and all Europe was, before the end of May, in arms against the emperor.

treaties signed on the 3rd of May, between Russia and Saxony, Prussia and Russia, and Austria, Prussia, and Russia, the king of Saxony gave up the grand-duchy of Warsaw, with which Napoleon had invested him; the fortress of Thorn, and its dependent territory were ceded to Prussia; the remainder of the duchy was erected into a separate kingdom, and annexed to Russia; Cracow, with a small surrounding territory, and a population of about 60,000, was declared to be a free and independent republic. By another treaty between Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, the former undertook to pay to the three latter a subsidy of £5,000,000 to be paid monthly, in equal proportions to each—Russia being to receive a sum equal to four months' subsidy, and Austria and Prussia one, equal to two months' subsidy, should the war be at an end within a year after the treaty was signed, to enable them to provide for the return of their troops to their own countries. The following subsidies were also agreed to be paid by Great Britain:—to Hanover, £206,590; Italy and Netherlands, £78,152; Portugal, £110,000; Spain, 147,333; Sweden, £521,061; and the minor powers, £1,724,000.

Napoleon, whilst engaged with the political and other matters to which we have alluded, had not neglected his army: he had attempted to enter into a negotiation with the allies, and had written a letter to each of the sovereigns of Europe, in which he said, that the dynasty imposed upon France by force, was not suited to it; he had been recalled as a liberator, as the inducement which led him to the greatest of sacrifices, no longer existed; he returned, and the love of his people had borne him to the capital. He wished now for an honourable tranquillity, and to render the restoration of the imperial throne a guarantee for the peace of Europe. All nations had had enough of glory; a nobler arena was now opened to sovereigns; and he would be the first to descend into it. After having exhibited to the world the spectacle of great battles, now was the time to exhibit no other rivalry than that of diffusing the advantages of peace, and contributing to the felicity of nations. His secretary for foreign affairs sent a circular despatch, expressing the same sentiments to the ministers of the allies; but the couriers, bearing the letter and despatch, were stopped, and their despatches seized and forwarded to Vienna. About the same time, Napoleon discovered that Metternich and Fouché were intriguing; and he intercepted a letter to the latter—wishing him, if he were disposed to agree to the expulsion of Napoleon from France, and his entire exclusion from power, to send an agent to Bâle, where M. Werner, an agent of the allies, would meet him. The emperor resolved to send M. Fleury de Chabillon to Bâle to assume the character of Fouché's agent; and from this source he learnt the firm determination of the allies to enter into no terms with him, short of his final abdication. That result was held to be indispensable, as his position, at the head of the French empire, was considered incompatible with the repose and security of Europe; and the restoration of Louis XVIII. was quite secondary to this grand object.

Napoleon, thus threatened, resolved to exert all his energies, and to call forth the entire strength of France, to enable him to maintain his position. So reduced was his army by the Peninsular, Russian, and German campaigns, that, when he re-entered Paris, it scarcely amounted to 100,000 effective troops. He commenced his military preparations by restoring to the regiments their eagles, and their numbers, of which they had been deprived by Dupont; he appealed to the vanity of the French, and to their military pride, calling, by ordonnances, on the young to enrol themselves, and on the retired veterans to join again their respective corps. From these resources he proposed to organise three new battalions for each regiment of infantry; two squadrons for each regiment of cavalry; forty battalions, in twenty regiments, were to be added to the young guard; the sailors of Brest, Cherbourg, and Toulon, were drawn upon to form thirty-four battalions of artillery; and 200 battalions of the national guard were to be organised, to do duty in the garrison towns; and thus enable all the regular troops to take the field. Under these measures, energetically carried out by his officers, 300,000 men were incorporated by the end of May; the arming of whom was more difficult than the raising of them, as the arsenals and finances were exhausted. Unfortunately for Louis, though his finance minister had secured part of his civil-list, he had been obliged to quit Paris without the money in the treasury, which, with the balances due from the receiver-general, amounted to about 40,000,000 francs (£1,600,000). Shortly after, the sale of the national woods, ordered by baron Louis, brought in a sum nearly as large. These sums prevented Napoleon from feeling the money pressure for a short time after his arrival; but the numerous demands for civil, military, and private purposes, soon exhausted the treasury. Then Ouvrard, the contractor, made a loan to the emperor of 2,000,000 francs; 31,000,000 francs were raised from the bankers, on the security of the sinking fund; 12 per cent. being paid for the money thus borrowed; bills of the receivers'-general were also discounted at 17 and 18 per cent. By these means 80,000,000 francs (£3,200,000), were realised before June 4, which enabled the emperor to pay his army, and to set all the manufactories of arms, and other munitions of war, at work, with a greatly-increased number of hands. He thus succeeded in completely arming and equipping his men: by the end of May they were quite ready for the field;—Soult, appointed major-general, having visited the different camps and cantonments, and seen that they were in a proper state of organisation and discipline.

On the 2nd of June that general issued an order of the day to the army, very different in tone and sentiment from that he addressed to the troops at Quiberon, only three short months before. It was admirably adapted to its purpose to rouse the national fervour of the men; to inspire them with loyalty and devotion to Napoleon; and to induce them to believe "that all the efforts of an impious league would never be able to separate the interests of a great people from their leader, him who had been made, by the most brilliant triumphs, the hero of the world." The soldiers responded most heartily to the appeal made to them; and, satisfied with the feeling displayed, as well as convinced that war was inevitable, Napoleon resolved not to wait for an attack, but to take the offensive, not sorry to get away from the chambers, which he could not manage. On the 11th of June he nominated a provisional government of fourteen persons, to conduct affairs during his absence. The following were the members:—his brothers Joseph and Lucien (the former being president); Cambacérès, Davoust, Caulaincourt, Fouché, Carnot, Guadin, Mollière, and Decrès, the ministers with portfolios; Regnaud, St. Jean d'Angely, Boulay de la Meurthe, Desermont, and Merlin, ministers of state. It may excite surprise that Fouché was continued in office, after the discovery of his correspondence with Metternich: it was not with the approbation but against the will of Napoleon. When he was made acquainted with the treachery of his minister of police, he declared he would have him shot. Carnot, however, told him—and all the council were of the same opinion—that “the men of the Revolution only allowed him to reign, because they believed that he would respect their liberties. If he destroyed Fouché, whom they regarded as one of their most powerful guarantees, the next day he would not have a shadow of power.” He was obliged, therefore, to put up with the presence of Fouché in the ministry, and to dissemble his real feelings. But when, after nominating his government, he was about to leave Paris to join his army, concentrated on the northern frontier, he said to his minister:—“Like all persons who are ready to die, we have nothing to conceal from each other; if I fall, the patriots fall with me; you will play your game ill if you betray me. With me you are safe, but all you revolutionists will perish under the Bourbons. I am your last dictator; reflect on that!” Having made these remarks, he left the palace, accompanied by Jerome; and, passing through Soissons and Laon, reached Avesnes on the 13th. On the 14th his head-quarters were at Beaumont, where he found an army collected of 122,484 men. It was divided into five corps, under counts d’Erlon, Reille, Vandamme, Gerard, and Lobau; the imperial guard under Napoleon; and the cavalry reserve under marshal Grouchy. The number of the different arms were 85,820 infantry, 20,460 cavalry, and 7,020 artillerymen. The number of engineers, pontooniers, sappers, drivers, &c., was 9,184; of guns, 350.

The soldiers, who were already in high spirits at their number, and the completeness of their organisation and equipment, were rendered still more animated by the arrival of the emperor, who, on joining, issued, with his usual tact, a proclamation, well calculated to rouse all their energies, and fill them with a patriotic ardour. “Soldiers!” he said, “this is the anniversary of Marengo and of Friedland. Then, as after Austerlitz and Wagram, we were too generous; we gave credit to the oaths and protestations of princes, whom we allowed to remain on their thrones. Now, however, coalesced among themselves, they aim at subverting the independence and the most sacred rights of France. Are we not, then, the same men?” * * * “Fools that they are! a moment of prosperity blinds them. If they enter France they will find in it their tomb! Soldiers! we have forced marches to make, battles to fight, perils to encounter; but, with constancy, the victory will be ours; the rights, the honours of the country will be reconquered. For every Frenchman who has a heart, the moment has arrived to conquer or die.”

Thus hostilities were on the eve of being commenced in Belgium—a country which, as colonel Maxwell observes, “had, for centuries, been the seat of war; every plain, every fortress, having its tale of martial achievement to relate. Within its iron frontier there were few places which had not witnessed some affair of arms; the whole country was rife with military reminiscences; and it was destined to prove the scene where the greatest event in modern warfare should be transacted. As a country, Belgium was admirably adapted for military operations; the plains, in many places extensive, terminate in undulating ridges or bolder heights; while the surface generally admitted the movements of masses of infantry. Canals, rivers, morasses, and villages, presented favourable positions to abide a battle, and difficult ones for an advancing army to force; while the fortresses everywhere offered facilities for retiring upon, and presented serious obstacles to those who must mask or carry them when advancing.”

The allies had greatly the superiority in the number of troops, but the difficulty had been to concentrate them. The Russian army was employed in Poland, and the Austrian in Italy, where Murat was contending with them for empire. He had commenced hostilities, on the 31st of March, by issuing a proclamation to his army, pointing out the independence of Italy as their object; and, by crossing the Po, at the head of 30,000 men, leaving 20,000, as a reserve at Naples. The campaign was short, but decisive. Driving back the Austrians at first, he was subsequently defeated in every encounter; and at last was obliged to leave Naples, and take refuge at Toulon. His queen was taken on board an English merchant vessel, and conveyed to Austria; and Ferdinand of Naples re-entered his capital (which had surrendered to the English), the day before the battle of Waterloo.—Whilst the Austrians and Russians were thus occupied, and could not be immediately available at the seat of war, Prussia had a large number of men in her Rhenish provinces, chiefly in garrison; and Belgium was occupied by a mixed force—a Prussian army; and one in which British, Belgians, Dutch, Brunswickers, and Hanoverians were blended together, sometimes not in very harmonious union. It was, however, on them and the Prussians that reliance could alone be placed to meet the first shock of a hostile French force; and, by the cordial and unanimous vote of all the sovereigns interested, it was resolved that the command should be given to the duke of Wellington. That general had accordingly proceeded to Belgium, where he arrived on the 5th of April, and immediately began to organise the forces which were placed under his command; prince Blucher being at the head of the Prussians. That army occupied the line from the Meuse and Sambre to beyond Charleroi, the head-quarters being at Namur; and the supplies drawn from Cologne and the Rhine. The army, under Wellington in person, extended from the Prussian right to beyond the Scheldt, their supplies coming from Ostend and Antwerp. Thus the two armies were pivoted on diverging lines; and they had not only to keep open their own communications, but to cover Brussels. Wellington's army was composed of the British, and the king's German legion, 43,236; Hanoverians, 10,447; Brunswickers, 8,000; Belgian and Nassau troops, 28,387: total, 90,070. There were also under his orders, 4,000 Hanse troops, and 12,000 Danes; but they had not arrived when the campaign opened:—the number of cannon was about 200. This army was thus disposed of on the line it occupied:—the right wing, under lord Hill, at Ath; the left, under the prince of Orange, at Braine-le-Comte and Nivelles; the cavalry, under lord Uxbridge (afterwards marquis of Anglesea), round Grammont; the reserve and the head-quarters at Brussels.—The Prussian army, in four divisions, under generals Ziethen, Kleist, Kielman, and Bulow, comprised 141,600 men, and 384 guns.

There are three main roads that lead from France across the Belgian frontier to Brussels: those of Charleroi, Mons, and Tournay. The first was guarded only by troops; on the others, the fortresses of Mons and Tournay, though not so strong as they were before the revolutionary wars, were yet capable of offering some opposition to an advancing force; and the duke placed garrisons in them, and mounted several pieces of large cannon on the walls. His grace paid the more attention to those roads, because he was fully persuaded that, by them, Napoleon ought to advance, and had no doubt that they were those he would take. Not only was that the most eligible route, but the duke had reason to believe, from information received from the arch-traitor Fouché, who appears to have been deceiving all parties, that it was the one selected by the emperor. He expected from Fouché a plan of the campaign; and, instead, he was misled by false reports. "The success of Napoleon," says Fouché, in his Memoirs, "depended on a surprise; and I arranged my plans in conformity. On the very day of the departure of Napoleon, I dispatched madame D——, furnished with notes, written in cipher, containing the whole plan of the campaign. But, at the same time, I privately dispatched orders for such obstacles at the frontier, where she was to pass, that she could not arrive at the head-quarters of Wellington, till after the event. This was the real explanation of the inconceivable security of the generalissimo, which, at the time, excited such universal astonishment." The advance on Charleroi, to the duke's left, took the French on a route comparatively undefended; and Napoleon was very near, in Belgium, attaining success by the same strategy which had often been a great element in his victories—dividing his enemy's forces, and attacking them in detail.

On the 14th, Blucher had his first corps at Charleroi, the second at Namur, the third at Dinant, and the 4th at Liége. On the evening of that day, Bonaparte gave his orders for the French army to be in motion at daybreak the next morning, and to march on Charleroi; general de Bourmont immediately departed, and conveyed information of the emperor's plans to Blucher, who, though he acted upon his intelligence, despised the traitor, and treated him with the contempt he deserved. He immediately gave orders for the concentration of his troops, but it could not be effected time enough to prevent the French crossing the frontier and attacking general Ziethen at Charleroi, who was compelled to retire; whilst the invaders pressed forward, crossing the Sambre at Marchiennes, Charleroi, and Chatelet. Ney was then dispatched with D'Erlon's and Reilly's corps, consisting of 41,000 infantry, 3,000 horse, and 116 guns, to Quatre Bras, a village ten miles from Waterloo, which derives its name from its position at the intersection of the roads from Brussels to Charleroi, and from Namur to Nivelles. Napoleon himself, at the head of 72,000 men, marched to Fleurus, which lies about seven miles north-east of Charleroi, in order to meet the Prussians, who were concentrating upon the village of Ligny, fourteen miles to the west of Namur. Driving Ziethen before him, Napoleon bivouacked at Fleurus that night; and Ney, who had promised in a few hours to occupy Quatre Bras, which the emperor described to him as "the key of everything," halted at Frasnes, with Reilly's corps, to allow D'Erlon's, which was in the rear, to join them; they remained inactive till the next day.

And where was Wellington? Misled by false reports, according to Fouché, which caused him to expect that the campaign could not commence before the 1st of July, and that the right, not the left, of the British would be attacked, his grace was at Brussels, which was the scene of much gaiety and festivity, owing to its being the head-quarters of the British army. In the evening of the 15th the duchess of Richmond gave a ball to the officers; the duke of Wellington had promised to attend, and just as his dinner-party that day was breaking up, the officers being about to dress to join the gay assembly, the duke received a despatch from Blucher, informing him that the French had crossed the frontier, that his advanced corps had been suddenly attacked, and that he might require support. Wellington immediately sent orders to the troops at Brussels to be ready to march at a moment's notice, and ordered the outlying corps to concentrate at Quatre Bras; he then went to the hotel where the duchess of Richmond had collected all the beauty and fashion and chivalry of the city:—

A thousand hearts beat happily; and when Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes look'd love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage bell."

The festivity was interrupted by the sound of drums beating the réveillé, and of soldiers moving in the streets. Soon it was known that the enemy was near, and that the troops were collecting that they might be ready to march to meet him.

“ Ah ! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which, but an hour ago,
Blush'd at the praise of their own loveliness ;
And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs
Which ne'er might be repeated ; who could guess
If ever more should meet those mutual eyes,
Since upon night so sweet such awful morn would rise.

“ And there was mounting, in hot haste, the steed,
The mustering squadron and the clattering car,
Went pouring forth with an impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war ;
And the deep thunder, peal on peal, afar ;
And, near, the beat of the alarming drum
Rous'd up the soldier ere the morning star ;
While throng'd the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering, with white lips, ‘ The foe ! they come !
they come ! ’ ”

The historian cannot describe the scene more faithfully, while he must fall far short of the beauty and elegance of the poet.

The troops put in motion by order of the duke of Wellington, were ordered to concentrate at Nivelles ; he being still under the impression that the main attack would be made on his right : the Dutch and Belgians, under the prince of Orange, and some British troops were, however, at Quatre Bras ; and when Ney arrived there on the 16th, he found the post he had been ordered to occupy already taken possession of. When the hostile forces came in contact, Wellington had barely 16,000 infantry and, 2,000 Belgian cavalry, with twenty-eight guns. Ney had advanced with Reilly's corps only, of 15,750 infantry, 1,865 cavalry, and thirty-eight guns ; he having left D'Erlon at Gosselies, that he might support Napoleon in the expected encounter with the Prussians. The duke visited Quatre Bras early in the morning, and as at that hour the French were not in motion, and he saw no signs of an enemy on the Charleroi road, he rode towards Ligny, to have an interview with Blucher. He found the Prussian general in a windmill which stood between the villages of Ligny and Brie ; and, having made such arrangements with him as circumstances appeared then to render necessary, he returned to Quatre Bras, where Ney had just commenced his attack. A long and severe conflict followed, in which the Belgians behaved very ill : the British and Brunswickers, as well as the French, splendidly. Ney was reinforced by 3,000 cavalry, under Kellermann, whilst the action was going on, and before its close he sent to D'Erlon to join him instantly. As the object was to get possession of the village, the affair consisted of a series of daring charges, most gallantly resisted and repulsed. The battle took place partly in the Bois de Bossu, from which the prince of Orange was driven by the French, and partly amidst fields of tall rye, which masked the advance of the attacking corps and favoured their movements. Formed into squares, the British drove off the lancers and cuirassiers with great slaughter. The chief brunt of the engagement fell on the 44th and on the 42nd Highlanders ; one charge, made while the latter were in the act of forming a square, was temporarily successful ; the French lancers rushed upon them, rode over and cut down two companies, killed the colonel, and put near half the regiment hors-de-combat. A part of the survivors succeeded in forming the square ; those who were shut out formed back to back, and thus they kept up such a steady and destructive fire, that the attacking party were again broken and compelled to retreat. In the Bois de Bossu the French resisted all the attempts of the allies to expel them. But two brigades of guards, under generals Maitland and Byng, arrived at Nivelles from Enghien, during the action ; they had marched twenty-seven miles, and were preparing to cook their dinners, when a staff-officer arrived with orders for them to go forward ; they did not hesitate a moment, but, instantly packing up their cooking apparatus, they abandoned their rations and resumed their march. They arrived at the Bois de Bossu as the French were preparing to deploy on the roads it commanded, for the purpose of intercepting the communication between the British and the Prussians ; the French were instantly attacked by the guards, who, although they had been marching fifteen hours, gallantly cleared the wood, and it was taken possession of by British troops. A few more faint efforts were made by the French, but night approached, the assailants retired, and the victors bivouacked on the ground they had so heroically defended. The loss of the British in this battle was 350 killed, and 2,380 wounded ; 172 were made prisoners. The loss of the Belgians and Brunswickers was, including the brave duke of Brunswick, 1,300. The French had 4,140 killed and wounded.

Whilst this murderous strife was going on at Quatre Bras, the Prussians and French were engaged at Ligny. The French were inferior in numbers, but they made the attack about half-past three in the afternoon, the village of Ligny, the centre of the Prussian position, being the real point of attack, whilst feints were made upon St. Amand, on the right ; and Grouchy held in check the Prussian left, which extended to the environs of Sombreffe and Tongrue. St. Amand was taken by Vandamme's corps, who were driven out by the Prussians, but again succeeded in wresting it from their opponents ; Ligny was taken and retaken three times, and the battle continued for several hours in these villages ; a most desperate house and street fight being kept up. It was a personal struggle, where the rival forces fought man to man, and group against group, without order or discipline. Whilst it continued, the emperor wrote to Ney, ordering him "instantly to envelop the right of the enemy, and fall on his rear;" adding, that Blucher's "army was lost if he acted vigorously," and that "the fate of France was in his hands." Ney was too busily engaged with the British, and could not obey these orders; but the appearance of D'Erlon—who had been recalled by Napoleon from his advance to Quatre Bras, after he had received Ney's orders to join him there—inspired the French with confidence; the Prussians with dismay. The former resumed their attacks with renewed fierceness; Milhaud's cuirassiers spreading great destruction around them; and at length the Prussians began to retreat. Blucher headed a body of cavalry, and attempted to impede the pursuit of the French. His horse was shot and fell, the marshal falling beneath it, and both French and Prussians rode over the gallant soldier and his steed as they lay on the ground—the one dead, the other anticipating death. Blucher was at last extricated by his aide-de-camp, Nostitz, at the moment defeat made him wish for death. "Why have you saved my life," said he to Nostitz, "to bring me into this strait?" His troops were then retreating in great confusion upon Wavre, fifteen miles south-east of Brussels, and he found any attempt to rally them would be useless; he could only follow, and see what steps could be taken to retrieve the disaster.—In this desperate encounter, the Prussian official account states their loss to have been 66 officers and 3,441 men killed; 372 officers and 8,265 men wounded—total, 12,144: they also lost sixteen guns and four standards. The levies from the Rhine, 10,000 in number, dispersed after the action; the total loss to the allies was, therefore, 22,000 men. The French killed and wounded amounted to 6,900.—Of the occurrences of this memorable day, one of the most remarkable was, the marching and re-marching of D'Erlon's corps, when he was summoned by Napoleon or Ney, without joining either: that corps did not fire a shot during the day. Had it been actively engaged, either with the emperor or the marshal, the results must have been much more disastrous to the allies, if not decisive against them.

The retreat of the Prussians was continued on the 17th. In the course of the day a junction was formed with Bulow; and in the evening the Prussian army was concentrated at Wavre. This retreat rendered the English position at Quatre Bras untenable, and Wellington resolved to retire on Waterloo, a village nine miles south-south-east of Brussels, where, something more than a century before (on the 17th of August, 1709), Marlborough had cut off a large division of the French forces opposed to him. In that position the British and Prussian armies would be near each other; and in the evening Blucher sent a despatch to the generalissimo, announcing his "readiness to co-operate in a general engagement on the following day in front of Waterloo, not with two corps only, but with his whole army, provided that, if the French did not make the attack on the 18th, the allies should attack them on the 19th." "We have lost one battle, we must gain another," was the inspiring remark of Gnesenau to his men; and, in a proclamation to his troops, Blucher said, "I shall immediately lead you anew against the enemy; we shall beat him, for it is our duty to do so."—Napoleon had sent Grouchy, with 32,000 men, after the Prussians, with instructions "to follow them up and complete their defeat;" but he does not appear to have come near them. He also dispatched several regiments of hussars and cuirassiers in pursuit of the English, which came up with their rear-guard at Genappe, where the 7th hussars were left to check their advance. They cleared the town of these light troops, after a short and gallant contest, in which major Hodge, who commanded the guards, was killed. But the French were, in their turn, met by the 1st life-guards, led by lord Uxbridge, who charged them with such vigour, that they were totally defeated and driven out of Genappe. The English then pursued their route unmolested, and took up a position in front of Waterloo, on either side of the high road from Charleroi to Brussels. Napoleon followed, and arranged his forces across the same road, in a parallel line with the English, his head-quarters being at La Belle Alliance. In these positions both parties bivouacked on the night of the 17th, and prepared for the battle of Waterloo.

The French army—composed of the corps of D'Erlon, Reille, Dumont, and Lobau, Kellermann's and Milhaud's cuirassiers, Pajot's lancers, and the artillery—amounted to about 80,000 men, (15,800 being splendid horse), with 248 guns. Wellington had 36,273 of the British and king's German legion, 7,447 Hanoverians, 5,962 Brunswickers, 17,724 Belgians, and 2,280 Nassau troops—total, 69,686; of which number 12,500 were cavalry: his grace had only 156 pieces of cannon. Blucher, at Wavre, had Ziethen's, Kleist's, and Bulow's corps, amounting to 86,000 men, and 273 pieces of cannon. There was a considerable difference in the calibre of the troops under the command of Wellington and those under Napoleon. Many of the British were young, inexperienced men, now engaged in their first campaign, and, those who had not been at Quatre Bras, in their first battle; whilst round the emperor's standards were many of his old veterans, who, having been prisoners to one or other of the allies, had been liberated at the peace, and had obeyed Napoleon's call to enrol themselves again. Both armies passed a melancholy night, for the rain had fallen in torrents on the evening of the 17th, and it was impossible for them to find firm and dry ground to repose upon. During the night the wind rose, and torrents of rain, with peals of thunder and frequent flashes of lightning, disturbed the stillness of the silent hours usually devoted to repose; and, though every means was taken to shelter the troops which the limited time allowed, and fires were lighted along the lines, their situation was the reverse of agreeable. The duke of Wellington, the general officers, and their respective staffs, occupied the village of Waterloo. Napoleon passed the night in a farmhouse, on the Brussels and Charleroi road, about half a league from the château of Hougomont, and La Haye Sainte, and a quarter of a league from La Belle Alliance and Planchenoit. It had been abandoned by the owner, M. Bouqueau, on the advance of the troops; but the furniture, &c., had not been removed, and supper was served up to the emperor and his staff upon the old man's (he was eighty years of age) table, and in his plates and dishes. "Bonaparte" (we copy from the French) "slept in the best chamber, where a bed, with blue silk hangings and gold fringe, was put up for him. His brother Jerome, the duke of Bassano, and several generals, lodged in the other chambers. All the adjacent buildings, gardens, meadows, and enclosures, were crowded with military and horses."

The battle-field of the 18th of June was selected by the duke of Wellington; who, when at Brussels in the previous September, had examined the spot, and made a memorandum that "the entrance to the forest of Soignies, by the high road which leads to Brussels from Binch, Charleroi, and Namur," was an advantageous position for an army. Blucher wished to have passed beyond Brussels before fighting, but the duke's plan, to halt on the south side of that city, and arrest the march of the enemy, was, undoubtedly, the most judicious. The site, now known as "the field of Waterloo," extends about two miles from the old château of Hougomont, to the extremity of the hamlet of La Haye: the Brussels and Charleroi road runs through its centre. The British army was posted on the crest of a range of gentle eminences or undulations, which intersected the road at right angles. There was one great advantage in this position, that, whilst the infantry would be partly screened from the enemy's fire, the artillery completely commanded the slope in front, by which the enemy must advance. There Wellington disposed of his men in the following order:—The farmhouse of La Haye Sainte, about 200 yards in front of the left centre, was defended by Best's Hanoverian battalion; Byng's brigade of guards, with some Nassau riflemen, held the chateau of Hougomont on the right. The duke of Wellington considered this as the strongest point in the whole position, and had it considerably strengthened, barricades being thrown up, and the walls perforated with loopholes, to permit the defenders to have the free use of their fire-arms. Ompteda and Kilmansegge's German and Hanoverian brigades were in the centre; Picton's and Perponcher's divisions, with Vivian's and Vandeleur's horse, were on the left; Alten's, Cooke's, and Clinton's divisions, with Chasse's Belgians, were on the right; the cavalry, except Vivian's and Vandeleur's brigades, formed the second line, Ponsonby being on the left, and Somerset, Dornberg, Arentschildt, and Grant on the right. Collaert's Dutch-Belgian cavalry division, Olfermann's Brunswick corps, and Lambert's British brigade, formed the reserve. A part of general Hill's corps, 7,000 strong, was stationed at Halle, six miles to the right, in order to cover the great road between Brussels and Mons.

Napoleon's army was posted on a line of ridges, opposite to, and nearly parallel with, that occupied by the British; the right resting on Planchenoit, a village of some extent, and nearly surrounded with three enclosures, which afforded most eligible means of defence. D'Erlon, with the first corps, occupied the right; Reille, with the second, was on the left; Jerome's division was in front of Hougomont. Lobau, with the 6th corps, was in the second line; the cavalry was all ranged in the rear of the infantry; and the guards still further in the rear, beside the great road. Napoleon himself took his position on a height, beside the farmhouse of La Belle Alliance. There a chair and table were placed for him upon straw, spread out like a carpet: his charts, telescopes, and writing materials being scattered around. He took great pains to marshal his troops to military music; and "never had men been animated with such spirits, or taken up their ground with such precision. The earth seemed proud of being trodden by such combatants"—so he afterwards said, at St. Helena. As the French had the greatest number of cannon, the commanding position of the heights, which enabled them to play on the British guns, countervailed the advantage which the latter had, in sweeping the plain and slopes, as the French advanced to the attack. The space between the two armies was open and unenclosed; the French had an open country at their back, favourable for retreat; whilst, if the British were worsted, they would have had to retire by the forest of Soignies, very unfavourable to artillery.

The British were quite prepared to receive the attack, which Wellington felt convinced would be made early in the morning; but it was eleven o'clock before the signal was given to commence the action, by firing a gun from the centre of the French position. Jerome immediately advanced, at the head of 6,000 men, on Hougomont; and the battle, that decided the fate of the emperor, commenced. The British cannon opened on the advancing column, and the fighting soon became general. Hougomont was composed of an old tower, a chapel, and a number of offices; a garden, inclosed by a high strong brick wall, and round the garden a wood of beech, an orchard, and a hedge that concealed the wall: in another part there was a pond, which served as a moat. It was the key of the duke's position, and was the object of repeated attacks, all of which were beaten off. As the assailants advanced, they were covered by the fire of nearly 100 pieces of cannon, which was returned by the British guns on the heights above, and fearful execution they made in the French ranks. The advance of Jerome was connected with a general attack upon the British line, on which the French batteries opened a tremendous cannonade; and charges of cavalry and infantry, sometimes singly, sometimes united, were made, and constantly repulsed. The British infantry were formed in squares; and a military historian of Waterloo says, "The fight of Waterloo may be easily comprehended, by stating, that, for ten hours, it was a continued succession of attacks of the French columns on the squares; the British artillery playing upon them as they advanced, and the cavalry charging when they receded."

After the fighting had commenced, Napoleon ordered a decided effort to be made to penetrate the centre of the British left, coupled with an attack on the centre itself, and on the farmhouse of La Haye Sainte. Ney led D'Erlon's corps of 18,000 men, supported by the fire of 80 pieces of cannon, to execute this order; and, if he had succeeded, the victory would no doubt have remained with the French. Picton's division had to sustain the shock of the assault: that division stretched from La Haye Sainte to Ter la Haye. It had an irregular hedge in front, which afforded, however, very imperfect protection, as it was broken, and could offer no impediment to the advance of cavalry. Perponcher's Belgian division was extended in front of the left; it gave way as soon as the French got within half musket shot, and retired, to the great indignation of the British, who could scarcely be prevented from firing upon the men, as they broke, and passed to the rear. The French divisions of Alix and Marcognet then pressed forward, and so thinned the nearest division of British infantry, by their murderous fire, that it began to waver. But Picton ordered up the 42nd, 44th, 92nd, and the royal Scots, who advanced with a tremendous shout; and, under their fire, the French columns were thrown into great disorder. At that moment Ponsonby's division of cavalry, consisting of the 1st royals, the Inniskillens, and the Scots' greys, came galloping up, the infantry opening to let them pass. Their terrific charge completed the destruction of this division of the French force. The cavalry rode through and over their ranks, sabring and making prisoners of the men: in a very few minutes, 2,000 prisoners and two eagles were taken. Ponsonby's heavy horse were shortly followed and joined by Vandeleur's light brigade, the 11th, 12th, and 16th dragoons; and the united force charged a fresh column of D'Erlon's corps, completely shattered it, and made 1,000 more prisoners. The Scots' greys, animated by a desire to arrest the fire of the cannon, under which Ney's advance had taken place, made a dash at the batteries, sabred the gunners, cut the traces of the guns, and killed or hamstrung the horses; thus rendering 40 cannon useless: these heroic fellows suffered in their turn. Napoleon saw the charge, and could not withhold his admiration of "those terrible greys." But he resolved they should not escape unpunished. As they were returning to their own position, somewhat confused from the effects of their recent charge, he ordered Jaquenot's light brigade of chasseurs and lancers to fall upon them, and they suffered greatly in the mêlée. General Ponsonby was killed, and many of his men. But Vandeleur's brigade charged the lancers, and drove them back with great slaughter, enabling the remains of the heavy horse to reach their own lines.

The charge of horse and foot against the centre itself met with a similar result. The left column of D'Erlon's corps, formed of infantry and cavalry, advanced up the slope behind La Haye Sainte, from the top of which the duke observed the movements in the field; his principal post being under a tree, from that circumstance called "Wellington's tree." The French were met by the 79th highlanders, the 28th, and the 32nd, who, cheering loudly, advancing rapidly, and pouring in a heavy fire, compelled the French to fall back. These regiments formed part of Picton's division; and the hero was leading them on, waving his sword, and had just uttered the words, "Charge! charge! hurrah!" when a musket-ball entered his head, and he fell mortally wounded. His second in command, brigadier-general Kempt, then directed the movements of the men, who, supported by a German battalion, and one of Kilmansegge's Hanoverian brigade, forced the enemy before them, down the slope. For a brief space, a diversion was made by Milhaud's cuirassiers, who fell upon the Hanoverians before they could form into square, and nearly destroyed them. Lord Edward Somerset's brigade—the life-guards, royal horse-guards, and 1st dragoon guards—charged the cuirassiers as they were dashing forward, shouting "Vive l'Empereur!" Their progress was arrested, but they were not driven back without a determined struggle for the victory. At length the British prevailed.

The cuirassiers were compelled to retrace their steps, and many of them, forced to the edge of the precipice, were driven into a gravel-pit, and men and horses perished! There was great slaughter on both sides, but the British drove their enemies completely from the field.

There were many other heroic encounters, resembling those of the days of chivalry; in one of which lord Uxbridge, at the head of the 3rd hussars (king's German legion), again beat back a heavy body of cuirassiers, who had attacked the British right centre; Tripp's Belgian carabineers, whom his lordship first attempted to bring into the encounter, having broken and fled. In returning, the 3rd were attacked by fresh regiments of the enemy's horse, and so outnumbered, that they retired behind the squares. Wellington, who calmly observed all the movements from his tree, now ordered up Chasse's Dutch brigade, and all his reserve, just as a regiment of Hanoverian cavalry, who had been ordered to check another advance of French horse, broke and fled, never halting till they reached Brussels, where their appearance as fugitives spread the greatest alarm. Adams's light brigade, a brigade of the king's German legion, and Chasse's Dutchmen, however, met the foe, and drove them from the field.

While these brilliant episodes of the battle took place, the French obtained their only success of the day. They attacked the farm-house of La Haye Sainte, which was assailed, at once, both by the fire of infantry and artillery. The Germans and Nassau riflemen defended it with the most determined courage, and three times repulsed an attempt to carry it by storm. The barn, however, caught fire; and the defenders, having nearly expended their ammunition, were obliged to cease firing, except as a favourable opportunity presented itself for taking off an enemy. The French then made a fourth attempt to carry the post; they burst in the doors, but the Germans defended them with their bayonets. They then ascended the walls and roof, and poured down a fire upon the defenders, who were gradually reduced in number. At last the French made good their entrance, and then they gave no quarter, but bayoneted all the survivors. Having gained this success, Bonaparte held the spot till the last; but it was unavailable for any operations, from the constant discharge of grape and shrapnells from the British guns.

During the day repeated attacks were made on Hougomont; and once Foy's division passed through the wood on the right, and gained the heights in the rear; but it was soon driven back, with great loss, by the Coldstreams and 3rd guards. Irritated by their repeated repulses, and by the terrible slaughter of their men, by the fire from the château, and from the cannon on the heights, the French artillery commenced throwing shells upon the house. The old tower caught fire; the flames reached to the chapel, where many of the wounded had been placed, and they all perished! Still the guards held their ground, and maintained the post. The slaughter was immense: 1,400 of the defenders fell; and the loss of the French, in killed and wounded, is estimated at 8,000 men!

And thus passed the day. The attack on the centre, the left centre, and those on La Haye and Hougomont, varied the onslaught upon the squares, which continued, as we have stated, for ten hours. The resistance offered by that splendid infantry forms one of the most memorable events in military history. At one period of the battle, seventy-seven squadrons of cavalry, filling up the whole open space between La Haye Sainte and Hougomont, were engaged in the assault; and, to protect his men, Wellington withdrew them, as much as possible, behind the ridge. In the interval of the charges, they laid down, to avoid the driving shot, the artillery in front playing upon the enemy. But, as soon as the French horse came near, the artillerymen took one wheel off every gun-carriage, and retired behind the squares; and the infantry, jumping up, poured in a deadly volley, which almost invariably caused the assailants to recoil. If they did press forward, and come in contact with the squares, they were received by the bayonets of the front ranks, and another volley sent them back. The gallantry on both sides was great; but the firmness of the British astonished all the French officers: "they seemed," said general Foy, "as if they were rooted into the ground."

The day was indeed an anxious one for Wellington, who watched with his eagle eye all these movements, whilst he was eagerly listening to catch some sounds, which would assure him that the Prussians were approaching. As we have seen they had reached Wavre, followed by Grouchy, who had been ordered by Napoleon never to lose sight of them. Blucher, on the 18th, marched to support Wellington, leaving Thielman at Wavre, who, with only 15,200 men, sustained, all day, the attacks of 30,000. The defence of Wavre was also a street and house fight; and the bridges over the Dyle were hotly contended for; but they remained, at night, in the hands of the Prussians. Whilst one part of his army was thus gallantly defending Wavre, Blucher, with Bulow's and Ziethen's divisions, was advancing to Waterloo. The troops had to clear the defile, through the forests behind Frischermont, a task, which from the bad state of the roads, called forth all the energies of the men. After several hours' toil, wearied and exhausted, the cry ran through the ranks, that they "could not get on!" But, exclaimed Blucher, "you must get on. I have pledged my word to Wellington, and you would not have me break it. Courage, my children!

yet another effort, and you will gain a glorious victory!" The effort was made, and was successful. Shortly after five o'clock the advanced corps, 16,000 strong, commanded by Bulow, cleared the passes of St. Lambert, gained the rear of the French right, and, marching en echelon, attacked them on their flank. Pushing forward, and pouring in a rapid fire, they drove back the cavalry commanded by general Dumont, and captured Planchenoit, considered the bulwark of the French right flank. Morand, and four battalions of the old guard, recovered the post, and drove the Prussians back into the wood. But the second Prussian corps, under Ziethen, was, by this time, rapidly advancing by Ohain; and, as Bulow's men soon left the wood, and renewed their attack, Napoleon resolved to make one more effort to drive the British from the field. For this purpose, he called the old imperial guard into action: they were formed in the centre, along with eight battalions of the middle guard, with Reille's division on the left, and the remnant of D'Erlon's on the right. Napoleon entrusted to Ney the task of striking the last blow, and winning the victory. The artillery of the guard did not this time accompany the advancing columns; but, dividing, and taking up a position on each side of the heights from which the troops had to descend, they opened a destructive fire on the British batteries. Under its cover the guards began the descent, the emperor addressing a few words to them as they were gaining the plain which ran between the two ranges of hills; to which they replied with loud shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" It was about half-past seven o'clock when these gallant fellows emerged from a field of rye, and commenced the ascent of the British heights; the cannon, from those heights, loaded with canister-shot, discharging round after round into their ranks with the most fearful rapidity.

Wellington had not been unmindful of this movement, and, to meet it, he had the British guards formed on the crest of the hill, with Halket's brigade (the 73rd, 30th, 33rd, and 69th) on the left; and Adams's (the 52nd, 71st, and part of the 95th) on the right. The cavalry were in the rear, ready to support the infantry; and, till the moment for decisive action arrived, the British soldiers were ordered to lie down in a ditch that flanked the road which ran on the summit of the ridge they occupied. Wellington was on the spot, and he watched the French as they made their advance, undaunted by the terrific fire from the artillery, which was at length somewhat checked by the well-directed fire of the French tirailleurs, who picked off many of the gunners. On they marched, Ney's horse being shot under him, and he leading them on foot, and they had got within forty paces of the British, when the duke gave the order for attacking them. The words were scarcely uttered when the men were on their feet, and had poured a volley upon the French, which brought nearly the whole of the first and second ranks to the ground. The word "Charge!" was next given, and the guards rushed on at double-quick time. "At that moment the setting sun, as if a partner in their triumph, for the first time on that eventful day, burst through the surrounding clouds, and gleamed with happy omen on the British bayonets as they rushed forwards. Nor horse nor foot could stand before that triumphant onset. Wellington himself rode among the foremost, directing every movement, and so regardless of his own safety as to call forth the remonstrances of those around him. So much had his exertions during the day exposed him to the enemy's fire, that the greater part of his staff was killed or wounded; but Providence watched over him, and he was still unhurt. The commander of the cavalry had worse fortune. As lord Uxbridge was quitting the duke, with the intention of leading Vivian's brigade himself, in this its last charge, he was struck on the thigh by a grape-shot, and was forced to relinquish that honour to others. But Vivian showed as much judgment as valour. Vandaleur, who, on lord Uxbridge's fall, succeeded to the command of the cavalry, brought up another brigade to Vivian's support, and the two commanders proceeded triumphantly, scattering the yet unbroken cavalry, preventing any rally on the part of the disordered infantry, and storming and capturing the still active batteries. Even the presence and ex- of Napoleon himself were insufficient to arrest the disorder. It had become a rout. He had struggled to the last; and as our guards and light division advanced, had thrown himself into one of the squares of his guard, in the vain hope that they might yet stem the torrent that was overwhelming their comrades. Presently they too were driven back; and, exclaiming 'that all was lost for the present,' he rode slowly from the field. Wellington pushed forward without halting till he reached Genappe, and there, late at night, he was overtaken by Blucher.* Finding that there was no longer the slightest attempt at resistance on the part of the French, and that the Prussians were in sufficient force to undertake the pursuit of the beaten enemy, in which the British were far too fatigued and exhausted to share, he returned to the field of battle; and, having ordered his army to bivouac on the ground which had been occupied in the morning by the enemy, he returned for the night to his old quarters at Waterloo."†

put himself and staff under the guidance of a Belgian peasant, who, either by accident or design, conducted them and the army into a narrow defile, which led to a bridge crossing the Dyle, when there were several other roads leading to practicable fords. The Prussians came up with them, opened a heavy fire, and captured sixty pieces of cannon, with which the fugitives attempted to defend themselves. The emperor and his staff with difficulty crossed the bridge; but his camp-equipage and carriage were taken. "Many officers and soldiers, preferring death to captivity, shot each other to escape, by a voluntary destruction, the shame of such a defeat. Nine times during this night the remains of the army attempted to resist, and to establish their bivouacs at points easily defended; but as often did the Prussians, animated by Blucher, storm their entrenchments and disperse these masses; without chiefs, and almost without arms."* The next day they reached the Sambre: four days before, a triumphant army of 120,000 men, they had crossed that river; only about 40,000 recrossed it on the 19th of June; and they had with them only twenty-seven guns.

The slaughter at Waterloo was immense. The British had 1,417 killed; 4,923 wounded; and 582 missing—total, 6,922. The king's German legion, Hanoverian, Brunswick, Nassau, and Belgian loss was, killed, 1,530; wounded, 5,006; missing, 2,105—total, 8,641: the number of Prussians killed was 1,255; wounded, 4,387; missing, 1,386—total, 7,028:—grand total, 22,591. The loss of the French was much greater. The British officers estimated that at least 25,000 were killed and wounded on the field; and of those sabred in the pursuit no account could be given. The fine army which was collected the first week in the month was totally broken up and destroyed; nearly all its guns, and a number of its eagles, remaining as trophies in the hands of the enemy. The field of battle long presented a sight most harrowing to every humane feeling. After the wounded were removed, the dead bodies lay for days intermingled with all the débris of the fight—"helmets and cuirasses, shattered fire-arms and broken swords, and every variety of military ornament." And there were far more painful sights than these—mothers, sisters, wives, sweethearts, searching amongst the bodies for the objects of their affections, and "weeping because they were not." In the mass of dead, men of all ranks and nations lay without distinction. The general, the colonel, and the captain lay side by side with the sergeant, the corporal, and the private; "chasseur and hussar were intermingled; and the heavy Norman horse of the imperial guard were interspersed with the grey chargers which had carried Albyn's cavalry." But all except the voice of lamentation was still, and the picture of sorrow and of grief, of death and destruction, which the field of Waterloo presented—all exhibited in fearful colours the horrors and calamity of war, and spoke of the awful responsibility of those who wantonly and unnecessarily plunge nations into hostilities.

But the actors in these scenes could not spare the time to dwell upon them, or reflect upon the consequences—for them action was necessary. Napoleon was beyond the Sambre on the 19th of June. There were two courses for him to pursue: to remain with his army; recall Grouchy; concentrate all his scattered troops; and fall back upon Paris, slowly and orderly, fighting every inch of the way. This was the course recommended by his officers; and, if the country had been with him, it might have yet secured the throne, which had been the great object of his desire. The other course was to leave his army, return to Paris, and be the bearer of the news of his defeat; to surprise and overawe the representatives; seize the dictatorship; and contend in the capital for empire and for life. This was the plan Napoleon resolved to pursue; and, dispatching a messenger to Grouchy—who that morning had repulsed an attack made upon him by Kielman—ordering him to retreat by Namur, he himself set out for Paris, leaving the remnant of his army to follow, under the command of Jerome.

Louis XVIII., by the advice of the duke of Wellington, also crossed the frontier, and made once more for his capital, having, under the influence of the same judicious advice, been induced to dismiss M. Blacas, considered as his most reactionary minister. On the 25th of June, he was at Château-Cambresis, and there he issued a proclamation to the people of France; in which, after taking credit for having prevented the Bourbon princes from joining the foreign armies, who had been again the instruments of divine vengeance upon the usurper of his rights, he announced his return to his country, "to re-establish the constitution; to apply remedies to the evils that revolt and war had brought upon the kingdom; to reward the good—punish the ill-disposed; and rally round his throne that people whose courage, fidelity, and devotion had been the consolation of his exile." He issued a second proclamation when he arrived at Cambray, in which, asserting that the principle of legitimacy in sovereign power was the most essential fundamental basis of social order; he added, that "he had previously consecrated that principle in his charter, and it was his intention to add to that charter all the guarantees that would be required."

The allied generals lost no time in advancing on Paris. Before crossing the frontier, Wellington issued an order of the day to his army, desiring the troops to remember that France was a friendly country, and that they were to take nothing for which payment was not made. He also addressed a proclamation to the French people, stating that he entered the country as a friend, not as an enemy. The allies were only enemies to the usurper, with whom there would be neither truce nor peace; and their object was, to enable the nation to throw off the yoke which oppressed them. The English general advanced upon Paris by the left bank, and Blucher by the right bank, of the Seine. On the 30th of June, Wellington's light cavalry were under the walls of the capital; Colville's division of British and Hanoverians having carried Cambray by assault; and the guards stormed Peronne la Pucelle on the way: the former achievement taking place on the 24th, the latter on the 25th. Blucher, on his route, masked the fortresses of Maubeuge, Landrecy, and Philippeville; took St. Quentin; defeated the rear-guard of Grouchy at Villers-Cotterets, with the loss of six guns and 1,000 men; and halted on the 29th in front of the French position, between St. Denis and Vincennes. The French troops, in the meantime, had reached the city, and taken up their position, the main army being joined by Grouchy, with his division, at Soissons on the 30th of June.

Napoleon had halted at Philippeville on the 20th, before the Prussians reached that town. There he was joined by Maret, his secretary of state, and by the secretaries of his cabinet, who escaped from the field with difficulty on the 18th, and had not been able to reach him before. There he drew up his bulletin of the battle of Mont St. Jean (the name he gave to his last engagement), for his ministers. It "was full of reservations and half confessions, of intentional confusion in the facts and the results of the battle—admitting a reverse, but yet without acknowledging despair."* There, also, he addressed a confidential letter to his brother Joseph, in which there was no concealment. He acknowledged the disaster which had befallen him to its full extent; appealed to the affection of his relatives, whom gratitude ought to bind to him as well as interest; and added—"Perhaps all is not yet lost. I suppose that, on rallying my forces, I shall have 150,000 men left. The fédérés will furnish me with 100,000 more, and my dépôts with 50,000. I shall thus have 300,000 to oppose immediately to the enemy. I shall draw my artillery with private carriage horses; I shall raise 100,000 conscripts, and arm them with the muskets of royalists and cowards. I shall raise en masse Dauphiné, the Lyonné, Burgundy, Lorraine, and Champagne; but I must be assisted, and not worried. I am going to Laon, and shall doubtless find some forces there. I have heard nothing of Grouchy. If he does not surrender, I may have in three days 50,000 combatants in hand, with which I shall occupy the enemy, and give Paris and France time to do their duty. All may yet be retrieved. Write me word what impression this horrible disaster has produced on the chambers. I suppose the deputies will be duly impressed with their duty in these grave circumstances, and that they will unite with me in saving France. Prepare them to second me in a becoming manner." Thus far the letter was penned by his secretary from his dictation. At the bottom was added, in his own handwriting, "Courage and firmness!—Napoleon."

Having sent off his despatches, for the first time since the 17th, Napoleon laid down on a bed. Soon after Soult arrived with a carriage that had been saved from the general pillage; and the emperor, being awakened, got into it with Bertrand (Soult having proceeded on to Paris), and continued his retreat—Maret, Drouet, Dejean, Corbineau, Flahaut, and Labédoyère, De Canisy, his equerry, and De Bissi, his aide-de-camp, following in two post-chaises; 200 infantry and cavalry, which had come into the town by twos and threes, forming their escort. He travelled by Rocroy and Laon, drawing up at the latter place the public official bulletin of the battle, which did not attempt to conceal the great calamity. That dispatched, he continued his route with all speed, and arrived at the Elysée—which his brothers, Lucien and Joseph, had had prepared for his reception—at 4 P.M. on the 21st of June. There he sent for Caulaincourt, and found that that morning it had been known at Paris that the battle was lost on the 18th, and that France had no longer a grand army. That army, he told Caulaincourt, "performed prodigies, but a sudden panic seized it, and all was lost. Ney," he continued, "conducted himself like a madman. He caused my cavalry to be massacred. I can do no more. I must have two hours' repose, and a warm bath, before I can attend to business." At the expiration of that time, he again consulted with Caulaincourt, expressing his opinion, that nothing but a dictatorship would save the country, and that the majority of the chamber were well inclined—Lafayette, Lanjuinais, and a few others only being against him.

He was mistaken: the chamber was greatly divided in opinion; but his friends were insignificant in numbers, and without influence. His brother Lucien, and Carnot, were in favour of a dictatorship; but Lafayette, Dupin, and other leaders of the popular party, wanted to make the chamber of deputies absolute, as the national assembly had been a quarter of a century before; whilst Fouché was secretly intriguing for the return of the Bourbons. The chamber met the same day that Napoleon arrived at the Elysée; and, after some discussion of the news of the morning, the abdication of Bonaparte was suggested, much to the annoyance of Lucien. A secret committee was appointed, and met at six o'clock in the evening, to consider the suggestion, when Lucien, warmly supporting the cause of his brother, reproached France for not having evinced more ardour, devotion, and constancy to the emperor. He was ably replied to by M. de Lafayette. "By what right," he asked, "is the nation accused of a want of energy and devotion towards the emperor Napoleon? It has followed him to the burning sands of Egypt, and the icy deserts of Moscow; in fifty battle-fields—in disaster as well as in triumph. In the course of ten years, three millions of Frenchmen have perished in his service. We have done enough for him. Now it is our duty to save our country." At eight o'clock the public sitting was resumed. Both peers and deputies met, and a joint committee was appointed, to determine upon the measures required to secure the public safety. The feeling in favour of abdication was so strong, that the warmest friends of Napoleon found it was impossible to resist it. On the 22nd the chambers met early, and it was resolved to demand that the immediate abdication of Napoleon should be given in. At the urgent request of Lucien, one hour was allowed him; at the expiration of which, Lafayette declared that, if an answer were not returned, he would move his dethronement. The ministers repaired to the Elysée with this resolution: Fouché was one of them. When Napoleon heard their message—Regnault St. Jean d'Angely at the same time telling him, that at the expiration of an hour his dethronement would be irrevocably pronounced—he turned to Fouché and said, "Write to these gentlemen to keep themselves quiet; they shall be satisfied." He then retired with Lucien into a private cabinet, where he dictated his abdication—"offering himself a sacrifice to the hatred of the enemies of France." He declared his "political life terminated;" proclaimed his "son, under the title of Napoleon II., emperor of the French;" instituted the ministers as a "provisional council of government;" and recommended "that the chambers should immediately enact a law for the organisation of the regency." His abdication was dated from "the palace of the Elysée, June 22nd, 1815:" and thus, four days after his defeat at Waterloo, Napoleon was again excluded from the throne. In the evening, deputations from the two chambers waited on Napoleon, to thank him for his compliance with their wishes. He received them very coolly, and told them with emphasis, that he resigned the crown only in favour of his son, and that, if the chambers did not proclaim him, his own abdication would be void.

The chambers had no intention, however, of proclaiming the young Napoleon, though at that time the majority of the members were against the return of the Bourbons. But, like most public bodies, they were led by the clever and the artful intriguer. When the deputies met next day, with power in their hands, they appeared at a loss what course to pursue. Ville-

main contended, that abdication was civil death, and that a monarch who abdicated had no right to name his successor. Labédoyère, and a few others, argued, that the abdication ought to be strictly carried out; and, in the peers, Davoust read a report, which took a favourable view of the military resources of France. Carnot began speaking in support of the statements of Davoust, when Ney, who had only just reached Paris, declared they were false, and that it was utterly impossible to resist the allies, who, in six or seven days, would be at their gates. He appealed to his position for the truth of his statements; "for what have I to gain," he asked, "by the return of the Bourbons, but to be shot for desertion? but I owe the truth to my country." In the deputies, Dupin, Boissy D'Anglais, and all the popular leaders, opposed the recognition of Napoleon II. But what were they to do? Were they to have a regency? "No;" said Fouché, "let us have a commission of five members, taken from each chamber, to carry on the government." This proposal was adopted; and it was supposed this commission must be hostile to the Bourbons; as of the five members who composed it, Fouché, Quinette, and Carnot had been regicides; Caulaincourt, duke of Vicenza, was implicated in the affair of the duke d'Enghien; and Grenier, who is characterised as "a good man," was looked upon as a patriot. Fouché had the influence or address to get himself named president of the commission, whose proceedings he directed into the course he wished them to take. As soon as Napoleon heard of what had been done, he saw that he must yield; and he exclaimed—"That infamous Fouché has deceived all." He, however, made one more attempt to retain some of his former power, and not to be entirely laid aside. On the 27th, he wrote to the chambers, offering his services as general, wishing only to be considered "the first soldier of his country." His offer was at once refused.

The armed force that was approaching Paris, and not the chambers, held the fate of France in their hands; and it was well for the nation that it did do so, or the country would have been again distracted by internal commotions. There were Bonaparte, Bourbon, Orleanist, and republican parties, and all were struggling for the ascendancy. The Austrian government was naturally inclined to favour the pretensions of the emperor's grandson; but Wellington had come to the decision, that the best interests of France and of Europe required the restoration of the Bourbons; Austria gave way; Russia and Prussia took the same view; and that was the step which they resolved to call upon the French chambers to take. As the allies were marching on Paris, the commission dispatched envoys to them, to solicit the commander to arrest their march and conclude an armistice. Fouché publicly recommended this step; while he was secretly intriguing with Oudinot and Davoust, who, finding the cause of the young Napoleon hopeless, had coalesced with Macdonald and the royalists—all admitting, that as defence was, as Ney had declared, impossible, they had no alternative but to recall Louis XVIII. They were desirous of preventing the humiliation of a second occupation of France by a hostile force; and Macdonald and Hyde de Neuville were sent to Louis XVIII. to get him to use his influence with the allies to effect this object. These missions had no results. Wellington was resolved to insist on the recall of the Bourbons, as an indispensable condition of peace; and, that condition conceded, he would have agreed to stop short of Paris: Blucher would not. The two armies, therefore, continued their onward march. On the 29th of June Blucher established his head-quarters at the château of St. Cloud; and Wellington, on the 30th, took possession of the château of Neuilly.

The allies took up their positions without any opposition; the French troops, scattered in various directions, retiring upon Paris. Blucher's advanced guard, under general Ziethen, was placed on the heights of Meudon, and in the village of Issy. There, on the 1st of July, they were attacked by the French, who were beaten, and compelled to retire with the loss of 1,000 men: this was the last fighting. Davoust had 80,000 troops in and about the capital; but, under the influence of Fouché, it is supposed, he resolved to capitulate, though the united English and Prussian forces, before the city, were not greatly superior in numbers. Commissioners had been sent to both armies: general Macirone to Wellington, and general Tromelin to Blucher; and Davoust, after the action of the 2nd, wrote to Ziethen, proposing an armistice. The reply was, that a suspension of arms could only be obtained by the surrender of Paris. On the 3rd, Bignon, general Guilleminot, and the préfet Bondy, were sent to St. Cloud, with full power from Davoust, to conclude an agreement for the evacuation of the city by the French troops. By this agreement—at first termed a "capitulation," but which term the influence of Fouché was the means of changing into "convention"—it was stipulated, that the French army should retire behind the Loire, with its field artillery, and all its war matériel; whilst, by the 11th and 12th articles, it was especially provided, that "all public property, with the exception of that connected with warlike defence, whether belonging to government or the municipality, should be respected; and the allies would not interfere with it in any way: individual persons and private property were also to be respected. The inhabitants, and in general all persons who were then in the capital, should continue to enjoy their rights and liberties, without being liable to be disturbed, or subject to any inquiry relative to the positions they occupied, or might have occupied, or to their conduct or political opinions." By other articles, it was provided that the army was to commence retiring on the following day; and, in one week, Paris was to be entirely evacuated.

On the 4th of July, accordingly, the troops began to leave Paris; and, on the 6th, the advanced guard of the allies entered. The main body took possession of the city on the 7th, when Wellington and Blucher, with the British and Prussian forces, passed the barrier of Neuilly, and occupied all the military points of the capital. The entry was a very different spectacle from the first entrance of the allies in March, in the previous year. Then all was pleasurable excitement: "joy beamed in every eye; hope was buoyant in every heart; all felt as if rescued from death." Now, though the allies defiled through the capital, "with a proud step, and beating hearts," the French "regarded them with melancholy and anxious looks. Few persons were to be seen in the streets; hardly any sound but the clang of the horses' hoofs;" and the quick, sharp, regular tread of the infantry, "was heard as they marched through the city."* The Prussians were looked upon with fear and distrust; the English, with more hope and confidence; and whilst the latter—the posts being properly garrisoned—encamped in the Bois de Boulogne; the former established themselves in the churches, on the quays, and in the principal streets.

The allies had wished the chambers to take the initiative in recalling Louis XVIII.; but they seemed by no means inclined to adopt that proceeding. They met on the 4th of July, and the convention was communicated to them; and Garat—after stating, in the chamber of deputies, that the best had been done under the circumstances in which they were placed—proposed a "declaration of principles," which the chamber adopted. The first article shows its tendency: "All power emanates from the people: the sovereignty of the people is composed of a combination of the rights of all the citizens." The chamber published another declaration, in which the members professed to define their position as representatives of the people; to set forth their duties, declare their opinions, and express their wishes. They also voted thanks to the army, to the national guard, and to all that had taken up arms; placing under their protection, and that of all the citizens, the national colours. They carried on their assumption of power, when they must have known, as they would not recall Louis, that they would soon be deprived of it, by framing and voting, on the 6th, fifty-one articles of the draft of a new constitution.

In the meantime, Fouché was taking his own measures, and maturing his own plans. In the evening of the 5th he had an interview with the duke of Wellington, at Neuilly; and when he returned, he told those who were in his confidence, that Louis would re-enter Paris shortly, without any conditions. The king was then on his way to the capital, in the rear of the allies; and, on the 7th, Fouché left Paris, and had an interview with the monarch, at the château of Armonville, near Gonesse. Talleyrand accompanied him; and Louis, for the first time, met the celebrated duke of Otranto. As he had voted for the death of Louis XVI., it was a moment of embarrassment for both, from which they were relieved by Talleyrand, who remarked to the king, that "he had brought to his majesty's feet one who had just rendered the most valuable services, and who had it in his power to render still greater, by saving him from the intrigues and machinations of his enemies." After a short pause, Louis told Fouché, that, in consequence of his past services, and those which he still expected from him, he would retain him as minister of police: a long consultation followed, as to the best course to be pursued. On this occasion there is no doubt that Fouché gave the king good advice. He presented to him a memoir, fraught with moderate counsels, and strongly recommending concession and conciliation. He also urged, that the tricolour should be retained as the national colour, which Louis positively refused to sanction. Before the interview ended, the ministry was arranged. Talleyrand was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and president of the council; baron Louis, minister of finance; De Jaucourt, of marine; Pasquier, of justice; Molé, of bridges and roads; St. Cyr, of war; Fouché, of police; and the duke de Richelieu was to succeed M. de Blacas as minister of the household of the king.

On his return to Paris, Fouché met his colleagues, and informed them that the king and the allied sovereigns would enter the city on the 8th. He added, that his majesty had the best intentions; as a proof, he had appointed him minister of police. M. Carnot charged his colleague with treachery, accusing him of conspiracy with M. de Vitrolles, a known royalist, and with coming to a treacherous understanding with Davoust, to bring back Louis XVIII. "Ah!" replied Fouché, "you have discovered that Vitrolles is a royalist; I thought every one knew that; and the prince of Eckmühl is denounced as well as myself. Carnot had better go and arrest him in the middle of his camp; he may accuse me, too, from the tribune of the chamber: be it so, I await his attack." Carnot urged, that the provisional government should maintain their authority, and retire behind the Loire with the army. The proposition was negatived; and, to prevent any further manifestations, Fouché sent to the duke of Wellington, and advised his grace to take military possession of the palace of the Tuileries and the two chambers.

The Tuileries was occupied the same evening: the Prussian soldiers arrived whilst the provisional government were sitting. Fouché, although the step was taken by his advice, professed great indignation, and drew up the following message to the chambers, which was immediately dispatched:—"Monsieur le Président,—Hitherto we were led to believe that the allied sovereigns were not unanimous in their choice of a prince who should rule over France: our plenipotentiaries assured us so on their return. Nevertheless, the ministers and generals of the allied powers declared yesterday, in the conference they had with me, that their sovereigns had taken the engagement to replace Louis XVIII. on the throne; and that, to-day or to-morrow, he was to make his public entry into the capital. Foreign troops have just now come to occupy the seat of government in the Tuileries. In this state of affairs, we can only offer up our prayers for our country; and, our deliberations being no longer free, we think it our duty to separate." Both peers and deputies were sitting when this message was communicated: the former separated in silence. The deputies were discussing the constitution, and the question of the hereditary peerage connected with it, when the message arrived. On its being read, M. Manuel said—"We will not separate; we must do our duty, and continue our deliberations;" adding, in the far-famed words of Mirabeau—"We are here by the will of the people, and we will not quit but by the force of bayonets." His speech was loudly applauded; the discussion of the constitution was resumed, and continued till six o'clock; then M. Lanjuinais, the president, adjourned the sitting to the next day. This occasioned a loud outcry; and a deputy exclaimed—"You adjourn until to-morrow, because you think that to-morrow an armed force will have possession of this room, and prevent us from assembling." "I do not think so," said M. Lanjuinais. They returned at eight o'clock the following morning, and found that British soldiers had taken possession of the chambers; and the officer in command told them, he had orders to prevent their entering.

During those two days, the 6th and 7th of July, the duke of Wellington found it a difficult matter to restrain the Prussians from destroying all the monuments of Paris, intended to perpetuate the memory of the French victories in the previous war. The bridge of Jena and the pillar of Austerlitz were particularly obnoxious to them. Under the orders of Blücher, preparations were made for blowing up the former; and the Prussian soldiers were only prevented from destroying the bridge by the strenuous interference of the commander-in-chief.

On the 8th of July, Louis XVIII. once more entered Paris, and proceeded to the Tuileries. He was surrounded by a foreign soldiery, by whom all the posts, streets, bridges, and gardens were occupied; and there was a general manifestation of the most melancholy feeling, on the part of the people, at thus having their monarch forced upon them by hostile hands; not unmingled with the expression of indignant ones towards those who had rendered such a consummation unavoidable. The same day, the minister of police declared that the provisional government was dissolved; the next, the names of the new ministry were published, and the second restoration of Louis XVIII. to the throne of his ancestors was complete. It differed widely in character from the first. That "was accomplished in the presence of the foreigner, but without his taking a direct part in it. This was effected under the influence of the duke of Wellington; but, truth requires it to be said, that the influence of the foreigner was at that time far from being anti-liberal. Alexander contributed in a great degree towards the concession of the charter; and the duke of Wellington determined the first constitutional measures of Louis XVIII. at St. Denis. Some days afterwards the royalist party exerted its influence on the sovereigns, and their opinions became violent against the revolution."*

Before we trace the future history of the restored Bourbons, let us glance at the last days of Napoleon in Europe.—After his abdication, he took up his residence at Malmaison, where none but melancholy recollections pressed upon him. Everything there reminded him of one who had been faithful to him till death, though he had discarded her for the sake of a royal alliance, which did not increase his happiness; and the bitter reflection was added, that she for whom he had forsaken Josephine, now appeared willing to abandon him in the days of his defeat and disgrace. He remained at Malmaison six days, his own wish being to embark for America; and the provisional government offered every facility in their power to enable him to do so. They sent general Becker to escort him to Rochefort, from which port it was thought he might embark for the west. He left Malmaison on the 29th of June, and arrived at Rochefort on the 3rd of July; and soon found that the British cruisers kept such strict watch on the port, that he had no chance of getting away. It is doubtful, when Napoleon first arrived at Rochefort, whether he did not contemplate once more resuming his imperial functions. He had travelled from Malmaison with all the pomp of an emperor, an immense number of carriages following him, in which he had collected the spoils of the palace he had just left, and of others that were within reach; and, on his route, he received proofs of attachment from both troops and people. He remained, balancing various schemes in his mind, from the 3rd to the 12th of July: on that day he received intelligence of the dissolution of the provisional government and the chambers, and of the entrance of Louis XVIII. into Paris. He then appeared to have made up his mind, if he could not cross the Atlantic, to "throw himself," as he expressed it, "on the generosity of the English." The Bellerophon, captain Maitland, was cruising off Rochefort; and Napoleon sent Las Casas and Savary to the captain, to solicit leave to proceed to America, either in a French or a neutral vessel. Captain Maitland replied, that "his instructions forbade him to comply with this request; but, if Napoleon chose to proceed to England, he would take him there on board the Bellerophon, without, however, entering into any promise as to the reception he might meet with, he being totally ignorant of what the intentions of the British government were as to his future destination." Napoleon then wrote the following letter to the prince-regent:—

"Your royal highness,—Struck at by the factions which divide my country, and by the hostility of the great powers of Europe, I have terminated my political career; and I have, like Themistocles, to place myself beside the hearth of the British people. I put myself under the protection of its laws, and claim that protection from your royal highness, as the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of my enemies.—NAPOLEON."

This letter was sent to captain Maitland, who offered to forward general Gorgaud, as the bearer, at once to London; adding, that if "Napoleon went to England, he could not make any stipulation as to his reception. When he arrived there, he must consider himself entirely at the disposal of the prince-regent." Napoleon resolved, notwithstanding, to proceed to England, and to forward his letter to the regent upon his arrival. On the 15th of July he embarked on board the Bellerophon, saying to captain Maitland, as he stepped on deck—"I come to place myself under the protection of your prince and your laws." He was received with the honours due to the military rank of a general, which he was considered to hold, and he appeared pleased with the attentions paid to him on board. On the 24th of July the vessel arrived off Torbay, and the letter was immediately forwarded to London. It is very probable, that if England had stood alone in the transaction, his appeal would have been successful; but she was bound to act with her allies; and, after his breach of the solemn engagement he entered into a little more than twelvemonths previously, it could scarcely be expected that any terms short of those which would absolutely preclude such another violation of faith, would be conceded. On the 31st of July, admiral lord Keith and Sir

Henry Bunbury (under-secretary of state for foreign affairs) arrived at Torbay, and went on board the Bellerophon, for the purpose of informing Napoleon that it was the irrevocable determination of the allies that he should not remain in Europe; and that St. Helena would be his future place of residence, under such surveillance as would preclude the possibility of evasion. At first he remonstrated vehemently against any such treatment, and said it was a breach of the agreement under which he delivered himself to captain Maitland; exclaiming, when he learnt the place of his future residence—"It is worse than the cage of Bajazet." He remained on board the Bellerophon till the 6th of August, when he was transferred to the Northumberland, the flag-ship of Sir George Cockburn. Before leaving the former vessel, he told captain Maitland, that "he had certainly made no conditions on coming on board the Bellerophon; that he had only claimed hospitality; and that he had no reason to complain of the captain's conduct." On the 7th the Northumberland sailed; and, on the 10th of October, the illustrious prisoner was landed on the little rock of the Atlantic, where he was destined to spend the remainder of his life. By a convention, signed at Paris on the 20th of August, between Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, the British government was entrusted with the custody of the exile's person, and proper precautions were taken to prevent his escaping from St. Helena as he had from Elba. Las Casas, general Bertrand, and his wife, and several other adherents, accompanied him; and, if he could have forgotten what he had been, and have stifled the voice of ambition, he might still have been happy. He lived, however, in a constant sea of agitation and strife; resisting regulations which he could not break, and causing a stricter surveillance to be kept over him than would have been the case had he shown himself more resigned to his fate. Sir Hudson Lowe, who was appointed governor of St. Helena in July, 1816, was greatly censured by him for his "tyranny" and overbearing oppression; but, on a fair investigation of all that Napoleon and his friends have written, it really appears that it was his own conduct that caused those exercises of authority of which he so much complained: that Sir Hudson Lowe only obeyed the orders of his superiors, and that not so strictly as Napoleon would have insisted that an officer of his own should have done under similar circumstances. Those orders were, that he should be treated with "all the respect due to his rank as a general," and receive "every indulgence consistent with security against his escape;" and he had every comfort and luxury the isle could afford. Perhaps if Sir Hudson had been somewhat more accommodating, there would have been less resistance. But his was a most difficult position to fill; and the evasion from Elba, and its consequences, were ever present to his mind.

Many writers have expressed their views of Napoleon's character as an emperor—some favourable and others adverse. Perhaps Guizot's is as fair and as true a portraiture as we have met with. "He was endowed," writes the ex-minister of Louis Philippe, "with a genius incomparably active and powerful; much to be admired for his antipathy to disorder; for his profound instinct in ruling, and for his energetic rapidity in reconstructing the social framework. But his genius had no check, acknowledged no limits to its desires or will (either emanating from heaven or man), and thus remained revolutionary while combating revolution: thoroughly acquainted with the general conditions of society, but imperfectly, or rather coarsely, understanding the moral necessities of human nature; sometimes satisfying them with the soundest judgment, and at others depreciating and insulting them with impious pride. Who could have believed that the same man who had established the concordat, and reopened the churches in France, would have carried off the pope from Rome, and kept him prisoner at Fontainebleau? It is going too far to apply the same ill-treatment to philosophers and Christians—to reason and faith. Amongst the great men of his class, Napoleon was by far the most necessary for the times. None but himself could so quickly and so effectually have substituted order in place of anarchy; but no one was so chimerical as to the future; for, having been master of France and Europe, he suffered Europe to drive him even from France. His name is greater and more enduring than his actions, the most brilliant of which—his conquests—disappeared, suddenly and for ever, with himself. In rendering homage to his exalted qualities, I feel no regret at not having appreciated them till after his death. For me, under the empire, there was too much of the arrogance of power, too much contempt of right, and too little liberty."*

As a military man—as a commander—only one man of his day equalled Napoleon—Wellington. The strategical abilities of the former were of the highest order: he had, like the duke, the eagle-eye, which enabled him on the instant to detect a false movement, either on his own side or that of his enemy; and, though the reverse has been affirmed, his conduct at the bridge of Lodi, and on other occasions, shows that he was not deficient in personal courage. But he committed many great and glaring errors—as when he gave battle at Asperne, under such manifest disadvantages. His favourite maxim was, that "the first movement in retreat was the commencement of ruin;" and that frequently rendered him persistent in a course which he knew was doubtful and hazardous.

* Memoirs of my Own Time, vol. i., p. 45.

St. Cyr says that he "did wrong, knowing better than any one in the world that he was doing so; but overruled by a fatality which he felt it to be impossible to resist." His career, till a few months before its close, was marked by a brilliant success, which brought glory to France, and rendered him the idol of his soldiers, and of the majority of the French people: but every other nation in Europe had a right to pray for and contribute to his downfall. As M. Vieusseux truly remarks, if "the French people had a right to choose Napoleon for their ruler, and to be proud of him, the Germans, the Dutch, and the Spaniards had an equal right to dislike and oppose him, for his encroachments on them. Let not our judgments be led away by subsequent occurrences. Whatever disappointments followed the overthrow of Napoleon's power, whatever abuses may have remained, or been introduced since, they cannot obliterate from our mind the fearful recollection of that galling yoke—of that universal system of military despotism—which weighed equally upon every country and every nation." His armies were a most fearful scourge wherever they appeared. One of his own officers, general Foy, thus describes the desolation they occasioned:—

"Similar to the avalanche rushing down from the summits of the Alps upon the valley beneath, our countless armies, by their mere passage, destroyed, in a few hours, the resources of a whole country. They generally bivouacked, and where they happened to halt, our soldiers demolished houses that had stood for a century, in order to construct with their materials those long, uniform villages, which were frequently destined to last but for a day or two. Where forest timber was not at hand, fruit trees of the most valuable kind (such as the olive, mulberry, and orange-trees), were felled for fuel; had our soldiers waited for supplies till the administration of the army supplied them with rations, they might have starved. The young conscripts, transported, by a magic power, from their quiet homes to the extremities of Europe, intermingled all at once with men of all countries; and, being irritated by want and danger, contracted a moral intoxication, of which we cared not to cure them, because it prevented their sinking under unparalleled fatigues. This disorder being considered as unavoidable, it became impossible to fix its limits; and it attached itself to our wars of invasion like a consuming cancer."

This is a terrible but true picture of the horrors which the wars of Napoleon carried into every country of Europe. Who can wonder that, if France mourned, Europe exulted in his fall?

CHAPTER IV.

THE STATE OF FRANCE; ITS OCCUPATION BY THE ALLIES; ADMIRABLE CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH TROOPS; WORKS OF ART CLAIMED AND RESTORED; ELECTION OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES; PROSCRIPTIONS; DISSOLUTION OF THE ARMY; TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF LABEDOYERE; THE PEERAGE DECLARED HEREDITARY; POPULAR COMMOTIONS; MURDER OF BRUNE AND RAMEL; FOUCHE'S MEMOIRS; DECAZES; NEGOTIATIONS AND DEMANDS OF THE ALLIES FOR INDEMNITIES AND RESTORATION OF TERRITORY; THE HOLY ALLIANCE; THE RICHELIEU MINISTRY; THE SECOND TREATY OF PARIS; MEETING OF THE CHAMBERS; TRIAL OF LAVALETTE, AND HIS ESCAPE; TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF NEY; PROCEEDINGS IN THE CHAMBERS; MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE DE BERRI; THE AMNESTY; INSURRECTION AT GRENOBLE; VARIOUS EVENTS OF 1816; DISSOLUTION OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

LOUIS XVIII., once more established on the throne of his ancestors, found himself surrounded by difficulties. There was still an army not reconciled to his return; his ministry was composed of men not adequate to the occasion; his brother and the ardent royalists were urging him to acts of re-action and retaliation; the people were discontented; and jealousy reigned in the councils of his allies. The emperor Alexander was dissatisfied with the restoration, effected under the influence of England and the duke of Wellington, and arrived in Paris on the 10th of July—"stern," says M. Guizot, "and angrily disposed towards the king and his advisers." Under his influence, M. Pozzo di Borgo refused the ministry of the interior, which had been reserved for him; and the duke de Richelieu declined that of the royal household, assigning as his reason that private affairs required his presence at Odessa, where he had resided several years as governor. Alexander was followed by Russian troops; and the allied forces continued, after Louis had taken possession of the government, to enter the French territory, till it was occupied by 800,000 men. Of these, the British and Prussians, 200,000 in number, were stationed in Paris and its environs, and in Normandy and Picardy—Wellington being the first, and Blucher the second, in command. The Austrians and Russians, under Schwartzenberg and Barclay de Tolly, 350,000 strong, were dispersed through the eastern provinces. Another Austrian army, joined by a Piedmontese force, and numbering 100,000 men, was posted between Geneva and Lyons. A Prussian and German corps, of 80,000 men, was in Belgium, and the Rhenish provinces; and a large Spanish corps d'armée made its appearance in Béarn.

The conduct of the Prussian and the English troops afforded a striking contrast, much to the advantage of the latter. But then their country had not been invaded and pillaged by the foe which now lay at their mercy. In Paris, the troops of Blucher were rude and harsh in their speech and manner—in the country, they often resorted to pillage. Wellington's, on the contrary, maintained the strictest discipline; his admirable regulations preserved order and protected property; and, so essential was the service they rendered in this respect, that the king requested the commander-in-chief to summon the principal officers to attend at the Tuileries, that they might be presented to him. After the introduction had taken place, he formed them in a circle, and, stepping into it, said—"Gentlemen, I am happy to see you around me. I have to thank you, gentlemen, not for your valour—I leave that to others—but for your humanity to my poor people. I thank you, gentlemen, as a father in the name of his children." The people of England have a right to be proud of this frank tribute to the humanity of their troops—humanity even more honourable to them than their bravery in battle.

General Muffler was appointed governor of Paris, the national guards and gendarmérie being placed under his orders. His own troops were placed in excellent quarters; and Blucher claimed for them not only comforts, but luxuries and indulgencies—ordering the municipality of Paris to furnish him with 100,000,000*f.* to defray the expenses of their maintenance. This sum was greatly reduced, still the exaction was considerable, and was keenly felt by the Parisians; who had to endure a humiliation even more painful, in the enforced surrender of the works of art, which had been so lavishly plundered from the other capitals of Europe, and brought to enrich the French metropolis, as trophies of victory. The allied sovereigns insisted that they should be given up; and, when Talleyrand protested, and appealed to the 11th article of the convention of the 3rd of July, by which all public property, except matériel of war, was protected, they replied, that the works of art and virtu now reclaimed, had been seized by the French armies, contrary to the law of nations, and were not the public property of France. The students of all nations, who were then at Rome, signed a memorial to the sovereigns, claiming the restoration of the beautiful pictures of Raphael, Titian, and others, which had once adorned the palaces of that city. All were ordered to be given up; and the extent of the plunder may be imagined from one fact. M. Schoell issued a catalogue of the various works of art, in which the "statues, paintings, antiquities, cameos, MSS., maps, gems, antiques, rarities, and other valuable articles," taken from Prussia alone, in the years 1806 and 1807, occupy fifty-three closely printed pages.

Talleyrand, as minister, found that these events made him unpopular with the people, while it increased the enmity of the ultra-royalist party, which rallied round the count d'Artois, and whose members regarded the spoliation, as they deemed it, of the Louvre, with much the same feelings as those which the citizens of Paris entertained towards it. As he did not find that Fouché added so much to his strength as he expected he would do, the prince resolved to dissolve the chambers of 1814, and to summon a fresh legislature, expecting thereby to acquire that support which he found necessary to maintain him in his position. The elections were preceded by a decree, issued by Fouché, forbidding the publication of newspapers, without the authorisation of the police, and re-establishing the censorship of the press. Of this decree Louis heartily approved; but Fouché's colleagues wished to have books and pamphlets exempted from the jurisdiction of the censor. The king was very reluctant to make this concession; at length he complied; and an ordonnance appeared, limiting the censorship to the newspapers and journals.

The elections were not at all favourable to the ministry. By a royal ordonnance, the king made some modifications in the charter, as to the qualifications of electors and deputies: the former were allowed to exercise their privileges on attaining the age of twenty-one; the latter, —whose number was increased from 262 to 395—were to take their seats at that of twenty-five years. The electors chose, in the first instance, "notables," who formed district and departmental electoral colleges, by whom the deputies were named. Had the government evinced a firm and well-sustained authority, it is probable that a majority of the deputies would have been returned in its favour. But the duke d'Angoulême had been sent into the south, by the king, with large power, for the organization of those departments. He there exercised the functions and the authority of the minister of the interior, as well as those of the minister of justice; and, in all his acts, he endeavoured to re-establish the supremacy of the old principles of the Bourbons. The appointments he made were conferred upon men of the most exalted royalist opinions. The ministry remonstrated with the king, and urged the necessity of the prefets, and other municipal officers, being men of more moderate principles. The king, who really wished to govern constitutionally, consented to the cancelling of the duke's appointments, and to the substitution of functionaries to be named by the ministers. Influenced by Talleyrand, the ministry evinced both impartiality and judgment in the selections they made; but the course adopted involved them in disputes with the duke d'Angoulême; in many instances their nominations were disregarded; and, throughout, the ministry evinced such signs of weakness, that the electoral colleges—generally composed of men whose patriotism consisted chiefly in a desire to obtain place and patronage for themselves—thought that more was to be gained by supporting those who appeared likely to obtain, rather than those who appeared likely to lose, power. The great majority of the deputies returned, therefore, belonged to the ultra-royalist party; and Talleyrand found his position, weak as it was before, was rendered more untenable by the result.

Other measures occupied the attention both of the government and the public, simultaneously with those connected with the elections. One of these was the punishment of the most conspicuous adherents of Bonaparte during the hundred days. It would have been a humane policy, and, we believe, a wise one, to have proclaimed a general amnesty, and to have endeavoured to attach the supporters of the old to the new order of things, by acts of clemency; and by showing that, in all the attributes of good government, the monarchy was superior either to the empire or the republic. But the allied sovereigns and the royalists were alike desirous, that an example should be made of the most active agents in the brief struggle between the Napoleonists and the Bourbons; and Fouché—though he and Talleyrand were both hostile to anything that looked like vengeance for the past—was ordered to prepare a list of those on whom it was considered the sword of justice should alight. Several lists were made out before this matter was finally settled; at length, on the 24th of July, two lists were agreed to. They appeared in the Moniteur of the following day; one containing the names of nineteen persons, who were to be tried by court-martial; the other, those of thirty-eight military men and civilians, who were immediately to leave Paris, and reside wherever the minister of police should direct, till such time as they were brought to trial, or ordered, definitely, to quit the kingdom. The nineteen were—Asneil, Bertrand, Bruyer, Cambronne, Clausel, Debelle, Lefebvre, Desnouettes, Monton Duvernet, Drouet d'Erlon, Gilly, Grouchy, Labédoyère, Laborde, the two Lallements, Lavalette, Ney, and Rovigo. Amongst the thirty-eight were Arnault, Arrighi, Bassano, Carnot, Excelmans, Flahault, Lamarque, Lobau, Boulay de la Meurthe, Real, Regnault, Soult, Thibaudeau, and Vandamme. However defensible on grounds of strict legality this proscription might be, it was most reprehensible, emanating from the men it did. When the list reached Carnot, and he found himself put down among the proscribed, he went to Fouché, and said to him—"Traitor! where do you wish me to go?" Fouché, always cool, did not appear to feel the reproach concealed in the words; but replying—"Where you will, idiot!" turned on his heel, and left him. Davoust warmly protested against the measure; observing, in a letter to Gouvion St. Cyr, that, as Grouchy, Clausel, and others, only acted by his orders, while he was minister of war, his name ought to have been put on the list, instead of theirs.

The next measure was the dissolution of the army of the Loire. This corps still kept together in great numbers; and although it was under the lilies, which Davoust, before he retired from its command, had substituted for the tricolour, it formed a body too powerful to be left with the means of acting in concert, at the command of any one disposed to interfere with the then order of things. The allies, therefore, demanded that it should be dissolved. The government issued a decree for its dissolution; and Macdonald, who had succeeded Davoust, on the 1st of August, undertook the task of breaking it up. The men were drafted into different provincial regiments; and in a short time this fine body of troops was dispersed into all parts of the country. One of the officers with the army of the Loire, was Labédoyère, whose name was in the first list of proscribed. He had joined that army after the capitulation of Paris; and, as soon as the lists of the proscribed appeared, he was advised to leave France. He resolved to do so, as it was, in fact, the only course left to save his life; but he could not bring himself to depart without taking leave of his wife, who was in Paris. He travelled to the capital by the diligence, in which there unfortunately happened to be an agent of police who knew him; and, immediately upon his arrival, he was arrested. A few days after, he was brought before a court-martial; and, as the facts which we have already mentioned in connection with his name, were sufficiently notorious, there could be but one result—a verdict of guilty, and a sentence of death. His mother and wife, both royalists, and the latter connected with a known royalist family, obtained an audience of the king, and throwing themselves at his majesty's feet, implored him to spare the life of the husband and son. Louis was inexorable, and refused their request; and, on the 19th of August, Labédoyère was shot.

Talleyrand very much disliked the proscription which the allies and the royalists had forced upon his government. He had, however, a little scheme of his own of a similar character, by which he hoped to strengthen his hands, and place himself, as the head of the ministry, in a firmer position. This was, to weed the chamber of peers, to a certain extent, of some of those who had been most conspicuous Bonapartists during the hundred days; and to replace them by friends and partisans of his own. He also wished to declare the peerage hereditary; and though the king was opposed to that measure, preferring to retain the privilege granted him by the charter, of conferring the peerage for life, or making it hereditary, as he pleased, Talleyrand carried his point. A number of the old peers were declared, in consequence, incapable of sitting in the chamber again; and by an ordonnance of the 17th of August, ninety-two new peers were created. Talleyrand, however, only obtained the privilege of putting a few names on the list. The king, the princes, and princesses, and all the ministers, claimed and exercised the right of naming their own friends and favourites; and when the legislature met, the peers soon showed themselves to be as completely ultra-royalist as the deputies. On the 20th of August, another ordonnance appeared, declaring the peerage hereditary.

At this time, there were parts of France in which disturbances prevailed; and where bloodshed and rapine were the order of the day. The Bonapartists maintained themselves in Maubeuge, Condé, and the fortress of Hüningen, after the battle of Waterloo, and were not put down till many lives had been lost; but it was in the south that the greatest disorders prevailed, and they were caused by the royalists. That party had organised an insurrection in the towns of the south, previous to the 18th of June. Generals Verdier and marshal Brune commanded there—the former having his head-quarters at Marseilles. On the 25th of June, after news of the battle of Waterloo had arrived, Verdier left Marseilles with his troops, they not being sufficient in number to hold the place; and a scene at once terrible and disgraceful, ensued. The populace immediately rose, and massacred, indiscriminately, all they supposed to be tainted with Napoleonism. Their first victims were some Egyptians and Mamelukes, who had followed the French from Egypt fifteen years before, and had a refuge afforded them at Marseilles—men, women, and children, all were destroyed! Then the imperialists of their own country suffered: the night of the 25th, and the entire day of the 26th of June being spent in the commission of murder and pillage. At length, a body of men collected together, procured arms, and—assassins being always cowards—succeeded, with the loss of a few lives, in preserving the town from absolute ruin. General Verdier retired to Toulon. Marshal Brune, who was at the head of 7,000 men, resigned his command, early in July, to the marquis de la Rivière, who was sent down to supersede him by the government of Louis XVIII. He left his head-quarters for Paris; but he had, with or without reason, created many enemies amongst the royalists, and reports were circulated, that he intended to join the army of the Loire, and would return to the south at its head, to renew the war. It was also reported, that he was the man who bore the head of the princess Lamballe, on a pike, through the streets of Paris, when that lady was so cruelly murdered in 1792. This was an infamous calumny, but it had the effect of inflaming the public mind against the marshal. He passed through Aix, and proceeded to Avignon, arriving at the latter town on the 2nd of August. The news that he was at the hôtel soon spread; and an infuriated mob at once proceeded thither. The national guard, with the mayor at their head, aware of the feeling amongst the populace, had been beforehand with them, and surrounded the building. The assailants could not force their way through the guard; and, on the other hand, it was found equally impossible to make way for the marshal's carriage through the mob. At length, a shout announced that a means of entrance to the hôtel had been found. Some ruffians passed by a row of adjoining houses to the roof, obtained an entrance in that direction, and shot the marshal in his room. His body was thrown into the Rhone, from whence no one dared extricate it; but, a few days after, it was cast by the current on a desert island at the mouth of the river, where it was found and recognised by a soldier, who had served under the gallant marshal; and he secretly committed it to the grave.

Marseilles was not the only place where murder and pillage were committed, nor was Brune the only distinguished victim. About the same time general Ramel was assassinated at Toulouse, and the brothers Faucher at La Reole. The Roman catholics at Nismes, and the south generally, also, who had been greatly annoyed by the law of the empire, which prohibited the forming of religious processions and the performing of religious ceremonies out of doors—as soon as the Bourbons were restored, and the troops which the emperor had generally found it necessary to keep in the south were withdrawn—instituted processions as a means of showing their joy at the fall of him whom they looked upon as their oppressor. They identified the protestants with the imperialists, and commenced a series of outrages, of which the former were the victims for nearly two months, as they commenced at the close of July, and were not suppressed till towards the end of September. It would appear that all the horrors of the early days of the revolution were re-enacted in this district, the perpetrators being royalists, and the victims quiet, inoffensive people, who had done nothing whatever to injure, insult, or offend their countrymen. But religious fanaticism and political zeal—though there is no proof that the victims were especial favourers of the Bonapartes—led to the greatest cruelties. Protestant females were stripped and publicly flogged: at Uzes, the protestants were brought out in couples and shot in the market-place; and, throughout the district, we are told, they “were literally hunted and slaughtered like wolves.” After the change of ministry—which we shall soon have to notice—took place, the outrages were suppressed, but none of the guilty parties were punished; and the principal leader of the mob of Nismes, named Tres-taillon, though brought to trial, was acquitted.

of Paris, and the trial and execution of Labédoyère, with other proceedings which were pending against the Bonapartists, induced Fouché—who, though he drew up the list of the proscribed, was, with Talleyrand, quite averse to shedding blood—to present a memoir upon the state of affairs, urging that an amnesty and conciliation should be substituted for persecution and the vengeance of the law, as the latter were sure, in time, to produce a fearful re-action. “The royalists,” he remarked, “might be the more numerous in some departments, whilst in others the numbers might be balanced, still those attached to the revolution, to its glories, and to those of the empire, when the whole country was taken into consideration, formed the great majority;” and the final result could not be doubtful. Whatever were the former tergiversations of the duke of Otranto, this memoir was in perfect accordance with the principles upon which he had taken office under Louis XVIII., viz., that forbearance should be manifested to the party of the revolution. The king, however, received it very coolly; it also offended Talleyrand; and, as the allied sovereigns were excessively indignant with Fouché, because he denied that France ought to be punished for the spoliations of Napoleon, as it was rather the sovereigns themselves who flattered and upheld him, than the French people, who made him what he was—he soon had not a friend left. The king was very anxious to get rid of him for another cause: M. Decazes had made a most favourable impression on his majesty, and he wished to make him minister of police. This employé—who afterwards became the king’s minister—was, in early life, private secretary to madame Bonaparte, and he then became an active and able magistrate of the court of assizes of the department of the Seine—had, during the hundred days, remained true to the Bourbons; and, after the second restoration, Fouché made him prefect of police. In that capacity, accident introduced him to the king, who was much pleased with his appearance, manners, and zeal; so much so that, in order to continue the intercourse accidentally commenced, his majesty ordered him, as prefect of police, to submit his reports directly to himself, instead of to his immediate superior, the duke of Otranto. As Louis XVIII., like most of the Bourbon family, was very fond of political and personal gossip, of which a man in Decazes’ position might always have plenty to retail, very probably the prefect availed himself of the opportunity thus afforded him to improve the favourable opinion the king had conceived of him; at all events, it was on him his majesty looked as the successor of Fouché.

All this time the allied sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, were residing in the French capital, and negotiations were carrying on by their ambassadors, and lord Castlereagh, on the part of England, with the French government, for the purpose of placing France in a position, which would render her for the future unable to cause the other European powers uneasiness, by attacks on their independence. That government—Bonaparte being defeated and exiled, and Louis XVIII. restored—expected that the treaty of 1814 would be revived, and the status quo before the hundred days re-established. But this was by no means the intention of the allies. They deemed, that the events of 1815 completely annulled the agreement of 1814; and they were resolved to exact from France “indemnity for the past and security for the future.” The different states who had suffered from the wars of the republic and of the empire, all claimed indemnities to replace the enormous sums levied as contributions by the French armies, and for the restoration of the territories taken from them. Thus the Austrian plenipotentiaries required that Lorraine and Alsace should be given up; Spain asked for the Basque provinces; Prussia for Mayence, Luxembourg, and the other frontier provinces of France adjoining her territory; the king of the Netherlands raised his voice for the whole of the French fortresses of the Flemish barrier; the German powers required Franche-Comté and Alsace; and Sardinia demanded Savoy. Thus the hand of retribution seemed indeed to have fallen upon France, which, at the time, had no means of effectual resistance.

While their ministers were discussing with those of France the terms of the new treaty, which was to be the substitute for that concluded the previous year, the sovereigns were negotiating between themselves that famous agreement, which afterwards became known throughout Europe as “The Holy Alliance.” This treaty was signed at Paris on the 16th of September. The preamble set forth that “the emperor of Austria, the king of Prussia, and the emperor of Russia, had acquired, in the midst of the events of the three last years, the intimate conviction, that it is necessary to base the future policy of governments on the sublime truths taught by the eternal religion of God the Saviour.” Therefore—1st. “The three monarchies, conformable to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which ordain men to regard each other as brethren, will ever remain united in the bonds of a true and an indissoluble fraternity;” and “will, on all occasions, and in all places, lend each other assistance, aid, and succour.” 2nd. “The only principle in force, between either their governments or their subjects, shall be to render to each other reciprocal services; to testify, by unalterable benevolence, the mutual affection which ought to animate them; to consider each other as members of the one Christian nation;” and to confess that that Christian nation, “of which they and their people make part, have in reality no other sovereign than Him to whom belongs all power, because in Him are found all the features of love and knowledge, and of absolute wisdom." 3rd. "All those powers who wish solemnly to profess these same principles shall be admitted with eagerness and affection into this holy alliance." This document was drawn up by the emperor Alexander, who, at that period, was much influenced by madame Krudener, a Russian lady who, from being one of the gayest of the gay, had become a religious devotee. She had been introduced to the emperor Alexander in 1814; followed him to Paris in 1815; and there she held prayer-meetings, which were attended by the most distinguished personages of the time, the lady herself wearing the dress of a priestess, and offering up prayer. She professed to believe that wars were to cease on the earth, and peace and good-will prevail. When the treaty became known, most of the other sovereigns of Europe adhered to it; but the prince regent of England, by the advice of his ministers—although no objection could be made to the principles upon which the document was based—declined to join them, on the ground that the treaty, being signed by the sovereigns alone, without the intervention of their ministers, he could not give his signature, as the English constitution forbade him to affix his name to any document which was not signed by a responsible minister.

The signing the "Holy Alliance" was followed, on the 19th of September, by the resignation of Fouché, who was appointed minister to the court of Saxony, and who had become so unpopular, that he was obliged to travel through France in disguise, under a feigned name. The dismissal of Talleyrand almost immediately followed the resignation of his colleague, it being intimated to the king, that better terms might be obtained for France by another minister, as the prince of Benevento had rendered himself unpopular with the allied sovereigns, especially with the emperor Alexander. The duke de Richelieu was then induced to take office, as president of the council, and minister of foreign affairs. As Talleyrand's colleagues retired with him, M. Barbé-Marbois was made keeper of the seals; M. Vaublanc minister of the interior; Clarke, duke de Feltre, minister of war; M. Dubonchage minister of marine; M. Corvetto minister of finance; and M. Decazes minister of police. Of this ministry M. Guizot (who held, under M. Barbé-Marbois, the post of secretary-general to the minister of justice,) says—"It entered upon office warmly welcomed by the king, and even by the party which had gained the ascendancy through the recent elections. It was indeed a new and thoroughly royalist ministry. Its head, recently arrived in France, honoured by all Europe, and beloved by the emperor Alexander, was to king Louis XVIII. what the king himself was to France, the pledge of a more advantageous peace. Two of his colleagues, MM. Decazes and Dubonchage, had taken no part in public affairs previous to the restoration. The four others, MM. Barbé-Marbois, de Vaublanc, Corvetto, and the duke of Feltre, had recently given proofs of strong attachment to the regal cause. Their union inspired hope, without suspicion, in the public mind, as well as in that of the triumphant party." Talleyrand appeared to be very little annoyed by his loss of office. He had a large fortune, a winning address, and never failed in drawing round him a large circle of adherents. He made his palace, at the corner of the Rue St. Florentin, the head-quarters of the opposition; and his salons were the resort of the most distinguished men of the day. In their society he passed his time, frequently indulging in censure on the past, in sarcasm on the present, and in speculation for the future; the effect of all being to gather a party around him, over whom he never lost his influence, and which enabled him again to direct the policy of his country at a subsequent period.

That minister, when he quitted office, had left the negotiations with the allies far advanced. He had consented to very hard terms—the return of France to the limits of 1790; the occupation of the French territory by an army of 150,000 men for seven years; and the payment of an indemnity of 800,000,000*f.* The duke of Richelieu hesitated to accede to these conditions, and his influence with the emperor Alexander obtained some, though slight, modifications of them. A protocol, embodying the terms thus modified, was signed on the 2nd of October; but the diplomatists were very slow in bringing matters to a conclusion. The terms of the protocol were submitted to the congress, which had re-assembled at Vienna; the negotiations extended throughout October and into November; and the treaty was not signed at Paris till the 20th of the latter month. By its terms, peace and amity were declared to be re-established between the allies and France. The frontiers of the latter were restored to the state in which they were in 1790; and she thus lost nearly all the territory conceded by the allies in 1814. It was stipulated that 700,000,000*f.* (£28,000,000,) should be paid to the allies for the expenses of the war; and 735,000,000*f.* (£29,400,000) to various states, as indemnities for the contributions levied, and spoliation inflicted upon them. To secure these payments, all the frontier fortresses were placed in the hands of the allies, and garrisoned by 150,000 troops; Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia contributing 30,000 men each; and the smaller German states 30,000 collectively. The term of occupation was to be limited to three years, if the necessary arrangements could be completed in that term, and was not to exceed five years. The command of this force was given, by the unanimous and cordial suffrages of all the sovereigns, to the duke of Wellington, whom the king of the Netherlands created prince of Waterloo, with the intent "to perpetuate by that title the recollection of his country delivered, and Europe saved." To that sovereign, England gave up all her share of the indemnity, amounting to nearly £5,000,000 sterling, that he might restore the barrier of fortresses against France, which his predecessor had destroyed.

Before the fortresses were garrisoned by the allies, the British troops, which amounted to 60,000 in number, were reviewed in the plain of St. Denis; and the Russian army, 160,000 strong, on the plains of Vertus. Both were splendid displays; "the rapidity of the British movements, the quick fire of their artillery, the terrible vehemence of their charge with the bayonet, being the subject of general surprise and admiration." The Russians were also universally allowed to be a fine set of men. After the review, the duke of Wellington said to Sir Charles Stewart (afterwards the second marquis of Londonderry), "Charles, you and I never saw such a sight before, and never shall again: the precision of the movements of these troops was more like the arrangements of a theatre, than those of such an army; but I still think my little army would move round them in any direction, while they were effecting a single charge."

On the same day on which the second treaty of Paris was signed, the plenipotentiaries of England, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, signed a treaty at Vienna, to which France was not a party. By it, those powers agreed to confirm and maintain "the perpetual exclusion of Bonaparte and his family from supreme power in France;" an agreement which they pledged themselves to enforce by the employment of their united armies, if necessary. The congress at Vienna, before it separated, confirmed the arrangements made previous to the return of Bonaparte from Elba; and settled the territorial division of the rest of Europe, with a view to maintain "the balance of power," and oppose a barrier to any future encroachments on the part of France. Many of the details of the treaty, which was finally adopted, were opposed by England, the only power which did not seek an enlargement of territory. Russia retained her share of Poland and Finland; to compensate Sweden for the loss of the latter, the possession of Norway was confirmed to her. The Rhenish confederation was continued, changing the title Rhenish to Germanic. Spain and Portugal were restored to their old monarchs and their old boundaries; and all the former Italian governments were re-established, except the republic of Venice, which was united to Austria; and that of Genoa, which was annexed to Sardinia.

Ferdinand was re-established on the throne of Naples, which Murat, while the negotiations were pending, made a desperate effort to regain. He had escaped to Corsica, after the overthrow of Napoleon, and there he planned an expedition against Naples. He sailed from the island with a few adherents, to land on the continent, persuaded that troops and people would rally around him. A gale dispersed his little fleet, when off the Calabrian coast, but Murat resolved to go ashore, though he was almost alone. He was seized soon after he landed, carried to Pezzo in chains, tried by a court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. Before the sentence was executed, he wrote a short but affectionate letter to his wife and children; and, a few hours after, on the 13th of October, the sentence was executed. He met his fate bravely, pressing to his lips a portrait of his wife and children, which he always carried with him, as the muskets were levelled at his breast.

While the negotiations were in progress, on the 7th of October, Louis opened the ordinary session of the legislature, with a speech written by himself. He entered the assembly, accompanied by a splendid cortège, of which his brothers and the marshals of the empire formed part; and he read his address with great firmness. The "criminal enterprise," which had interrupted the peace restored to France, under the influence of which "all the sources of prosperity were re-opening,"—and the "convention regulating the present and future relations of France with the allies"—were its leading topics. "That convention," he said, "would be communicated to the chambers, without any reservation, when it had received the last formalities. They and all France would feel the profound grief which he felt on the occasion; but the salvation of his kingdom rendered it necessary." His majesty then detailed some pecuniary sacrifices he had made, to lighten, in some degree, the burthen imposed upon his people. "I have directed," he said, "that, this year, there should be transferred from my privy purse to the exchequer a considerable part of my revenue; my family, the moment they heard of my resolution, have done the same. I have ordered similar reductions in the salaries of my servants, without exception; and shall ever be ready to share in the sacrifices which mournful circumstances impose on my people." * * * "It is to give weight to your deliberations," he continued, "and to obtain myself the advantage of greater light, that I have created new peers, and augmented the number of the deputies;" and "it is with a sweet joy and entire confidence that I behold you assembled around me, certain that you will never lose sight of the fundamental basis of the felicity of the state, a cordial and loyal union of the chambers with the king, and respect for the constitutional charter. That charter—on which I have meditated with care before giving it—to which reflection, every day, attaches me more—which I have sworn to maintain, and to which you all, beginning with my family, are about to swear obedience—is, without doubt, like all human institutions, susceptible of improvement; but I am sure that none of you will ever forget that, side by side with the advantage of amelioration, is the danger of innovation. To cause religion to flourish, to purify the public morals, to found liberty on a respect for the laws, to give stability to credit, re-organise the army, heal the wounds which have too much injured our country, to secure internal tranquillity, and cause France to be respected without:—these are the ends to which all our efforts should be directed.”

These were sentiments worthy a constitutional king, and it would have been well if the chambers had been disposed to carry them out; but the violent spirits amongst both the peers and deputies overpowered those who were inclined to moderate measures, and led to events, the reverse of what they anticipated, but which most thoughtful men concluded would be the result of their injudicious zeal. The first manifestation of the extreme royalist feeling was made when the peers and deputies were called upon to take the oath to the charter. The count d'Artois raised objections when it was presented to him; however, at last he complied, and took it, as did all the other princes of the blood who were present; the prince de Condé had feigned illness, and absented himself, that he might not be called upon to take the obligation. M. Jules de Polignac, and M. de Labourdonnaye positively refused to take the oath, saying it would violate their consciences to do so; they disapproved of some of the political principles involved in it; and with respect to religion, the article on the freedom of worship, they complained, did not make the pre-eminence of catholicism sufficiently prominent. The oath taken, the election of vice-president of the chamber of deputies led to a division, which showed the relative strength of the parties in that assembly. M. Lainé, the former president, whose conduct appears to have won general esteem, was re-elected, by 328 votes out of 346. A larger number of members voted on the election of vice-president. The royalist party, at the head of which was the count d'Artois, put forward the prince de la Tremouille; and the united moderate royalists and liberals, M. de la Rigaudie: the former was elected by 229 to 169 votes. The answer of the chamber of deputies to the king's speech, further developed the feelings of the majority of the members. After some general remarks upon the position of the country, this document proceeded:—“In the midst of our wishes for universal concord, and even to cement it, it is our duty to solicit your justice against those who have imperilled alike the throne and the nation. Your clemency, sire, has been almost boundless: we do not come to ask you to retract; the promises of kings, we are well aware, should be held sacred. But we supplicate you, in the name of the people, who are nearly overwhelmed by the misfortunes of which they are the victims, so to act, that justice may advance where clemency has stopped; in order that those who, even now, encouraged by the impunity they have enjoyed, are not afraid to make a parade of their rebellion, may be delivered over to the just severity of the tribunals. The chamber will zealously concur in the passing of such measures as may effect that object. We will not speak of the necessity of intrusting the different branches of your authority to none but clean hands: in that respect, the ministers who surround you present sufficient guarantees. Their vigilance in its exercise will be the more easily applied, as the events that have occurred sufficiently revealed every sentiment, and laid bare every thought.”

The peers, although their address was more an echo of the king's speech than that of the deputies, were quite prepared to second the measures introduced by the latter, for the purpose of carrying out the above expression of feeling. The first law introduced was one to suppress seditious cries, which was brought in by M. Barbé-Marbois. It defined what were seditious cries, and proposed, that any one guilty of uttering them, should be imprisoned for a period not exceeding five years, nor less than three months. M. Decazes brought forward a second measure—a law to suspend individual liberty, and place extraordinary powers of arrest in the hands of the government. It proposed to enact, that any person arrested on a charge of being concerned in attempts against “the authority of the king, the persons of the royal family, or the safety of the state, might be detained in custody until the expiration of the law;” the termination of which was to be the end of the next session of the chambers, if it were not then renewed. All public functionaries, invested with authority in criminal matters, were to be intrusted with the execution of this law. Under its introduction a humane motive was concealed. The feeling against the protestants, in the south of France, had been productive, as we have shown, of great popular excitement, which led to outrages and massacres beyond the power of the government to prevent or to punish; it was thought that, by imprisoning those whose lives were threatened, they might be preserved from popular vengeance. A third measure, introduced by the minister of war, went to establish new courts, partaking of the character of courts-martial, for the trial of political offenders. These tribunals were termed “Prévôtal Courts.” Each court was to be composed of a provost and four assessors, presided over by a provost-marshal; and it was to be competent to try persons accused of political crimes; such as attending seditious assemblages, uttering seditious cries, or making attempts on the life of the king, or any members of the royal family. These laws did not pass without opposition. Their injustice, and the oppression to which they might lead, were forcibly exposed by M. Lanjuinais, M. de Fontanes, and M. de Chateaubriand—ultra-royalist as the latter, at that period, undoubtedly was; but they were all adopted by large majorities, and were followed by two trials, and one execution, which were the subject of much discussion and irritation, not only in France, but throughout Europe.

After the lists of proscriptions had been published in July, the execution of the warrants of arrest was delayed, passports were furnished to the proscribed persons, and large sums of money were supplied to those who needed them, to facilitate their escape; no less than 459,000 francs (£18,360), being applied to this humane purpose. We have seen that Labédoyère, one of the proscrits, was arrested, tried, condemned, and executed, owing to his wish to see madame Labédoyère before he left France. The count de Lavalette, who, after he resumed his position at the post-office, had greatly facilitated Napoleon's advance on Paris, was warned to escape. Neglecting the warning, he was arrested, and brought to trial, on the 20th of November, on a charge of having "usurped the authority of director-general of the post-office, on the 20th of March; of having sent a letter to Napoleon, then at Fontainebleau, giving him information as to the state of the capital; and with having stopped the departure of all the journals, and all the ministerial despatches." He was found guilty, and sentenced to be shot. On the night previous to the morning fixed for his execution, the 20th of December, madame de Lavalette, her daughter (twelve years of age), and her governess, were admitted to the prison to take a last farewell of the count. When the time for their departure arrived, madame de Lavalette, as was supposed, passed out in great affliction, leaning upon the governess and the child. When the turnkey went to the cell, however, it was found that the count had left the prison in his wife's attire, and that madame de Lavalette remained in his stead. Instant pursuit was made: but the plan—which had been arranged between madame de Lavalette, Sir Robert Wilson, and Messrs. Bruce and Hutchinson, two British officers—was so well laid, that it was unavailing. The count repaired to the lodgings of Sir Robert Wilson as soon as he quitted the prison; and, being supplied with the uniform of an English officer, Sir Robert drove him beyond the walls of Paris in his cabriolet. He succeeded in reaching Mons, and finally took up his residence at Munich, with the permission of the king of Bavaria. The English officers, madame de Lavalette, and the governess, were arrested and tried before the Cour Royale; when the former were sentenced to a short imprisonment; and the latter were acquitted. The excitement, however, produced an aberration of intellect in madame de Lavalette; and when the count, in 1820 (his judgment being then superseded, and his pardon granted), returned to Paris, the pleasure of his return to his own country was grievously damped, by finding his faithful and noble-hearted wife in a state of confirmed mental alienation.

Ney was also one of those whom both Talleyrand and Fouché were very anxious to get safe out of France. He was furnished with passports, advised to go to Switzerland, and had reached the frontiers, when some trivial circumstance induced him to return. He went to the château of a relative, in the vicinity of Aurillac, in the department of Cantal; there he excited suspicion by imprudently displaying a sabre, which Napoleon had given him, and was arrested and conveyed to Paris; where, the marshals having refused to form themselves into a court-martial to try him, he was, on the 21st of November, arraigned before the chamber of peers, by whom he was found guilty of treason. There could be no doubt of the correctness of the verdict, or that, legally, he merited death; but his execution (the Achilles, as he was considered of the French army), was a great error on the part of the government. Efforts were made to obtain his pardon; and it was contended that he was included in the amnesty conceded by the capitulation of Paris. The duke of Wellington, when applied to by madame Ney, who earnestly and indefatigably exerted herself in her husband's behalf, told her, that the twelfth article of the capitulation had no reference to the king or the government of France; it was only intended to protect the inhabitants of Paris against the vengeance of a victorious army. "This interpretation," says an historian, who condemns the execution, "is the only one an unprejudiced person can admit." Care was taken to prevent madame Ney from having access to the king; and a large majority of the chamber of peers (amongst whom we find the names of Marmont, Serrurier, the duke de Valmy, Latour-Maubourg, and others who had been the marshal's companions in arms), having voted for the penalty of death, which Louis refused to commute into one of perpetual banishment, he was shot on the morning of the 7th of December, in the garden of the Luxembourg. With his last breath, he declared that he had never thought or acted treacherously towards his country. Though the duke of Wellington had publicly given the only opinion that appears to have been warranted, as to the construction of the 12th article of that convention under which Paris capitulated, in the previous July, he exerted himself, in private, to save the life of marshal Ney, but without effect. The aristocratic party were too eager for vengeance; their determination was too strong to bring home condign punishment to such of the leaders in the events of the hundred days, as they could get into their power, to be influenced even by the wishes and entreaties of him, to whom, more than to any other individual, they were indebted for the position they then occupied.

What this party really contemplated has never been precisely ascertained. It has been asserted, and very generally believed by their opponents, that their object was to abolish the charter, and to restore the old system. M. Guizot denies that they ever contemplated anything "so extreme or audacious." "In fact," he says, "their views were as unsettled and confused as their passions were violent." If they had had a well-defined policy, they might have succeeded better than they ultimately did; but their direct aim seemed to be, to secure their own predominance, by getting into their hands the entire power of the central government, and by placing that of the departments in those of their agents and partisans. "In the management of their affairs they had their fighting champion, their political advocate, and their philosopher. M. de Labourdonnaye led their passions; M. de Villette their interests; and M. de Bonald their ideas—three men well suited to their parts, for they excelled respectively, the first in fiery attack; the second in prudent and patient manœuvring; and the third in specious, subtle, and elevated exposition; and all three, though unconnected by any previous intimacy, applied their varied talents with unflinching perseverance in the common cause."* During Louis's reign, this aristocratic party really stood between the people and the king, wishing to control both. "It was independent and haughty, often revolutionary in its conduct towards the monarch, and equally violent and ultra-revolutionary as regards the people;† but it was deficient in governmental and administrative capacity, and its measures tended to produce chaos, where it was essential that order and due subordination should prevail.

The chamber of deputies, during the remainder of the session of 1815, was occupied with the law of elections and with the amnesty. Various amendments were proposed, and some were carried, in the former, the effect of which would have been to give the aristocracy more power over the elections. As the ministry were successful in procuring the rejection by the peers of the measure adopted by the chamber of deputies, it is not necessary to enter into its details. The proceedings with respect to the amnesty had a more decisive result. Contemporaneously with the proceedings against Lava-lette and Ney, other actors in the events of the hundred days had been brought before the court. General Monton-Duvernét, who was deeply implicated in those events, had been condemned at Paris; and general Chartrand, who had held an important command in the south, which he abandoned to join Bonaparte, was tried and convicted at Lille: both were shot; they were the last who suffered. Generals de Beth, Gilly, Clausel, and Decaen were saved by the interposition of the duchess d'Angoulême;—admiral Linon, and generals Cambronne and Drouet, were acquitted. The more violent party in the chambers were annoyed at this apparent turning of the tide, which pleased the government. M. de Labourdonnaye, on the 17th of November, proposed—in order to meet the wishes of the former—what he called "an amnesty;" but whilst it professed to establish that conciliatory measure, it comprised exemptions, extending to all that held administrative offices in the hundred days; and all the generals and prefects who took the oath of allegiance during that term, who were to be liable to death, if found guilty in the first degree; whilst those who were considered to be in a lower scale of crime were to be banished; and the property of all was to be confiscated to the state. These exemptions would have comprised, according to the lowest estimate, 1,200 persons, the highest being 1,500; and the proposal filled the whole country with consternation and dismay. The government put forward another proposition to defeat it.

On the 8th of December, the day after the execution of marshal Ney, the duke de Richelieu submitted a projet de loi to the chamber, for according a general amnesty. He said—"The king, by his proclamation of Cambray, had established an amnesty, which he was desirous of extending. He rejoiced that a considerable part of the power which the new laws bestowed upon him was temporary only. He would exercise that power in the spirit of justice, pursuing with severity those whom nothing could correct, nothing conciliate; but extending mercy to such as had only been misled. He had, to give the first example of a mutual and reciprocal confidence, directed his ministers to present a law of general amnesty, which should include all who had taken part in the insurrection of the hundred days, with the exception of those mentioned in the first article of the ordonnance of the 24th of July. Those mentioned in the second article, were to be required to leave France within two months, with the penalty of banishment, should they return without leave of the king. The family and relations of Napoleon, to the degree of uncle and nephew, were prohibited from settling or from holding office, rights, or property within the French territory; six months being allowed them to dispose of such property as they possessed in its limits." Having concluded his statement, the duke said—"The amnesty proposed to you is not new in our annals: Henry IV., whose acts I am proud to retrace, gave a similar one in 1594, and France was saved."

The two measures were referred to the same commission, the aim of which was to incorporate with the duke of Richelieu's propositions the exceptions proposed in the project of de Labourdonnaye. The debate opened on the 1st of January, 1816; and the government only succeeded in preventing their project from being thus deprived of all its graciousness, by a majority of nine votes, when 359 deputies were present. On one point the chamber was unanimous, and the government had to yield:—this was on the question of the regicides, who, it was resolved, should be banished. Thus amended, the projet de loi passed the lower chamber, and no opposition was offered to it by the peers, who were informed by the duke de Richelieu, that the proscription of the regicides was not the wish of the king. As soon as it was passed, measures were taken to carry it into execution. An ordonnance was published, enjoining the proscribed to leave France before the 1st of March. Under arrangements with foreign powers, various places were assigned for their residence, and they were allowed to retain their property. Fouché, as a regicide, was in this list: he was recalled from Dresden, and went first to Prague, thence to Linz, on the Danube, and finally to Trieste, where he died. Before he resigned his office of minister of police, he had married Mdle. Castellane, a young lady of good family: she accompanied him in all his subsequent removals; and, deprived of his honours, and regarded with suspicion and distrust wherever he located himself, her affection was his only consolation. "With a true woman's fidelity," remarks Alison, "she clung only the more closely to him for the desertion of all the rest of the world." Cambacérès, who was immensely rich, Sièyes, Merlin of Douai, Carnot, Thibaudeau, the painter David, and Barrère, whose name was once so formidable, were among the banished; so was Drouet, the postmaster, who arrested Louis XVI. at Varennes. Tallien and Barras were permitted to remain in Paris; and the former lived there in great poverty for several years. Cambacérès was soon allowed to return to France, where he conducted himself with great prudence, and died at Paris in 1824. Drouet, weary of exile, resolved to return to his native country, where he resided under a feigned name, dying in 1825. After the revolution of 1830, the abbé Sièyes was permitted to return to France, and he died there in 1836.

The question of the amnesty disposed of, the ministers resolved, first, to bring forward the measures connected with revenue and expenditure, and then to endeavour to alter the composition of the chamber of deputies, so as to turn the majority in their favour. The "budget," as we should call the financial statement, was introduced early in April by M. Corvetto. The expenditure of 1815 had been 798,590,859f. (£31,980,100); and the receipts had been made to equal it by a loan of 100,000,000f. (£4,000,000), and the levying 54,760,659f., in anticipation of taxes, not legally due till 1817. The expenditure of 1816 was fixed at 800,000,000f., including 140,000,000f., the first war contribution to the allies; and 138,000,000f., the cost of maintaining 150,000 men. To make the revenue equal to the demands upon it, additional percentages on the existing taxes were ordered to be levied during the first eight months of the year. The ministry also proposed that woods, covering 400,000 hectares, or 600,000 acres, should be sold to meet the exigencies of the state, but they were obliged to abandon that proposal. The financial measures gave rise to long and animated debates, and were not passed till the 24th of April. In connection with them, the state of the clergy, who had been despoiled of their property by the national assembly, had also been under the consideration of the legislature. Previous to the revolution, the church of France was the most richly endowed in Europe; subsequently, the clergy had become the stipendiaries of the state—the archbishop of Paris receiving £600, the bishop £200, and the curés from £45 to £50 per annum. It was proposed, that the clergy might receive, for ecclesiastical purposes, any donations that might be made to their respective churches; that all ecclesiastical property, not absolutely alienated, should be restored to them; that they should have the keeping of the parish registers; and that the state should increase its allowance to the church by 20,000,000f. (£800,000) per annum. These proposals, which were not made by the government, excited great alarm throughout the country, and the ministers combated them firmly in the chamber, contending, that to add such new charges to the outgoings, in addition to the enormous burdens imposed by the treaty of Paris, would render a second bankruptcy inevitable. Ultimately, a compromise was agreed to, by which a curé might receive gifts for his church to the amount of 1,000f. yearly; if a larger sum were offered, he must obtain the king's leave to accept it. The state also agreed to add 10,000,000f. annually to the funds for the support of the church.

Ministers having introduced a law to restrict the practice of divorce, which had become very common under the lax regulations sanctioned by the national assembly, the consideration of which they were obliged to defer till the next session, adjourned the legislature on the 25th of April. They then turned their attention to the chamber of deputies, with a view to render it less hostile to the views of the king and the government. They felt that this could only be done by a coup d'état; and, before they took any steps, the ministry itself was modified, to prevent opposition in its own ranks. M. Barbé-Marbois, keeper of the seals, was dismissed, on the pretence that his health did not permit him to attend to the duties of his office; and M. Vaublanc was permitted to retire. The office of M. Marbois was not filled up, the seals being committed, ad interim, to the chancellor, M. Dambray; M. Lainé was appointed minister of the interior. He made it a condition of joining the government, that there should be a uniform franchise, the qualification being the payment, in direct taxes, of 300 francs yearly. M. Guizot went out of office with his chief, M. Marbois, whom he describes, as "one of those upright and well-informed, but at the same time neither quick-sighted nor commanding, men, who assist power by opinion rather than force;" the true mode of assistance, we should think, in a constitutional government.

The government was not, at this time, unpopular with the great bulk of the people. The amnesty had inspired confidence, as the public felt that it was a security against the arbitrary power of the police. But there were several parties in the country violently opposed to each other, independent of the ultra-monarchists, headed by the count d'Artois, and the ministry, which rendered the task of government very difficult. The monied interest, headed by Lafitte, were generally of liberal opinions; whilst the shopkeepers, and middle-class, as generally, were inclined to support the restoration, deeming the monarchical government most competent to maintain order, so essential to their prosperity. The working-classes, in the faubourgs of Paris, were mostly Bonapartists; and such of the old Jacobins as remained, had no difficulty in exciting sympathy amongst them. These three classes—each of which had its organ in the press—were, more or less, opposed to the nobility and the priests; and yet the count d'Artois and his friends had so influenced the elections, as to procure the return (as we have seen) of a majority to the chamber of deputies, more royalist than the king; and when they found that the ministry was opposed to their violent reactionary projects, they applied themselves to organise their party more firmly in the provinces: this was done through the church. A central body, formed from the religious congregations in the capital, spread branches through the departments. To this association, only Roman catholics were admitted; and two members had to vouch for the principles and good conduct of every candidate for membership. The abbé Fraysinnot preached to the members every Sunday in Paris, especially attacking infidel and Jacobin opinions; and enlarging on the beneficial influence upon society, of religion, and the clergy. The count d'Artois also applied himself to operate in the departments, in favour of the extreme principles he adopted, through the agency of the national guard. When named lieutenant-general of that force, it was intended merely as an honorary distinction. M. Vaublanc, however, had permitted him to act as the real commander, and to appoint its officers in the departments, instead of nominating them himself. M. de Polignac was at that time secretary to his royal highness; and he engaged, under the count's direction, in an active correspondence with these officers, in all parts of the kingdom, with a view to secure their influence in support of the views of the majority of the chamber. This was one reason which induced the duke de Richelieu, and those of his colleagues who agreed with him, to resolve to get rid of M. Vaublanc.

Whilst the count d'Artois and his friends were thus endeavouring to propagate extreme royalist principles, and the ministry were considering the best steps to take, to strengthen themselves in the chamber of deputies, an insurrection broke out at Grenoble, for the purpose of advancing principles and measures opposed to both. The friends of Napoleon and the democrats united against the Bourbons; while that house was divided against itself,—the ultra-royalist, count d'Artois, and the liberal duke d'Orleans, being equally opposed to the king and his government. There was a committee of organisation at Paris; and the plans of the discontented were discussed in the salons and drawing-rooms of the duke of Orleans, M. de Lafayette, and other professed "liberals" of the higher classes. It is probable, had the counsels of the more elevated of the malcontents been followed, that the conspiracy would have occasioned some trouble. But it broke out prematurely, and, therefore, was easily suppressed. Grenoble, and the territory around it, had suffered considerably from the dissolution of the army, and the territorial arrangements of the treaty of Paris. Being a frontier district, a considerable force had always been stationed there, which led to the expenditure of large sums of money amongst the tradesmen and inhabitants. The valley, which the fortress of Grenoble commands, extends northwards into the territory of Savoy, which had been reannexed to the kingdom of Sardinia, by the treaty of 1815; and the profitable intercourse that had existed between Grenoble and Savoy had been put an end to by the custom-house guards. The loss of trade and employment had made the people of Grenoble very susceptible to impressions unfavourable to the existing order of things; and the tendency to discontent was heightened by the imprisonment of a number of persons under the new law of arrest; and the establishment there of one of the prevôtal courts. In these latter circumstances, the position of Grenoble only resembled that of other large towns: but, at that period, a man named Paul Didier was residing there—one of those restless spirits who cannot exist without excitement; and who, through various phases of political opinion, had become an Orleanist; his aim being to substitute the duke of Orleans for Louis XVIII. He was a native of Grenoble, where he had held several important offices; and having, at Paris, made himself useful to the duke of Orleans, whose conduct in the chamber of peers rendered him an object of suspicion to the royalists, he exerted himself to unite all the discontented in the cause of that prince, under the name of “liberals.” Professing himself to be the agent of a body, called the Society of National Independence, he put forward Napoleon II., in the first instance, as the pivot round which those who wished to overthrow the Bourbons should rally; so many of the half-pay officers and disbanded soldiers, amongst whom he mingled, being Bonapartists, that he was afraid to mention the name of the duke of Orleans.

So ripe was the population for revolt, that Didier soon collected round him a force reported to number 4,000 men, though many of the liberals of Grenoble, who would have had confidence in an experienced leader, would not follow him. Count Montlivault, the prefect, and the commander of the forces, general Donnadieu, were ignorant of what was going on; and Didier had, on the 14th of May, assembled his followers in the vicinity of Grenoble, without their knowledge. Towards the close of that day, he directed his march upon the city; according to some accounts, at the head of several thousand insurgents; but others say, that not more than 200 followed the tricolour, which he had hoisted. The maire of a village he passed, seeing the body of armed men marching in the direction of Grenoble, mounted his horse, and rode to that city by an opposite route, to inform the prefect of what he had to expect. General Donnadieu collected those members of the national guard and the departmental legion upon whom he could depend, and dispatched them upon the road on which he understood Didier was advancing, in order to arrest his progress. They met the insurgents, with whom they had a brief encounter, which ended in the dispersion of the troops, and their retreat upon the city, followed by Didier and his men. The delay, however, had given time for the commandant, colonel Vautré, to collect his regiment, and they encountered the insurgents as they were chasing the retreating national guard into Grenoble. When ordered to fire upon the insurgents, the soldiers hesitated, and a word might have turned them; but the word was not spoken: one of the officers seized a musket, and discharged it at the advancing rebels; this animated the troops, and they poured a volley into the insurgent ranks, which broke and fled. Didier himself came up with a second division, which was almost as easily dispersed: a few were killed, some prisoners were taken, and the insurrection was suppressed.

If this movement had been properly directed it might have proved very serious; under the management of Didier it gave no real cause for alarm. Such, however, were the exaggerated accounts sent to Paris by the prefect and general Donnadieu, that the government ordered Grenoble, and the department of the Isère, to be placed in a state of siege, and directed that no mercy should be shown to the prisoners taken in arms. The prevôtal court ordered three to be shot, who were executed on the 17th of May. Others were tried by a court-martial, by which twenty-one were condemned to be executed; and the ministers would not listen to any applications for pardon: the sentence was carried out on all, fourteen being guillotined. Didier had made his escape to the mountains, but was betrayed by his companions—he also was condemned to death, and shot. Before his death he was pressed for revelations, but he could only be induced to urge those who had access to Louis, to advise his majesty to banish from France, as soon as possible, Talleyrand and the duke of Orleans.

There can be little doubt that this occurrence at Grenoble was part of an organised scheme; and the conduct of the government, in ordering such severe steps to be taken against the insurgents, was probably owing as much to the discovery, about the same time, of plots at Paris and Lyons, as to the exaggerated accounts received from the prefect and general Donnadieu. MM. Lafayette, d'Argenson, and Manuel, were connected with the machinations at the former city. The information received by the police implicated the latter so deeply, that they advised his arrest. The government feared the evidence, though morally convincing, would not be sufficient to prove legal guilt; and they hesitated at taking a step which would array all the liberal party against them. But certain information was received, that a plan was formed to undermine the Tuileries, which was to be surrounded, and attacked after the mine had exploded; and an inflammatory proclamation was traced to three individuals—Tolleron, an engraver; Pleignier, a bootmaker; and Carbonneau, a writing-master. They were arrested; and, on their trial,—having admitted their connection with the proclamation, which told the people, that “the time had arrived to terminate their misfortunes;” called upon them “to defy the satellites of an odious tyranny;” and assured them that success was certain,—they were found guilty, and executed.—At Lyons an outbreak took place on the 8th of June. The authorities were prepared for it; and the gendarmes dispersed a body of conspirators, who advanced upon the city in the evening of that day. Only eight prisoners were made at that time; but, soon after, upwards of 200 suspected insurgents were seized and imprisoned. By this time the government found that they had little to apprehend from the movements of the conspirators, and they felt regret that the exaggerated accounts received from Grenoble led them to sanction so many executions there. Marmont and Fabvier were sent to Lyons with conciliatory instructions; and tranquillity was re-established in that city and neighbourhood, without any blood being shed.

These unpleasant occurrences were only just over, when the marriage of the duke de Berri with the princess Caroline of Naples was celebrated. The contract had been signed in April, but the ceremony was not performed till the 17th of June. It took place at Nôtre-Dame; and was followed by numerous fêtes and festivals. Great disappointment was felt and expressed, that it was not inaugurated by the discharge of some of the numerous prisoners who were confined in various parts of the country for political offences.

The events at Grenoble, and the abortive conspiracies at Paris and Lyons, apparently threw the king and his ministers into the tide of reaction. The executions at the first-named place rendered them more unpopular amongst all those who called themselves liberals; whilst the party of the count d'Artois, who held their consultations in the pavilion Marsan (the residence of his royal highness), were not satisfied with the severity displayed. Louis did not show any inclination to resort to them for advice; on the contrary, he sought to gather round him such men as Pasquier, Royer Collard, Molé, Barante, Simeon, Mounier, Villemain, Guizot, and Angles—men, says Lamartine, “remarkable by their talents and their prospects, who formed the nucleus of a party, destined to increase and extend, because it took the same position with the king.” Of these men, “Royer Collard was the oracle, however yet obscure, of that active and equivocal sect, which was known later under the name of Doctrinaire.” The rallying of these men round the king, and the evident dislike of his majesty, both to the principles which emanated from the pavilion Marsan, and to the measures which the count d'Artois and the ultra-royalists recommended, caused Chateaubriand to write his celebrated brochure, entitled, Monarchie selon la Charte, in which he maintained, that “all Frenchmen were royalists; that the few who were not must be made so. To suppose that there existed any other opinion was falsehood and madness, as well as crime.” This pamphlet did not cause the government to change their conduct; probably it accelerated the decision upon which they had been deliberating for some time, viz., to dissolve the chamber. This was a step which could not be taken hastily, as it would obviously place the king at variance with nearly every member of his family, and the entire party of the aristocracy, or ultra-royalists. The duke de Richelieu, not unnaturally, hesitated to take this step; but Lainé, Decazes, Pasquier, and Simeon, strongly recommended it. M. Dambray, M. Dubouchage, and the duke de Feltre, agreed with the duke de Richelieu. During all July, and part of August, anxious consultations were held on the subject; and at length, on the 14th of the latter month, the king, having made up his mind, announced his resolution to his ministers, assembled in a cabinet council. “Three months ago,” he said, “I had determined to reassemble the chamber of deputies. Even a month since I retained the same intention; but all that I have seen, and all that comes under my daily observation, proves so clearly the spirit of faction by which that chamber is governed, and the dangers which it threatens to France and to myself have become so apparent, that I have entirely changed my opinion. From this moment, then, you may consider the chamber is dissolved. Start from that point, gentlemen; prepare to execute that measure, and, in the meantime, preserve the most inviolable secrecy on the subject. My decision is absolute.” The ministers who were opposed to, or hesitated as to the propriety of, the dissolution, did observe secrecy; and no one out of the cabinet supposed that such a measure was in preparation. On the 4th of September an ordonnance appeared, re-establishing the Polytechnic School, which had been suspended by M. de Vaublanc. This was a popular measure, and gave great satisfaction. In the afternoon of the next day another ordonnance was drawn out, signed at 8 P.M., and immediately sent to the official paper. It commenced by stating his majesty's conviction, that “the wants and the wishes of his subjects combined to preserve intact the constitutional charter, as the basis of public right in France, and the guarantee of general order. He had, in consequence, judged it necessary to reduce the number of the deputies to the number fixed by the charter. But, to make that reduction legally, it became indispensable to convoke anew the electoral colleges, and to proceed to the election of a new chamber of deputies.” For these causes, it was decreed, “that none of the articles of the charter should be revised; that the chamber of deputies should be dissolved; and that the number of deputies should be fixed, conformably to the 33rd article of the charter,” that is, at 260, instead of 394. The electoral colleges of the arrondissements and departments to remain as fixed by the ordonnance of the 2nd of July, 1815; the former to meet on the 25th of September, the latter on the 5th of October. No one to be eligible as a deputy, who was under forty years of age, and who did not pay direct taxes to the amount of 1,000 francs per annum; and the electors to be persons who paid those taxes to the amount of 300 francs a-year. One-fifth of the deputies to vacate their seats by lot every year.

The information that this ordonnance was sent to the Moniteur, was communicated to the count d'Artois the same evening, and he would have immediately proceeded to the king, to endeavour to induce him to recall it, but was stopped by the duke de Richelieu, who told him, that his majesty had given strict orders that he should not be disturbed. The count predicted that the measure was only the forerunner of the downfall of the monarchy. The duchess d'Angoulême was also very indignant; the duke less so; whilst the duke de Berri made no hesitation in declaring that "the king had acted wisely. He had warned those gentlemen of the chamber," he said, "that they had indulged in too much license." With the public the measure was very popular; and, as it was supposed that M. Decazes had been its great advocate, he was overwhelmed with congratulations and promises of support. "This country must be very sick, indeed," said the minister, "for me to be of so much importance."

There was an exception to the general satisfaction; all the ultra-royalists were displeased; and M. Chateaubriand added a postscript to his pamphlet, written in his usual eloquent and impassioned style, in which he vehemently condemned the measure, and expressed his doubts as to whether the king had given an unrestricted consent to it. This postscript irritated Louis, who was not only vexed at the attack on the ministry, but annoyed at the imputation thrown upon him, as being weak-minded, and wanting firmness, which certainly were not his faults. He gave orders that the name of the author should be struck out of the list of privy councillors; and the loss of the salary of office was seriously felt by Chateaubriand; but he lost none of his influence, nor did his spirits fail him, though he had to walk to the chamber of peers, or ride there in a hired conveyance. He termed his equipage a popular one; and said, "under the protection of the populace which surrounded it, he regained for himself the rights of the working-class to which he belonged;" and "from the height of his chariot he ruled the train of kings."

CHAPTER V.

EFFECT OF THE ORDONNANCE OF SEPTEMBER 5TH; INTERNAL GOVERNMENT OF FRANCE; OPENING OF THE SESSION; STATE OF PARTIES IN THE DEPUTIES; LEGISLATIVE MEASURES; ALTERATION IN THE LAW OF ELECTIONS; FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES; BUDGET OF 1817; DEATH OF MASSENA; MODIFICATION OF THE MINISTRY; DEATH OF MADAME DE STAEL; CONCORDAT WITH ROME; ELECTIONS OF 1817; IMPROVED STATE OF THE COUNTRY; OPENING OF SESSION 1817-'18; LAW OF RECRUITING; LAW ON THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; THE BUDGET OF 1818; THE FINANCIAL CLAIMS ON FRANCE; ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON; SETTLEMENT OF THE FINANCIAL CLAIMS; CONGRESS OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE; EVACUATION OF THE FRENCH TERRITORY BY THE ALLIES; NOBLE CONDUCT OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON; ELECTIONS OF 1818; DISSOLUTION OF THE MINISTRY, AND FORMATION OF A NEW ONE.

THE dissolution of the chamber, which took the country, as well as the royalist party, by surprise, was hailed by the liberals as a constitutional measure, and they applied themselves zealously to influence the elections in their favour. The ministerialists and the ultra-royalists were not idle; and the king, feeling that the election of a majority of moderate men—of men who would neither embrace the reactionary principles of the pavilion Marsan on the one hand, nor those of the revolutionary Jacobins on the other—was essential to the security of the monarchy, exerted his personal influence on the occasion. His majesty wrote to, and had interviews with, the prefects and the heads of the electoral colleges; and is reported to have said to one of the latter, M. Raviz—"France has, unhappily, undergone too many convulsions; it has need of repose. To enjoy it, what is required is, a body of representatives attached to my person, to the cause of legitimacy, and to the charter, but, above all, moderate and prudent. The department of the Gironde, to which you belong, has already given me many proofs of its attachment and fidelity: I expect fresh ones in the elections about to take place. Tell them that it is a good old man, who only asks them to make his last days happy, for the felicity of his children." The royalists acted under the direction of a committee sitting at Paris; so did the liberals. The latter, with all their exertions, soon found that alone they were impotent, and could do nothing against the party of the count d'Artois; they, therefore, united with the ministerialists, and the result was, that the majority of the chamber was in favour of the government. It is said, however, that this would not have been the case had the number of deputies still been 394; but, in striking off 134, to reduce that number to 260, care had been taken to disfranchise those places and those electors which were in favour of the opposition. Thus the ultra-royalists went to the elections under unfavourable circumstances, and it was not expected they would have returned so many members as they did. The number returned who had seats in the old chamber was 184; 76 had not been in the legislature before. Several of the former members could not offer themselves on that occasion, not having attained the age of forty years; M. Decazes was one of these, and the king in consequence created him a peer, as count Decazes.

In the interval between the issuing of the ordonnance, dissolving the chambers, and the meeting of the new body, the ministry, acting with the most perfect concord and unanimity, diligently applied themselves to the discharge of their various duties. In the execution of them they were surrounded by difficulties, arising from the financial pressure, and the distress which prevailed in many of the departments, owing to the unfavourable harvest. In France, as in England and most other countries in Europe, the weather, during the summer and autumn of 1816, had been most unpropitious. Incessant rains had flooded the low grounds and destroyed the crops, and very much injured them in the high lands. Prices rose to an almost unprecedented rate; the holders of provisions kept them back, in the hope of making still more enormous profits; and the distress of the country was consequently extreme. The government met their first difficulty by a loan, which, after failing to obtain in their own country, they contracted with Messrs. Hope and Baring, of London; and the second, by purchasing corn, which they stored in granaries in different parts of the kingdom, and sold to the poor and destitute at reduced prices. To enable them to do this, subscriptions were raised throughout the country, which were most liberally supported by the king and all the members of the royal family. Conciliatory measures were also adopted towards those who were opposed to the government, especially the army. The duke de Feltre was ordered not to be exclusive in the grant of commissions; and the relatives of the leaders of the liberal party unexpectedly found themselves the objects of ministerial patronage. Reviews and inspections of the troops were ordered; the barracks and hospitals were visited with a view to their improvement; and nothing was left undone to attach to the interests of the throne that army, on whose fidelity, it was felt very shortly, the interests of both king and people would depend.

The legislative session was opened on the 5th of October, and the king made, as he usually did, a very judicious speech. Of course the public distress formed a prominent topic, and his ma-

esty expressed his deep regret at it. "Painfully affected," he observed, "by the privations which my people are suffering in consequence of the inclemency of the season, I feel even greater regret at not being able to hold out the prospect of an alleviation of the public burdens. I feel that the first necessity of the people is economy, and I have endeavoured to introduce it into every branch of the public service. My family and myself will make the same sacrifices as last year; and, to enable me to conduct the government, I rely on your attachment to my person and to our common country. Attached by policy, as by heart, to the divine precepts of religion, let us also adhere to the charter, which, without interfering with dogmas, ensures to the faith of our fathers its due pre-eminence; whilst, in secular affairs, it guarantees to all a prudent liberty, and to each individual the peaceful enjoyment of his rights, position, and property. I will never suffer any infringement of this fundamental law. My ordonnance of the 5th of September proves it. In conclusion, gentlemen, let hatred cease. Let the children of the same country—I may say of the same father—be truly a people of brethren. And let my people be assured of my unspeakable firmness to resist the attacks of malevolence, as well as to check the extravagance of too ardent zeal."

When the elections of president and vice-president took place, the government proved its ascendancy; the chosen were all moderate royalists, and supporters of the cabinet, round which, says M. Guizot, all the moderate men rallied, as well as the persecuted of 1815. "Casting aside their quarrels, antipathies, and private rancours, they combined to support the power which promised victory to the one and safety to the other." There were three sections in the chamber:—the centre; the ultra-royalists, denominated "the right;" and the ultra-liberals, who were called "the left." The centre was also divided into the centre-right, and the centre-left. The centre-right were ministerialists;—M. Lainé, M. Pasquier, and M. Bignon were the principal leaders. The centre-left also supported the government on most occasions, under the guidance of M. Camille Jourdain, M. Royer-Collard, and M. de Courvoisier. On the right M. de Villele and M. de Corbière were the most distinguished members; as M. Lafitte, and M. d'Argenson were on the left. Of the centre-right, M. Guizot avers that it "has been misunderstood and calumniated." "One general and just idea formed the bond of the party; the idea that, in the present day, after so many revolutions, society required established government, and that, to government, all good citizens were bound to give their support." "The central left," or doctrinaires, appear to have taken a middle course. They differed alike from those who asserted that "there was nothing in the revolution but error and crime;" and that "the supporters of the old system were in the right;" and from those who maintained, "that the revolution erred only in excess; that its principles were sound, but carried too far; and that it had abused its rights." Denying both these conclusions, but "frankly adopting the new state of French society, such as the entire history of the people, and not alone the year 1789, had made it, they undertook to establish a government on rational foundations; but totally opposed to the theories in the name of which the old system had been overthrown, or the incoherent principles which some endeavoured to conjure up for its reconstruction. Alternately called upon to combat and defend the revolution, they boldly assumed from the outset an intellectual position, opposing ideas to ideas, and principles to principles, appealing, at the same time, to reason and experience, affirming rights, instead of maintaining interests, and requiring France not to confess that she had committed evil alone, or to declare her impotence for good, but to emerge from the chaos into which she had plunged herself, and to raise her head once more towards heaven, in search of light."*

When the chambers were organised, the ministers asked for the renewal, for another year, of the two provisional laws respecting the liberty of the press and personal liberty, passed in the session of 1815. With respect to the first, it was proposed, that "the censorship should be continued till January 1st, 1818." They carried this proposition by 128 votes to 89. With regard to the liberty of the person, the projet-de-loi proposed, that persons suspected of treason or conspiracy, might be arrested and imprisoned, without the authorities being obliged to bring them to immediate trial: the warrants for these extraordinary arrests to be signed by two ministers; and when any one was imprisoned under a warrant so signed, the gaoler who received him, was to send an intimation of the name of the person imprisoned, with the charge against him, to the procureur-du-roi, who was to examine him, and report to the minister of justice. This measure was also carried by 130 votes to 87. The debates were long and violent; the ultra-royalists, who were favourable to the measures in 1815, now opposing them. But their opposition was unavailing; the peers as well as the deputies sanctioned the ministerial proposals by large majorities.

The relief of the public distress next occupied the ministers and the legislature. Notwithstanding the steps taken by the government to alleviate it, that distress was very great, and led to riots in several parts of the kingdom, especially at Château-Thierry, Châtillon-sur-Seine, and in the Pays-du-Dôme, which were not repressed without bloodshed. The chambers agreed to a vote of credit, to enable the government to purchase grain; and a bounty of five francs a quarter was offered on all corn imported. This led to large importations, to a fall in prices, and to the restoration of tranquillity.

Having obtained the renewal of the provisional laws, which would otherwise have expired, and procured the means for relieving the public distress, the ministers deemed it proper to introduce a measure for the purpose of legalising those steps which had been taken to elect the chamber. A project of law on elections was prepared by M. Lainé, assisted by M. Guizot (whose age excluded him from the chamber). This project embraced the provisions of the ordonnance of September 5th, with respect to the number of deputies, and the qualifications of deputies and electors. It also provided, that the prefect of each department should prepare the electoral lists; that every department should have one electoral college, which, where the number of voters was more than 600, should be divided into two sections; and that the college should be presided over by a chairman, appointed by the king, who was to sit ten days to receive the votes. The great change which this law introduced into the previous system, was the substitution of direct for indirect election; and it was defended, on the ground that it made the electoral law harmonise, as nearly as possible, with the charter; and, as the number of individuals who paid the required amount of direct taxes (300 francs), was scarcely 90,000, it could not be considered as too democratic; whilst the electors in each department would still be too numerous to be operated upon by bribery, or undue influence. The ultra-royalists maintained, that the proposed qualification would really place the elections in the hands of the most democratical part of the community; that it would deprive the great proprietors of almost all influence, leaving the immense body of the peasantry, and the working-classes with as little; and thus place the representation in the hands of one class. Both parties sustained their respective views, eagerly, and with great warmth; and the law, introduced on the 26th of December, did not finally pass till the 5th of February, 1817. The ministers succeeded in rejecting all amendments, and carried their measure by 132 votes to 100 in the deputies; and by 95 to 77 in the peers.

The financial propositions—which were first brought forward on the 14th of November, 1816—occupied more of the time of the deputies than all the other measures of the session. The expenditure of 1816, estimated at 800,000,000 francs, reached 895,577,205 francs; and to make the revenue equal to that sum, 69,763,000 francs were raised by loan, and the remainder by forestalling the taxes of 1817. To have defrayed the usual burdens of the year, without any extraordinary payments, would have been difficult; but France, after the exhaustion of a war of twenty years, had not merely to meet the constantly-recurring expenses of the national government, but to find rations, clothes, and pay for 150,000 troops, by whom all the frontier fortresses of the kingdom were occupied; and, also, to raise, in a limited time, a sum equal to between sixty and seventy millions of pounds sterling, as indemnities to the allied sovereigns and their subjects; those of the latter being constantly increased by fresh demands. The finance minister, M. Corvetto, found his task somewhat lightened by the financial skill of M. Ouvrard, whose name became this year again connected with French finance. That financier put himself in communication with the duke de Richelieu and count Decazes; and, by his zealous co-operation, a favourable change was soon effected. It had been customary, when the income fell short of the expenditure, to add the arrears to the rentes; and the creditor, when the stock was under 60 per cent., was entitled to call for immediate payment. M. Ouvrard suggested, that the numerous arrears should be made a permanent obligation at five per cent., till after 1821. This was assented to; and, by the effect on the market, public credit was in a great measure restored. Ouvrard also proposed the conversion of the indemnity to the allies into rentes, or stock; and hinted, that, if they could be induced to take three-fourths of the amount guaranteed, the other fourth might be employed as bonuses, and other ways of remunerating bankers, to induce them to take the rentes, and thus the payments would be secured. This plan was ultimately carried out; and when he made his financial statement in November, M. Corvetto asked for leave to create thirty millions of rentes, which was granted. His scheme, besides this creation of rentes, embodied proposals for doubling the amount of the sinking fund, and applying to that fund the produce of the state forests; all the existing taxes were maintained, and two new excise imposts—a duty on oils, and another on public conveyances—were proposed. Still the estimated revenue was only, in round numbers, 760,000,000 francs, whilst the estimated expenditure was 1,000,000,000 francs; this left 240,000,000 francs to be provided for by loans, and by again anticipating the taxes of future years. The ministerial propositions gave rise to long and angry debates—the ultra-royalists energetically embracing the side of economy. They vehemently opposed the appropriation of the forests to the sinking fund, regarding that measure as a death-blow to the hopes of the clergy for increased support from the state. That proposition was modified, on the 4th of March, 1817, so as to except so much of the forests “as was necessary to secure a net revenue of four millions of rentes to the church;”

and, in April, the ministerial scheme was sanctioned by a considerable majority. Its success was accelerated by an announcement made by the duke de Richelieu, that the allies had, at the suggestion of the emperor Alexander, agreed to withdraw one-fifth of the army of occupation. The deficiency still left was made up by loans, contracted with the capitalists of London and Amsterdam; but on terms very unfavourable; the total amount raised by borrowing was, 352,089,033 francs.

On the 4th of April, marshal André Masséna died, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. He was one of the most distinguished for military talents, and the most successful of Napoleon's generals. The two, when engaged in the same campaign together, soon became intimate friends; and, with the exception of Dessaix, it is probable that Bonaparte was not so strongly attached to any individual as he was to Masséna, who, after the battle of Loveredo, in 1796, he termed “the spoiled child of victory.” He held important commands in all the wars of the consulate and the empire; and joined his former friend and master in the strife of the hundred days. After the final overthrow of the emperor he lived in retirement near Paris; there he died; and, but for his avarice and cupidity, he would have left a fair character behind him.

As the discussions on the financial propositions proved that the chamber of deputies was decidedly liberal, it was deemed advisable to make the ministry correspond with that chamber in principle. On the 17th of May it was, therefore, to a certain extent, reconstructed. M. Pasquier, president of the chamber of deputies, had previously been appointed minister of justice in the place of the chancellor Dambray, being succeeded in the presidential chair, by M. de Serre. The duke de Feltre and M. Dubouchage retired; the former being succeeded, as minister of war, by marshal Gouvion de St. Cyr; the latter, as minister of marine, by count Molé. The count possessed great administrative talents, but was found deficient in resolution. He could plan wisely, but could not persevere determinedly, against difficulties and opposition. Marshal St. Cyr had greatly distinguished himself in his profession; and he had, says M. Guizot, “a powerful, original, and straightforward mind, with no great combination of ideas, but he was passionately wedded to those which emanated from himself.” His first wish and determined resolution was to give France back an army; and he devoted himself to that object as soon as he obtained possession of the seals of office.

In July, one of the most illustrious contributors to French literature, whose fame was not only current throughout France, but was known in every quarter of Europe, and in America also, the baroness de Staël-Holstein, better known, perhaps, as madame de Staël, died at Paris, where she had resided, since the battle of Waterloo, with her daughter, who was married to the duke of Broglie. She herself, after the death of her husband, the baron de Staël-Holstein, had married a young French officer, M. de Rocca; but the union was not known till after her death. It is singular that, when she knew Bonaparte only by repute, she regarded him with admiration; but, on seeing him for the first time, in December, 1797, when he was preparing for his Egyptian expedition, she conceived for him an irrepressible feeling of dislike, which she could never repress; and it appears to have been fully reciprocated.—In 1801 she was ordered to quit Paris; and, in 1803, the first consul prohibited her from living in the French dominions. From that period she alternately resided at Moscow, Stockholm, and London; returning to Paris as soon as the restoration of Louis XVIII. put an end to the sway of Napoleon. Her salons there were the resort of all the eminent men of the day.

In the same month, an agreement with the pope was concluded by M. de Blacas, who had been sent ambassador to Rome early in the year. The chief object of his embassy was, to regulate and limit the interference of the pope in ecclesiastical appointments, and to perpetuate those liberties of the Gallican church, which the concordat, concluded with Napoleon, had established. Cardinal Gonzalvi met M. de Blacas as negotiator on the part of the holy see; and the latter was persuaded to depart entirely from the main object of his mission. Instead of continuing the concordat of 1801, M. Gonzalvi represented that agreement so forcibly to the French ambassador, as embodying concessions to the revolutionary spirit on the part of the pope, which could only be justified by the most imperious necessity, that M. de Blacas agreed to annul it, and to revive that concluded between Francis I. and Leo X.; thus annulling all the concessions, which, since 1789, had been obtained from Rome. A claim to Avignon, one of the first conquests of the revolution, was also made; and M. de Blacas agreed, if that place was not restored, that an indemnity should be paid. The suppressed bishoprics were also revived, though their endowments were forfeited; the king was to have the nomination of the bishops; but the papal sanction was made requisite for every ecclesiastical appointment; and the right of excommunicating whole districts was revived; though no bulls were to be sent to France without receiving the royal sanction. This new concordat was signed on the 16th of July, and when its provisions were known, they excited great discontent throughout France.

The condition of the peerage attracted the attention of the government at this time; and the king, towards the close of August, was induced to issue an ordonnance, providing that no one should be created a peer, unless he first instituted a majorat, or entailed estate. The majorat for a duke was fixed at 30,000 francs per annum; that for a marquis or count at 20,000 francs; and that for a viscount and baron at 10,000 francs. Those sums were the minimum; there was no limit in the other direction. The ordonnance had not a retrospective effect; it only applied to future creations.

In the autumn, the elections of the fifth of the chamber of deputies who vacated their seats, took place, and the result could not be considered favourable to the government. The liberals of Paris took early steps to influence the returns as much as possible. Generals Lafayette and Thiard, and M. Benjamin Constant, all resided in the Rue d'Anjou St. Honoré; and they met at each other's houses, for the purpose of making such arrangements as it was possible for them to carry out. In the capital those measures were quite successful. The eight new deputies to be returned were all liberals—MM. Lafitte, Delessert, Roy, and Casimir Perier being of the number; the first was re-elected. In other quarters, Dupont de l'Eure, Bignon, Chauvelin, Caumartin, and Hernoux were returned. MM. Lafayette, Manuel, and Benjamin Constant were defeated for the department of the Seine; but, as a whole, the moderate royalists lost, and the extreme republicans gained ground by the elections. The liberals, however, did not feel themselves powerful enough openly to attack the government of the Bourbons, particularly under the improved circumstances of the country. Nor were the Orleans party—still held together (though not rendering themselves very prominent) by the diplomatic ability, and many of them supported by the wealth, of their chief—prepared for action. The duke of Orleans himself was aware that his time had not yet come. Of the two parties who must be annihilated or conciliated to insure his triumph, he said that he “was too much a Bourbon for the one, and not enough for the other;” and he resolved to wait.

At this period the country, Paris especially, was rapidly regaining prosperity, and with it internal peace. The harvest of 1817 had something to do with this; but much more decisive results followed from the influx of foreigners, which caused a corresponding demand for the products of French industry. The change in Paris was very great—indeed, surprising. Sir A. Alison, who was there in 1814, and visited it again in 1818, was astonished, as well as others who saw the city at the different periods, “at the unmistakeable marks of prosperity which were to be seen on all sides. Splendid streets had arisen, or were in progress, in many quarters; the Boulevards, the gardens of the Tuileries, the Champs-Élysées, breathed, even on ordinary occasions, the air of happiness and joy; the streets were filled with elegant equipages; while the increasing brilliancy of the shops, and the variety and beauty of the dresses for the women, proved that the bourgeois class shared, in their full proportion, the general affluence and prosperity which the continuance of peace, and the immense concourse of strangers, had brought upon the metropolis. Among these strangers, the Russians and the English were particularly remarkable for the eagerness after works of art which they exhibited, and the immense sums they spent. These sums, indeed, were so great, as much to exceed the heavy weekly payments which the French were still compelled to make to the commissioners of the allied powers; and, like the Greeks of old, they might console themselves with the reflection, that they had established a more desirable ascendant than that of conquest over the minds of their conquerors; and that, if they paid tribute to the rude barbarians of the North, they received a homage more lasting and flattering in the influence of their acknowledged superiority in taste and art.”*

The king opened the session of the chambers on the 5th of November. In his speech, his majesty alluded to the sufferings of his people, occasioned by the bad harvest of 1816, and he expressed his great regret that those sufferings should have been attended, in some districts, with riots and outrage. His majesty stated, that the laws respecting individual liberty, and the prévôtal courts, would be suffered to expire; that negotiations with the allied powers were in progress, with a view to alleviate the burdens occasioned by a military occupation of the country; and that the concordat concluded with the pope, and a projet-de-loi for recruiting and reorganising the army, would be submitted to the chambers.

The concordat was the first measure brought before the chambers. It was opposed by the ultra-royalists, because it did not re-endow the church with landed estates, and free its prelates from ministerial influence; and by the liberals, because it restored so many antiquated forms. It was supported by the ministers; but the opposition appeared to be so strong that, after the first debate, its fate became evident if any vote were taken, and the subject was not introduced again that session. The project relating to the army was more successful.

The charter had abolished the conscription—a mode of raising an army which had tended more than any other course (perhaps more than all others put together) to render Napoleon unpopular amongst the people. Since the restoration, the army had been recruited by voluntary enlistment; but it was found that, whilst most of the loose and idle characters resorted to the royal standard, there was little chance of a sufficient number of recruits coming forward to keep the army up to the necessary strength requisite for the defence of the country. The minister at war had devoted his attention to this subject from the day of his appointment to office; and he introduced his measure, which had been prepared with great care, on the 14th of January, 1818. In explaining its provisions, he said it “embraced the two modes of recruiting—voluntary enlistment and compulsory service; the latter not to be called into action till it had been ascertained that the first had failed. The complement of the legions was fixed at 150,000; and the proposed regulations of this force were divided into three classes, viz., those relating to the levying the corps, to the legionary veterans, and to promotion. The provisions in the first class were mainly founded on the old laws of the conscription, mitigated, however, in every instance in which it was practicable. The regulations concerning the veterans were based upon the principle that, in a free state, every man is bound to afford his services to maintain his country’s independence, and, therefore, that they ought to be reorganised. Those regarding promotion embraced the principles that, as a compensation for the sacrifices thus imposed upon the people, a regular and invariable system of promotion should be established in the army; that, beginning from the ranks, it should ascend to the highest grades; that the regulations on the subject should have the fixity of laws; and the recompenses should be as widespread as the services, so that the common soldier might have the prospect of any rank or employment, without any limit or any other title than his talents and his services.” Under the regulations made in the revolutionary period, one-third of the promotions in the army depended upon length of service, one-third upon election, and one-third upon the choice of the government. In future, two-thirds of the commissions were to be filled from the military schools, and one-third from the non-commissioned officers, whilst the officers themselves were to rise by years, not selection.

This law encountered great opposition in its passage through the chambers. The most impressive and determined speakers against it were MM. de Villele, Chateaubriand, and Salaberry. The essence of their speeches—very eloquent and very able—may be stated in a few words. The proposed law took away from the crown its most important prerogative—that of appointing the officers of the army; it would make the army so democratic, that it could not be relied on to support the monarchy, whilst it would revive the most odious and oppressive practice of the imperial régime—the forced levying of men by the conscription. The enrolment of the veterans was also opposed as injudicious, and fraught with danger. The measure was ably defended by the proposer, general Gouvion de St. Cyr; and by MM. Courvoisier and Royer-Collard. They held, that forced levies could not be dispensed with, and adduced the example of England; that model of representative governments, they observed, resorted to the press to man her navy. They denied that the project betrayed the royal authority; and declared, that "the king, by surrendering one of his prerogatives, had given a noble example of the duty his situation required—of what the love of his people could effect." The incorporation of the veterans, it was averred, was a measure "at once called for by necessity, and justified by every honourable feeling." The old prejudices should not be kept up; after the crisis they were emerging from, there was but one remedy for the evils they had endured, and that was oblivion. "What Frenchman," exclaimed general St. Cyr, "has not need of oblivion, if not for himself, at least for his family, his brothers, his children? Error has been in all camps, within and without all walls, under all banners. All of us have faults, more or less grave, to expiate; and the king has given the best proof that he knows how to reign, by his knowing how to forgive." This speech of the minister of war made a decided impression, not only in the chambers, but upon the country, and had a great influence on the fate of the project. It was debated through January and February; many amendments were proposed, but none adopted, except what related to details; and it was finally carried, in the deputies, by a majority of 147 to 92; in the peers—where the majority would have rejected it, but for the influence of the ministers, and the personal solicitations of the king—the votes were 96 to 74.

The other measures of the session of 1818 were not important. M. Pasquier introduced a project of law, intended, by the doctrinaires, to regulate and limit the power of the minister to seize publications. It proposed to make the author of every writing, published in France, responsible for its contents; and, if the author was not known, the publisher; the printer, also, was to share in that responsibility. Offences of the press were divided into crimes and misdemeanors; the courts of assize taking cognizance of the first; the judges of the correctional police of the second. The law only applied to books and pamphlets; the newspaper press was left at the mercy of the crown and the censorship till January 1st, 1821. This law, after a hard struggle, passed the chamber of deputies, by 131 votes to 97; but an amendment, unpalatable to the liberals, being carried in the peers, they joined, with the ultra-royalists, in a negative vote, and it was thrown out of that chamber, by 102 to 59.—The laws respecting individual liberty, and the establishment of prévôtal courts, were limited to the end of 1818; they were suffered to expire; and no other measure of importance came before the chambers during the session of 1817-'18, except the budget; in the discussion on which, the ministers—having taken middle ground, between the representatives and advocates of the banking and capitalist interest, on which side MM. Lafitte and Casimir Perrier were the great orators; and the territorial interests, chiefly advocated by M. de Villele—were assailed by both. The budget again presented a great deficiency of income as compared with expenditure. The ordinary expenses of government were estimated at 680,975,000 francs; the extraordinary (all connected with the occupation of the allies, and the required indemnities) to 312,268,022; making a total of 993,243,022 francs. The revenue was estimated to produce only 767,778,600 francs. This rendered a loan of 225,464,422 francs (£9,394,392) necessary, which was obtained of Messrs. Baring and Hope, on much more reasonable terms than those of the previous years; the five per cents being taken at 67, instead of 58. Still the interest, the extra charges of commission, &c., rendered the expense of the loan very nearly ten per cent.

During the session a negotiation was going on, the object of which was, to obtain some reduction in the enormous claims made upon the French governments, by the various powers and their subjects, for indemnities, which went far beyond the sums allotted in the treaty. Not only were these claims put forward, for losses sustained by the devastations and levies of the revolutionary and imperial armies, but some of the small German princes sent demands for arrears of payment for military services, rendered as far back as the reign of Henry IV. The aggregate had swelled to nearly 1,400,000,000 francs—more than two years' revenue. Then there were the expenses of the army of occupation; the whole making an amount much greater, the duke de Richelieu declared, than France could ever pay. His grace, relying on the former friendship of his imperial majesty, interested himself with the emperor Alexander, with a view to get the amount reduced. The emperor willingly followed up his successful attempt to reduce the army of occupation, by suggesting the appointment of commissioners to consider the claims, with a view to their adjustment, upon a fair and liberal basis, just to all parties. In consequence of a letter which Alexander addressed to his allies, on the 30th of October, 1817, this mode of disposing of this important question was adopted. At his suggestion, also, the duke of Wellington, generalissimo of the allied armies in France, was chosen by the sovereigns as their arbitrator, and the amount of sums to be paid to each was left to his decision: one of the highest tributes paid to the honour and justice, as well as to the intelligence and zeal, of that great man. The duke, accordingly, went to Paris to preside over the commission; and the discussions commenced in January, 1818.

The commissioners continued their labours with great zeal, and paid every attention to the representatives of the various claimants. The duke of Wellington was most diligent in his attendance; but though he was earnestly devoting his time, his energies, his talents, and his influence to the service of France—for he was seeking to lessen and limit the demands made upon her resources—one Frenchman (if he had no accomplices) sought his life. His grace returned to his hôtel about one o'clock in the morning of the 11th of February; and, on stepping out of his carriage, a pistol was discharged at him. The ball happily missed, and the assassin escaped. A few days after, two old soldiers, named Cantillon and Marenit, were arrested and brought to trial. The evidence was not sufficiently conclusive, and they were acquitted. But that Cantillon was guilty, and that Napoleon at St. Helena was aware of the fact, is evident from the will of the exile (dated April 24, 1820), in which he left a legacy of 10,000*fr.* to that individual, expressly on the ground that he had attempted to assassinate the duke: his right to murder the English general being maintained in the document! The atrocious attempt had one effect that must have been gratifying to the duke—it was the means of eliciting fervent demonstrations of the interest all Europe felt in his life; the manifestations made, showing that his death would everywhere, even in France itself, have been regarded as a national calamity.

This attempt on the life of the duke did not interrupt the proceedings, in which he was the chief agent, and in the progress of which, delicate as was his position, and the many different interests he had to conciliate, his grace appears to have conducted himself so as to gain the goodwill of all. They ended by a convention, signed on the 15th of April, by which the sum of 240,800,000*fr.* was accepted as a settlement of the claims of the subjects of the allied powers. This amount was raised by loan, inscribed on the Grand Livre of the Bourse, and subjected the government to an annual payment of interest, amounting to 12,040,000*fr.* A separate convention with England guaranteed the inscription on the book, of a rente, to the amount of 3,000,000*fr.* per annum, representing a capital of 60,000,000*fr.*, which was in liquidation of all claims of British subjects. Thus, for something more than 300,000,000*fr.*, France got rid of claims amounting to upwards of 1,300,000,000*fr.*, an immense reduction, for which she was entirely indebted to Russia and England. When the duke de Richelieu laid this convention before the chambers, anticipating the speedy withdrawal of the allied troops, he asked for a further credit of 24,000,000*fr.*, to meet any demands that might accrue in procuring this desirable result; and so satisfied were the deputies with his communication—so much more satisfactory was the financial arrangement than they could have anticipated—that all his proposals were accepted, almost by acclamation; certainly there was not a sound of disapprobation heard. Soon after the session was closed.

This important affair thus satisfactorily adjusted, the sovereigns resolved to assemble in congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, to consider whether the occupation of France by their armies should terminate at the expiration of the three years, or whether it should, under the terms of the treaty, be extended to five. The duke de Richelieu and his colleagues were very anxious to free the country from the presence of foreign troops; and, as the king of Prussia was the only one of the allies who was known to be in favour of prolonging the occupation, as what he considered a just punishment upon France for the miseries and the evils her ambition had brought upon other nations, there was every expectation that this desirable result would be achieved. It is said, that the ultra-royalists were greatly mortified at the prospect of France being relieved from its greatest indignity, under a ministry to which they were so much opposed. A conspiracy to get rid of that ministry and the king has been attributed to them, of which it can hardly be thought they were guilty. But, in June, count Decazes was waited upon by a person, who professed to reveal to him the particulars of a conspiracy, the object of which was to employ the ultra-royalist troops of the guard to seize the ministers; to carry them to Vincennes; to compel the king to resign in favour of his brother, the count d'Artois; to restore the double system of election; to dissolve the chamber, and to summon a new one. The minister of police referred the deponent to the minister of the interior, M. Lainé, who issued warrants for the arrest of several ultra-royalists implicated, including generals Canuel and Donnadieu. All the parties named in the warrants were arrested, except Canuel, who fled; but no other proceedings were taken. They were liberated after a few months' imprisonment; and the conspiracy of the Bords de l'Eau, as it was called—if it really existed, and was not merely a canard, invented for some purpose by the person who revealed it to Decazes—utterly failed.

The congress of Aix-la-Chapelle began to assemble on the 20th of September. The place where it met is an old frontier city of Rhenish Prussia, forty miles south-west of Cologne. It was the favourite residence of Charlemagne, who made it the capital of his dominions, and there his successors were crowned till the 16th century. After the division of his dominions, it declined in splendour; but it has always been celebrated for its waters: and several diplomatic meetings and congresses have been held there, the last being that of 1818. At that important assemblage the interests of Great Britain were represented by the duke of Wellington, lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Canning; those of Austria, by prince Metternich; of Prussia, by prince Hardenberg, baron Bernstorff, and baron Alexander d'Humboldt; and of Russia, by Capo d'Istria, and Nesselrode more especially; but there were several other Russian noblemen and diplomatists in attendance. The duke de Richelieu attended on behalf of France. Messrs. Hope and Baring were also requested to attend, as representing the capitalists of Europe, without whose aid it would have been impossible to bring the desired arrangements to a final conclusion. How anxious Louis XVIII. felt that that conclusion should be to relieve France from the presence of the allied troops, may be imagined, from his parting words to M. de Richelieu—"Make every sacrifice," said his majesty, "to obtain the evacuation of the territory; it is the first condition of our independence: no flag but our own should wave in France. Express to my allies how difficult my government will be, so long as it can be reproached with the calamities of the country and the occupation of the territory; and yet, you know, M. de Richelieu, it was not I, but Bonaparte, who brought the allies upon us. These are my whole instructions. Repeat to the emperor Alexander, that he has it in his power to render a greater service to my house than he has done in 1814 or 1815. After having restored legitimacy, it remains for him to reap the glory of having restored the national independence. Obtain the best conditions possible; but, at any rate, get quit of the stranger."

The king of Prussia arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 26th of September, and he was followed by the emperors of Austria and Russia on the 28th. The presence of so many distinguished personages, restored, for a time something like its former brilliancy to the old city. Prince Lieven was one of the Russian diplomatists present; the princess accompanied him. Lady Castlereagh, also, accompanied the English plenipotentiary; and the salons of those two ladies were the resort of all the crowned heads, diplomatists, military men, and civilians, who were assembled on this important occasion. Madame Catalani, then at the height of her fame, and in full possession of all her wonderful powers, was also at Aix-la-Chapelle, with an opera troupe from Paris; and, as many strangers, especially English, were attracted to the spot, pleasure was quite as predominant as business. A person was also present with a different object, and with different views. A mademoiselle Lenormand had imbibed the opinions of madame Krudener; and, assuming the pretensions with the dress of a sibyl, she endeavoured to acquire the same influence over Alexander that the latter lady had so notoriously possessed. She failed; though the emperor does not appear to have deserted the principles which gave madame Krudener the ascendancy she for some time held and exercised over his imperial majesty.

The arrival of the sovereigns caused the plenipotentiaries to set to work in earnest; and the preliminaries of the "treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle" were all arranged on the 30th of September: on the 1st of October they were signed. A courier was immediately dispatched with a copy to Paris; and it was published in the Moniteur of the 9th. The principal conditions were:—"1.—That the troops should evacuate all the fortresses they occupied in the territory of France, on or before the 30th of November. 2.—That the sums required for the pay, clothing, and maintenance of the troops should be paid to the said 30th of November. 3.—That, in consideration of this evacuation before the five years, to which it might have extended, had expired, France should pay to the allies 265,000,000 francs (£11,041,666); 100,000,000 francs to be made good by inscriptions in the Grand Livre. 4.—That the remaining 165,000,000 francs should be paid by drafts on Hope and Baring, in nine monthly payments, the drafts to be delivered to the commissioners of the allies, on the evacuation of the fortresses." The signing of this treaty was followed, after a conference between the emperor Alexander and Richelieu, by the admission of France into the European confederacy; and, on the 15th of November, a secret protocol was signed by the ministers of England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. By its first article, the five powers stipulated "that the sovereigns determine never to deviate, either in their mutual relations, or in those which unite them to other states, from the principles which have hitherto united them, and which constitute a bond of Christian fraternity, formed by the sovereigns amongst each other." The other articles declared, that the union was "founded on no separate interests or momentary combinations," and "had no other object but the maintenance of the treaties, and of the rights established by them." That "France, associated with the other powers, by the restoration of a government at once legitimate and constitutional, engaged, henceforth, to concur in the maintenance and support of a system, which had given peace to Europe, and could alone insure its duration." That, "if, to attain those ends, the contracting powers should deem it necessary to establish particular reunions, either of sovereigns, or their ministers, to treat of subjects in which they had a common interest, such assemblages should be arranged by previous diplomatic communication; and should such reunions refer to the condition of other states, they were not to take place, without formal communications with those by whom the affairs of those states might, at the time, be directed."

a "secret memoir" that was presented to the allied sovereigns, by the baron Vermeuil, from the party of the count d'Artois. The tendency of it was to show, that, in France, the revolution had again got possession of all, even to the lowest classes of the nation, who were violently excited with principles destructive of the monarchy, delivered from the tribune by the ministers of the king; whilst audacious writings sapped the foundations of social order, and repressive laws were applied to those writers who defended monarchy and legitimacy. Various events were noticed, to show the progress which the revolutionary feeling was making; and it was stated, that, to arrest this progress, five combinations presented themselves to different minds; all of which were, however, objectionable to the memorialists, except the last—a change of ministers. This was the course they recommended in the conclusion of their document:—"The king and his ministers," they said, "may be brought back to the principles on which monarchy may be firmly established: not the present ministers, who are short-sighted, and have not the strength of mind necessary to repair their early faults. A complete change of ministry, therefore, offers the only salutary, as well as the loyal means, of preventing France from becoming a focus of revolution, and again setting Europe in a flame."

The elections of 1818 showed that the feeling denounced by the ultra-royalists was, whether for good or evil, spreading in France. Few ultra-royalists offered themselves as candidates; the principal contests were between the ministerialists and the extreme republicans. M. Lafayette and M. Benjamin Constant were returned for the Sarthe, and M. Manuel for the Vendée—both ultra-royalist districts. Lyons returned Camille Jourdain, the most celebrated speaker at the time, amongst the liberals; St. Aulaire (whose daughter count Decazes had married), and other liberals, were elected for the first time. There is no doubt that for this result, if injurious to the cause of the monarchy, Decazes and the ministry were to blame. After the ordonnance for the elections, and convoking the chambers for the session 1818-'19 had been issued, the count proposed, that the count d'Artois should be deprived of the command of the national guards; and that the central administration of that force, which his royal highness had established, through the negligence or connivance of M. Vaublanc, should be suppressed. The king refused at first, but was obliged to yield; and thus the ultra-royalists lost all the influence which, as we have shown, they had previously exercised in the departments through this source.

The emperor Alexander visited Paris while these elections were going on, affording to Louis—according to an interesting memoir he left behind him—"one of the happiest moments of his life." In that memoir the king says—"Some of the elections displeased me, such as those of the Sarthe, the Vendée, and Finisterre; but those are annoyances attached to a constitution like ours; and, on the whole, they were good. I observed with pain, that in the letters of the duke de Richelieu, he was more alarmed than I was." The duke appeared to have imbibed the idea, that the ultra-royalists must be brought back to the government, to save the monarchy; and the allied sovereigns entertained the same opinion. Whether they inspired the duke, or he their majesties, cannot now be ascertained. But the elections, and the declared sentiments of the king, with the known principles of the count Decazes, caused the allies to believe, that unless a change of ministry took place in France, a fresh revolutionary outbreak would be the result, and they resolved to be prepared for it. The ministers of England, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, therefore, on the 19th of November, signed a secret military protocol, by which they bound themselves to continue their alliance, for the purpose of putting down revolutionary movements—"the progress of the evils which had so long desolated Europe having only been arrested by the intimacy of the union, and the purity of the sentiments which united the four sovereigns for the happiness of the world." The next day, a second agreement was signed, stipulating precisely how, with the consent of the king of the Netherlands, the frontier fortresses which he had repaired were to be garrisoned; and in the two documents a complete system of military action, in case of necessity, was arranged.

Before the congress broke up, a modification was made in the treaty of the 1st of October. The financial arrangements of Aix-la-Chapelle, following upon the great loans contracted in the year—added to the avowed determination of the English government to revert, as soon as parliament met, to the system of payment in specie, so long suspended—produced a complete panic on the Paris Bourse, where the funds fell, in one day, 10 per cent., and more than 20 per cent. in the week. The pressure, and the alarm it produced, were so great, that the duke de Richelieu, acting by the advice of Messrs. Hope and Baring, applied to the allies to extend the payment of the instalments, stipulated to be made in nine, to eighteen months. Though the powers wanted money themselves, this application was agreed to; and, on the 19th of November, a supplementary article of the treaty, drawn up by M. Metternich, and granting the delay asked for, was signed. This averted the crisis which was anticipated; but the health of M. Corvetto, the finance minister, gave way under the anxiety and the exertions which it brought upon him, and he was compelled to resign. He was succeeded by M. Roy, one of the deputies of the hundred days; and an augmentation to the number of liberals already in the ministry.

The aspect of things in France caused no hesitation in the carrying out the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle on the part of the allies. On the 28th of November, the duke de Richelieu returned to France; and, on the 30th, amid the discharge of artillery, the allied troops marched out of the garrisons which they had occupied since the peace in 1815; and the French marched in, and once more placed the national standard on the walls. The withdrawal of the allies, however, was not unregretted, though the restoration of the national honour and independence was hailed by all. But the troops had behaved well, spent large sums of money, and contributed to augment the industrial resources of the places where they were garrisoned; many, therefore, personally felt their withdrawal, and wished they could have remained. But although individuals might lose, the nation gained largely by the evacuation, for which it had to thank, more especially, the emperor Alexander and the duke of Wellington. In an age when, unhappily, we find a desire to promote self-interest so widely prevails, the noble disinterestedness manifested by the duke in this important episode of French history, should not be passed over without a word of praise. His grace occupied a position which rendered him the envy of every commander of high rank in Europe. He held, as has been forcibly remarked, "as commander-in-chief of the allied army of occupation, a situation which, in point of dignity and importance, any conqueror might envy, and which far exceeded that enjoyed by any sovereign prince." Besides having "immense appointments, and all his expenses paid," he "was at the head of the united armies of Europe, and he held in fetters the realm of Napoleon." Yet he exerted all his influence, and all his powers of persuasion, to terminate a state of things so advantageous in every way to himself, two years before the treaty required that it should cease. The French historian, Capefigue, bears honourable testimony to "the loyal manner" in which the duke "protected the interests of France in all the negotiations," and to "his disinterestedness," which his country ought never to forget. Before he gave up the command, his grace issued a valedictory order of the day to the army, in which his grace said, that he could not take leave of the troops he had the honour to command, without expressing his gratitude for the good conduct that had distinguished them during the time they had been under his orders. For three years the allied sovereigns had confided to him the command of that part of their forces, which circumstances rendered it necessary to leave in France. If the measures which their majesties commanded had been executed to their satisfaction, that result was entirely to be attributed to the prudent conduct and admirable bearing of the generals-in-chief; and the good example they set to the other generals and officers, their subordinates, who had seconded all their efforts, had led to that excellent discipline which had been observed under all circumstances. It was with regret that he saw that the moment had arrived for the dissolution of that army, and for the termination of those relations, public and private, which he had held with the commanders and other officers of the different corps. The field-marshal found it difficult to express how agreeable those relations had been; and he begged the commanders-in-chief to receive, and to transmit to the troops under their orders, the assurance, that he should never cease to take the most lively interest in all that concerned them; and that to him the remembrance of the three years, during which he had been at their head, would always be dear.

The duke de Richelieu, having procured the evacuation of his country by the foreign troops, found new difficulties gathering around him in the political dissensions which prevailed—dissensions from which the camp of the ministers themselves was not free. Before he left Aix-la-Chapelle, he had expressed his uneasiness at the result of the elections. Writing to the king, he said—"I see with pain that the law of 1817 removes all royalists successively from the chamber; and I fear that we shall go too much on one side. On the whole, I prefer the exaltation of the royalists to that of jacobinism. I see with alarm the revival of the men of the hundred days; they have so much damaged our position in Europe." The emperor Alexander, also, looked upon the progress of the friends of revolutionary principles in France, coupled with indications of insubordination which had been manifested in Germany, with alarm; and the duke of Wellington advised the French minister to "lean to the royalists." The duke de Richelieu returned to Paris, influenced by a determination to endeavour to re-unite the ministry and the party of the count d'Artois; and he entered into negotiations for that purpose. The count and his friends were opposed to the election law of 1817, to which they attributed their losses. The duke offered to modify that law; and, after his arrival in Paris, meetings of the heads of both parties were held at the house of the cardinal Beausset, a friend of Richelieu. These proceedings were taken without the knowledge of the king. We learn this fact from the Memoir already quoted, written by Louis himself, and published by Lamartine. His majesty thought that the duke "was against himself in the course he was about to take. He wished to rally the ultra-royalists to the ministry, in changing the law of election, and he did not perceive that it was all the while the ministry that he was placing at the mercy of the ultra-royalists." This was true; and it was very unfortunate for the cause of the Bourbons that the minister did

The count Decazes knew that, as the reputed author of the election law, he was the great object of ultra-royalist dislike. That dislike had been shown in various ways—particularly by denouncing in the chambers the council of state and the ministry of police—both which the ultra-royalists opposed ostensibly, on the ground of economy, but really because Decazes held the office of head of the latter; whilst, it was alleged, that he elevated the Doctrinaires, who were amongst his supporters, and whose principles the ultra-royalists opposed, to seats in the former. The duke de Richelieu, though anxious to conciliate the ultra-royalists—a policy he considered necessary to preserve the monarchy—did not wish, at first, to sacrifice Decazes, and he proposed a modification of the ministry, by the suppression of the police department; the transfer of its chief to the interior; and of M. Lainé to the department of justice; M. Pasquier accepting the office of head of the king's household. This arrangement did not please M. Lainé, who would have resigned, and so would the count Decazes; but the duke de Richelieu determined first to meet the chambers, and to test the feeling of parties in those assemblies.

The session opened on the 10th of December; and the king, in his speech, warmly congratulated the chambers on the evacuation of the fortresses, and on France being now freed from the pressure of foreign troops. His nephew, the duke d'Angoulême, the king said, had himself planted the French flag on the walls of Thionville. The pecuniary sacrifices of the nation, and the way in which they had been met—the good harvest and its benefits—and the policy of conciliation, formed the remaining topics of the royal speech, which, being extremely guarded, did not call forth any especial manifestations of political feeling. The ministers, however, knew that there must be a change. At a cabinet council, held on the 12th, they deliberated as to what steps should be taken under the circumstances. There was a division of opinion; marshal Gouvion de St. Cyr and count Decazes were for pursuing that line of policy which had been hitherto adopted. The duke de Richelieu, count Molé, and M. Lainé advocated the making advances to the party of the right, and proposed a change in the law of elections. M. Pasquier and M. Roy were neutral. No decision was come to; and the same result attended a meeting on the 14th. On the 16th, the election of president, vice-presidents, and secretaries in the deputies, showed that the liberal ministerial party was yet strong in that chamber, though M. Ravez, who was acting with the duke of Richelieu, obtained ninety-seven votes for president; whilst M. de Serre, who supported Decazes, had only ninety-four. The election of M. de St. Aulaire, Decaze's father-in-law, as one of the secretaries, was very displeasing to Richelieu. In the chamber of peers, the secretaries elected were of the party favourable to a fusion of the royalists and the ultra-royalists; but all the members of the commission, in whose hands the preparation of the address in reply to the king's speech was placed, were of the latter party.—Another cabinet council was held on the 17th; and the king has given an account of what occurred at it. All the members spoke, and maintained their former opinions, except M. Lainé, whose idea was, "that the ministerial banner should be fixed, but that the government should stretch their hands to the right and the left." "Yes," said Louis, "let us plant our flag upon the ordonnance of the 5th of September, 1816, and continue to follow the line in which we have been all united till now. Stretch out the hand, right and left, saying, with Cæsar—'He who is not against me is with me!'" The council then broke up, and Louis thought all differences would cease. They became more rife; and the duke de Richelieu imbibed, probably from intercourse with royalists, a bitter dislike to the politics of Decazes, with whom he had once acted so cordially. He demanded, as the condition of his remaining at the head of the ministry, that the count should not only quit it, but accept a species of honourable exile, as ambassador to Naples, or Prussia. In a letter addressed to the king, on the 22nd of December, the duke expressed, personally, love and esteem for the minister of police; but, he added, "on the one side, outraged by a party whose imprudence has caused so much trouble, it is impossible for him to be on good terms with it: on the other, urged towards a party whose doctrines are still more menacing, unless he is established out of France in some eminent employment, all the men in opposition to the ministry will look to him for the fulfilment of their hopes, and he will become, even in spite of himself, no doubt, an obstacle to the government." On these grounds, the duke justified his demand for the exclusion of M. Decazes from the cabinet, and, for a time at least, from France.

It was with great reluctance that the king was induced to communicate to Decazes—who had offered to resign his office—what was required of him. When he did, the statesman, notwithstanding he was recently married to a beautiful and amiable girl, only sixteen years of age, to whom leaving France would be anything but a pleasure, consented to what was required of him; an offer he made, as a compromise, to retire from Paris with his family, being refused. The ministry, in consequence, was dissolved on the 24th, and M. Richelieu endeavoured to form a new one. He could not succeed: he found that M. Decazes, who during his career had endeavoured to enlist talent on the side of the government, had more friends than he expected; and he was obliged, after two attempts, to apply to the king, to be released from his task. He had undertaken it because his majesty could not see any alternative between him and Talleyrand, who was so obnoxious to the allies. In his letter, stating the failure of his overtures to different statesmen, he suggested to his majesty to send for either Macdonald or Marmont. Louis, however, thought that neither of those marshals could replace the duke, and as he was about to dispatch a reply to that effect, M. de Pasquier arrived. To him the king explained the then state of affairs, and he immediately went to seek Decazes, whom he brought to his majesty. The count, when informed of the failure of the duke de Richelieu to re-construct his cabinet, advised his majesty to send for general the marquis of Dessolles. He was a liberal, but was one of the first who had rallied to the Bourbons, to whom he had rendered great services; and the king, having ascertained from the count de Nesselrode, who was then in Paris, that the appointment was not likely to be disagreeable to the emperor Alexander, to whom the marquis was known, sent for that noblemen, who, somewhat reluctantly, accepted the office of president of the council. The two first statesmen to whom he applied, baron Louis, and M. de Serre, agreed to accept office with him, but on condition that M. de Decazes was to be a member of the cabinet. The marquis was equally anxious himself that the count should continue in the ministry; but it was only the personal entreaty of the king that induced him to return to office. Ultimately, the ministry was composed as follows:—Marquis general Dessolles, president of the council, and minister for foreign affairs; M. de Serre, keeper of the seals and minister of justice; count Decazes, minister of the interior; baron Portal, minister of marine; marshal Gouvion de St. Cyr, minister of war; baron Louis, minister of finance. The ministry of police was suppressed, and its duties added to those of the ministry of the interior. This ministry was exclusively liberal and doctrinaire; and if the predominance of the former party was an evil, the duke de Richelieu and his immediate advisers contributed to produce it by the measures they adopted to bring about a different result.

FIRST MEASURES OF THE MINISTRY; TESTIMONIAL TO THE DUKE DE RICHELIEU; DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE PEERS AND DEPUTIES; CREATION OF PEERS; LAW ON THE PRESS; GREAT SOCIAL IMPROVEMENT IN FRANCE; STATE OF PARTIES; ELECTION OF THE ABBE GREGOIRE; DIFFERENCES IN THE CABINET; THE DECAZE MINISTRY; SESSION OF 1819-'20; THE ABBE GREGOIRE EXPELLED THE CHAMBER; VIOLENCE OF THE OPPOSITION; SECRET SOCIETIES; PROPOSED ELECTORAL LAW; ASSASSINATION OF THE DUKE DE BERRI; VIOLENT LANGUAGE OF CHATEAUBRIAND; FALL OF DECAZES; SECOND MINISTRY OF THE DUKE DE RICHELIEU; STATE OF PARTIES; THE LAWS OF ARREST, OF THE PRESS, AND OF ELECTIONS; RIOTS, AND POPULAR COMMOTIONS; STEPS OF THE EXTREME LIBERAL PARTY; THE KING AND MADAME DU CAYLA.

THE year 1819 opened with what promised to be a popular ministry at the head of affairs. The first measures of the new cabinet were devoted to increase their friends, and to reward their adherents. M. Decazes, as minister of the interior, proposed to his majesty, that all the proscribed, with a very few exceptions, should be permitted to return to France. Louis, instead of objecting, entered cordially into the measure. "They have suffered much," was his reply to the minister's proposal; "but they should ascribe it less to me than to circumstances; and as we have resolved on an act of grace, let it be complete." Then the council of state was remodelled. MM. Barante, Berenger, de Broglie, Cuvier, Degerando, general Mathieu, Dumas, Guizot, and Ramond, being appointed members of the deliberative section; and MM. Camille Jourdain, Mounier, Portalis, Simeon, and Royer-Collard, were nominated upon the legislative division of that body. Royer-Collard was also appointed president of the council of public instruction. In the army, marshal Gouvion de St. Cyr promoted many who had taken part with Napoleon in the struggle of 1815; and the royal guard of the king was opened to the officers and sub-officers of the army; whilst several colonels of the guard were advanced in the army as field-m Marshals. The two measures greatly displeased the count d'Artois and his adherents. Whilst the first admitted into the guard, as officers, persons on whom they could not depend, the latter removed from it those on whom they might rely as faithful defenders. But all remonstrance was vain. The tide had set in; and in every department of government, patronage was exercised in the same direction, both in the capital and the departments. "In a word," says an eminent historian, "the government threw themselves everywhere, and without reserve, into the arms of the liberal party, hoping that they would thus found the monarchy upon

On the 13th of January, count Decazes submitted a decree to his majesty, for the revival of public exhibitions of the products of industry, to take place every two years, the first to be opened on the 25th of August. On the 27th, the same minister submitted another decree to the king, for creating a council of agriculture, with a view of promoting the improvement of that branch of industry. His majesty heartily approved of both measures, and appointed the dukes de la Rochefoucauld, Choiseul, and Liancourt, members of the council of agriculture. Whilst thus attending to administrative details, no measure of public interest was brought forward in the legislature. Indeed, the only proceeding in the chambers that excited the slightest attention, during the first month of the year, was the proposal, made by Lally-Tollendal in the peers, and by Benjamin Delessert in the commons, that a national recompense should be made to the duke de Richelieu, for his services in delivering France from the pressure of the foreign army of occupation. It might have been supposed, that this was a proposition which would not have met with an opponent; it was, however, vehemently denounced by both the right and left sides of the chambers. In accordance with the wish of the king, the proposal was, that a majorat of 50,000*l.* per annum should be secured upon the crown property, and descend to the possessor of the title. As soon as the duke heard of it, he addressed a letter to both houses, declining any pecuniary recompense at a time when France was so heavily oppressed by the public burthens. If he had rendered services to France, and been a means of procuring the freedom of her territory, "the esteem of his country, the friendship of his sovereign, and the testimony of his own conscience," he said, "were a sufficient reward." The proposal, however, was persisted in; but the deputies limited the grant to the direct, refusing to extend it to the collateral, heirs to the title. In this shape the proposal was adopted in the deputies by 124 to 85 votes; in the peers by 83 to 45. The duke had no direct heirs, and, in the event of his death, the title would descend to a nephew. His grace, therefore, refused to avail himself of the gift during his life, but bestowed it on the hospitals of Bordeaux.

The ministers not bringing any measure of public importance forward, the ultra-royalists resolved, in the chamber of peers, to introduce a projet-de-loi, for altering the law of elections. The marquis Barthelemy—whose career had been varied, he having been, contrary to his wishes, elected a member of the directory, and been banished by the democratic decree of the 11th of Fructidor, 1797—had subsequently returned, his life being preserved by what was considered a near approach to a miracle—had been a senator under the empire, and was now a peer of France—this nobleman was selected to bring the question forward in the peers. He introduced the subject on the 20th of February, and obtained leave to bring in his project by a majority of 80 to 53. The alterations contemplated the reconstruction of the electoral colleges, the double vote, and the restoration of the influence of the landed proprietors. The discussion of the question on its merits, commenced on the 20th of February, and the projet-de-loi was adopted by 98 votes to 53. These votes alarmed the government; and the conduct of the peers on another subject showed, that there was a determined line of opposition between the two houses. The financial year begun on the 1st of January. This was found to be practically attended with inconvenience, and the ministers wished to alter it. This could only be effected by voting the supplies for eighteen, instead of twenty, months. That the ministers proposed should be done; and, though the proposal was vehemently opposed by M. de Villele and the orators on the right, the chamber of deputies sanctioned it. When taken before the peers, it was rejected by 93 to 54.

These measures convinced Decazes (who was the real head of the cabinet) and his colleagues, that something must be done to procure a ministerial majority in the upper house; and it was proposed to his majesty, that he should create sixty new peers. The marquis Dessolles, as president of the council, laid a memorial before the king, strongly advising his majesty to take this step; and, although Louis objected at first, he finally consented: in the Moniteur of the 8th of March, the new creations appeared. They increased the number of peers from 208 to 270, and included such men as marshals Davoust, Jourdain, Lefebvre, Moncey, Mortier, and Suchet; admirals Tonquet, Tricquet, and Verhuel; counts Becker, Belliard, Clacapede, Dejean, Latour-Maubourg, and Rapp; the civilians d'Augout, de Barrente, Chaptal, David, Lacépede, Mathieu, and Portalis. This step taken, the electoral law was debated in the chamber of deputies; where it was rejected by 150 votes to 94.

M. de Serre then brought forward a law to regulate the press, and it was a great concession in favour of the liberty of that important engine of discussion. It abolished the censorship, but obliged the proprietors of public journals to give securities, to the value of 10,000*l.*, for good behaviour. Offences committed through the press, against the person of the king, those of the royal family, members of the chambers, or foreign sovereigns, and defamation affecting the character of any individual or individuals, were to be visited with graduated penalties, which were heavy in the cases of public functionaries, or foreign ambassadors. Heavy penalties were also affixed to offences against public morality. The principle of trial by jury was introduced into the bill. Libels upon individuals were to be tried by the judges alone; those upon public interests or establishments, by juries. This measure the ministers carried, in the face of a violent opposition. Upon the question of its passing, in the deputies, the numbers were—for, 143; against, 58.—These were the most important measures brought before the chambers in the session of 1819. The budget proposed, exhibited a considerable reduction from that of 1818 (the expenditure being fixed at 889,210,000*f.*), and it passed without much discussion. Just before the chambers broke up, on the 14th July, on the motion of the duke de Lévis, it was agreed to abolish an old prerogative of the crown, called the droit d'aubaine, by which the sovereigns claimed the property of any unnaturalised foreigner who died in the country. This custom was abolished by the national assembly; but restored, with the establishment of the empire, in 1804.

There were several other administrative measures of considerable importance introduced during the year, although the legislative ones had little effect on the social state of France, except, perhaps, that connected with the liberty of the press. Besides those already mentioned, for the encouragement of industry, and the improvement of agriculture, the national guard was restored to its original municipal organisation, and placed under the inspection of a committee, which authorised all measures for its organisation. The study of law was encouraged and promoted by the establishment of chairs of public law, administrative law, and the philosophical history of Roman law. A general council of prisons was established, whose duty was to look attentively to the state of the prisons, the condition and treatment of the prisoners, &c. The security of individual liberty was also looked to; and M. de Serre issued a series of regulations, all having for their object, the protection of personal liberty, so far as it was compatible with public justice.

There is no doubt that the political measures of the government were all advances in the path of constitutional liberty; and the commercial ones were conducive to the promotion of social prosperity. From the operation of these measures, and from other causes, the condition of the country, and the prosperity of every class—even of the working-men—was considerably improved. The influx of strangers, by the large sums of money they expended, and the demand they created for the necessities and luxuries of life, contributed, materially, to this result. A great many of the visitors continued to be English. "The freedom of intercourse, which the restoration had established between France and England, was favourable to both countries. Frenchmen could see the immense progress which manufacturing industry had made in England, by the application and improvement of machinery; and Englishmen could learn to profit by French taste and elegance. Great numbers of English visited Paris, and also settled in various parts of France, where they found living much cheaper, a better climate, and more of the conveniences and luxuries of civilisation, at less cost. The stranger in Paris admired the magnificent works of art, completed or commenced under Bonaparte; and the restoration, if it did not finish all that had been begun, did not neglect the improvement of the capital. The Bourse was completed; and the statue of Henri IV. restored to its place on the Pont Neuf."*

In this march of artistic and social improvement—this augmentation of personal convenience and comfort—if the din of party strife could have been stilled, still more rapid strides might have been made. But the extremes of both sides—the ultra-liberals and the ultra-royalists—were dissatisfied with the ministry. The latter availed themselves of the clergy to promulgate their dissatisfaction; and missionaries went throughout the departments, denouncing the revolution, not merely in its crimes, which were numerous, but in its benefits; and it was not entirely void of them. The pious inhabitants were called upon to perform penance for the sins of their fathers, and for their own, if they had taken an active part in any of the revolutionary movements; and the necessity of a return to the religious and political principles of the old régime was enforced. It was the policy of the ministerialists to balance one party against the other, and to take a middle course. But they soon found they had undertaken an impossible task. It is not much to be wondered at, that the liberals were dissatisfied. The ministers looked out for talent, and they were anxious to promote intelligence; but, when the electoral system they patronised and supported, out of a population of 30,000,000, supplied a body of electors only about 70,000 or 80,000 in number, it is quite evident that there must have been a great mass of interests and intelligence—to say nothing of numbers—unrepresented; we cannot, therefore, be surprised at the prevalence of discontent. The opposition of the ultra-royalists was much more inconsistent. If they had given the king a constitutional and a firm support, many of the evils and distressing events of after years, in all probability, would have been avoided. The king really wished to govern in accordance with the charter; and he wished to be king over all, not a mere portion of his people. Had he been younger and more active, he might have elicited a strong personal feeling, as his instincts and his likings tended to conduct which promoted popularity. He was compelled, however, to keep himself greatly secluded; and when he did appear in public, his unfortunate appearance, bloated and obese, was not calculated to elicit respect. Still he was not unpopular; and if all the Bourbons had been like Louis XVIII., that family might still have occupied the throne of France.

At the election of one-fifth of the chamber of deputies who retired, in September, 1819, the ultra-royalists evinced an inconsistency, bordering on madness. They would not content themselves with leaving the ministerialists and the jacobins (as the party of the extreme left was again termed) to fight the contests out between themselves, when they had no chance of returning a candidate; but, raising the cry of, "rather return jacobins than ministerialists," they contributed to the return of some of the most ineligible men that were sent to the chamber. Thus, at Grenoble, they procured the election of the abbé Gregoire, ex-bishop of Blois, and a regicide. A central committee sat in Paris to superintend the elections; it was called the "managing committee;" and this particular election was settled by that committee, and took place accordingly, on the 11th of September. This was a great error—worse, it was a great fault; as, however the presence of such men in the chamber might damage their opponents, it could not benefit them. Several other candidates, almost as objectionable, were returned at that election by the same means. Of fifty-two members elected, more than one-half were decided liberals. They displaced ultra-royalists for the most part; but if the voters of that party had stood neuter, when they found they could not elect a candidate of their own, in most cases ministerialists would have been returned. The extreme left, at the close of the elections, mustered nearly 100 votes; amongst the new members introduced by them were general Foy, baron Mechin, l'abbé de Pompières, François de Nantes, and Sebastiani.

The result of these elections—particularly the return of the abbé Gregoire, which had given the count d'Artois an opportunity of reproaching the king with the evident tendency of his measures—caused Decazes seriously to contemplate a change in the election law. The representatives of the foreign powers were alarmed at the progress of liberalism; the duke de Richelieu, who had just returned to Paris from an excursion to the East, expressed his opinion very decidedly, as to the turn which he thought things were taking; and the election of the abbé Gregoire was very annoying to the king. The minister of the interior, therefore—at the express instigation, it is said, of his majesty—resolved on effecting some change. He proposed, that the annual renewal of one-fifth of the chamber should be discontinued; that, instead of the elections taking place in one town, in each department, the voting should be divided amongst different places; and he also suggested that shop-keepers, who voted in consequence of paying the patent-tax, should not be entitled to the franchise, unless they had paid the tax for a year. There was no particular objection to these alterations; but, of course, they were displeasing to those who wanted no change, whilst they did not go far enough to satisfy the ultra-royalists. When discussed in the cabinet, the marquis Dessolles, St. Cyr, and baron Louis, refused to sanction them; and as the king sided with Decazes, those three ministers resigned. The count then, who had been virtually premier since the retirement of Richelieu, took that position, and the office of president of the council. General Latour-Maubourg was made minister of war; M. Pasquier, minister for foreign affairs; M. Roy again took the office of finance minister. At the same time, Royer-Collard resigned his office of president of the council of public instruction. He was one of the chiefs of the doctrinaires; and objected to implicating that party in support of Decazes' policy. He was not, however, generally followed by the members of that highly respectable and intelligent section of the monarchical party.

The session was opened on the 29th of November. In his speech, the king, after congratulating the chambers on the peace and plenty which prevailed, and on the increase to the family of the duke de Berri, which had just taken place; communicated the information, that a fresh agreement had been concluded with the pope, by which, though the number of bishops was completed, the liberties of the Gallican church were preserved intact. His majesty then adverted to the prevalence of a vague, but real disquietude, as to the duration of the then happy state of the political world. The violence of faction naturally produced alarm, from the eagerness with which the various partisans strove for domination; and the boldness with which they developed their schemes, and put forth their principles. These symptoms had suggested the propriety of making some modifications in the charter, in order to conciliate, if possible, the views of the opposing factions. "The moment has come for fortifying the chamber of deputies," said the king, in conclusion, "and withdrawing it from the annual action of parties, giving it a duration more consonant to the interests of public order, and of national respect abroad. I have given orders for the preparation of laws, insuring individual liberty and impartial justice, with the regular and faithful administration of departments and communes, as well as for modifications in the electoral law. And it is to the devotion, to the energy of the two chambers, to their intimate union with my government, that I must appeal for the means of saving the public liberties from license, securing the monarchy, and giving to all interests, guaranteed by the charter, the profound security for which we are indebted to it."

The election of president brought out all the parties in the chamber. M. Ravez was proposed by the ministerialists; M. Villele, by the ultra-royalists; and M. Lafitte, by the Jacobins. The first had 105; the second, 75; and the third, 65 votes. This affair settled, the election of Gregoire occupied the chambers, and, till that was decided, the members would not direct their attention to anything else. Though the ultra-royalist electors had contributed to his election, the ultra-royalist members were determined that he should be excluded, as a regicide. His election might have been declared void, on the ground of his residing without the limits of the department, but the right would admit of no compromise; Gregoire was a regicide, and must be expelled. Lainé, unexpectedly, took the same side, and declared that he must be deprived of his seat, which he was unworthy to fill: but Constant and Manuel contended, that, under the charter, his election was perfectly legal; reminding the ministerialists, that the king himself had summoned a regicide, Fouché, to his councils,—Pasquier replied, that if a king had a right to overlook and pardon crime, an electoral body had not. The result of the contest was, that Gregoire was expelled from the chamber; and as, at the same time, the proscribed, regicides included, were daily returning to France, under the relaxation of the law which Decazes himself had proposed to the king, the ultra-royalists vehemently blamed the minister for this inconsistency, as they termed it. But, surely, there is a great difference between merely removing civil disabilities from an offender, and permitting him to rejoin society (if society chooses to receive him), and investing him with the dignity and privileges of a legislator: the one might be a judicious act of mercy, the other a wanton outrage of propriety. Besides, for the election of Gregoire, the ultra-royalists, and not the ministerialists, were to blame.

The next struggle was upon the address. The ministerialists moved a commission for preparing the address, which, had they succeeded, would, as in England, have been the echo of the royal speech. The opposition proposed a commission of their own, and they carried it by one vote—the numbers being 108 to 107. The address, drawn up by this commission, termed the apprehensions as to the result of the intrigues of faction “unnecessary fears.” The laws, said this document, “are every day meeting with an easy execution; nowhere is the public tranquillity disturbed; but it is, no doubt, true, that a vague disquietude has taken possession of the public mind, and the factions, which attempt no concealment of their projects and their hopes, endeavour to corrupt public opinion, and they would plunge us into licentiousness, in order to destroy our liberties.” This address was carried.—The peers, in their address, declared, that

“opinions which have overthrown empires are again awakening, and threaten the institutions which are a rampart to the throne and to liberty. The most sacred things, the most august personages, are not secure against these rash attacks; and it is time to check the excess of a few factions.” The peers appear to have been warranted in these assertions. Since the law on the press had passed, the public journals against the government were most violent in the expression of their opinions; and the administrative measures of the ministers did not appear to have in the least mitigated the hostility of the liberal party. As soon as it was known that a change was to be introduced into the electoral law, petitions were poured into the chambers, calling upon them to maintain it as it was; these petitions were signed by women and children, as well as by men; and they were produced by the fear, that, few as were the electors under the existing law, the franchise would be still more restricted by any measure introduced by the government; whilst the qualifications for electors and elected, it was apprehended, would be so changed as again to give the aristocracy the ascendancy. In some of the journals, not only was the government opposed, but assassination was defended, and the most violent revolutionary doctrines, such as the sovereignty of the people, were promulgated; whilst the character and acts of Napoleon were the theme of unqualified eulogy. Many, if not all, of the movements of both press and people were directed by the secret societies which had come into existence since the second restoration. Into these societies, according to Lamartine, “the spirit of conspiracy insinuated itself under the colour of liberal opinions. Public associations were formed to defend, by all legal means, the liberty of thought, of opinion, and of the press. MM. de Lafayette, d’Argenson, Lafitte, Benjamin Constant, Gevaudeau, Mechin, Gassicourt, de Broglie, and others, directed the course of public action. M. de Lafayette, in his hôtel, held meetings of still more secret and determined committees. Every defensive arm, gained by our institutions to public freedom, became, in their hands, an aggressive arm for the purposes of conspiracy. Secret correspondences were established between the persons proscribed at Brussels and the malcontents in Paris. They spoke openly of changing the dynasty. The king of the Netherlands, it was said, secretly favoured their projects, and hoped to elevate his house on the ruins of the Bourbons. The threads of the conspiracy extended into Germany, Italy, Spain, Piedmont, and Naples.” In Spain, there was some excuse for reaction from the violations of the constitution by Ferdinand. There revolution prevailed, and led to the restoration of the constitution of 1812. In Germany, there was a disturbed state of the public mind prevalent throughout the country. The students formed themselves into secret political associations, and were ready for any mad attempt on the established order of things. In Italy, the secret society of the carbonari was organised. In England, the radicals were holding those meetings, and taking those steps, which led to the dispersion of one of the former, at Manchester, by an armed force, and to the passing of the "six acts," for restraining the freedom both of speech and the press. In fact, all over Europe, the public mind was disturbed, and the people appeared to be prepared for the most violent changes.

The project for altering the election law—prepared by the ministers, assisted by MM. de Broglie, Guizot, and Villemaine—was designed to prevent, what was found to be the tendency of the existing system—the production of a uniform representation, and the establishment of a complete preponderance of one class of society over the others. The principal provisions were—1st. That the number of deputies should be extended from 260 to 430. 2nd. That 258 should be returned by colleges of arrondissements, and 172 by the colleges of departments. 3rd. The electors of the colleges of departments to be appointed by the colleges of arrondissements, and to be persons paying 1,000*fr.* of annual taxes. 4th. That the half of all taxes to make up the quota, should be land-tax. 5th. The elections to be by bulletin—a species of ballot. 6th. The 172 deputies for the departments to be elected immediately. 7th. The chamber to be renewed every seven years, like the English house of commons.

No sooner were the provisions of the bill known, than the violence of the press increased. The assassins of the present and former days were made the objects of eulogy; and in one pamphlet, written by M. Saint Simon, it was maintained, that it was a crime of less magnitude to assassinate such persons as the king, the duke d'Angoulême, and the duke de Berri, "because persons could be more readily found to perform the duties of kings and princes than of common workmen." It was almost impossible, but that such sentiments, freely disseminated, should produce their fruit. At that time there was living at Paris a man named Louvel; born at Versailles, in 1787, of humble parents, he was brought up amidst the scenes of the revolution; and seems to have imbibed the most intense hatred of royalty, which never abated. He contracted a mania for regicide; and in 1814, was waiting at Calais, with the intent to assassinate Louis XVIII., as soon as he put his foot on the French shore. Subsequently, he is said to have repeatedly visited St. Germain, St. Cloud, and Fontainebleau—his object being to assassinate one of the royal family. His morbid passions were, no doubt, increased in violence by the unprincipled publications of the day; and, at length, he obtained the opportunity of committing the crime he had so long meditated. It was the 13th of February, the last day of the carnival. The duke de Berri went to the opera in the evening, with the duchess, who, since her marriage, had made herself "troops of friends," by the elegance and beauty of her person, and her engaging, lively, and graceful deportment. On the evening in question, in an interval between the performance, the duke and duchess had gone from their own box, to that of the Orleans family, several of whom were present. After a few minutes' conversation, the royal pair were returning to their seats, when, as they were passing along the lobby, a door was thrown open, which struck the duchess, and hurt her so much that, in her then condition—expecting shortly to become a mother—she expressed a wish to go home. The duke handed her to their carriage, intending to return to the box himself. As he closed the door, "Adieu," she said, "we shall soon meet again." At that moment, Louvel advanced, and plunging a poniard into the duke's right side, he left it in the wound, and ran off, unseen by the servants. The duke exclaimed that he was assassinated; his voice reached the duchess, as the carriage was driving off. A piercing shriek, and an order to stop the carriage, followed, and in a minute or two after he received the wound, the duke was in the arms of his wife. He was removed into a saloon of the opera-house, and almost instantaneously several of the most eminent medical men in Paris were in attendance. The wound proved to be mortal. His royal highness could not be removed; but he survived long enough for the king and other members of his family to arrive; also, the bishop of Chartres, his father's confessor, and his own. All the rites of the Roman catholic church—used in the case of dying persons—were performed; and his royal highness expired, while imploring the king to pardon his assassin. Louis did not assent to the request of the duke; and Louvel, who was arrested in his attempt to escape, was brought to trial before the court of peers, when it appeared that he had no accomplices, and he suffered the final penalty of the law, shortly after he had committed the crime.

The assassination of the duke de Berri appears to have excited great indignation. He was universally regretted, and the deepest sympathy for his duchess, who soon after gave birth to the present count de Chambord, was expressed. But it was soon made the ground for violent attacks on the ministry. Chateaubriand, in the Conservateur, an ultra-royalist journal, declared, that "the hand which struck the blow was not the most guilty. Those," he said, "who have really assassinated the duke de Berri are those who, for four years, have laboured to establish democratic laws in the monarchy; those who have banished religion from our laws; those who have recalled the murderers of Louis XVI.; those who have heard with indifference impunity for regicides discussed at the tribune; those who have allowed the journals to preach up the sovereignty of the people, insurrection, and murder, without making any use of the laws intended for their repression; those who have favoured every false doctrine; those who have rewarded treason and punished fidelity; those who have filled up all appointments with the enemies of the Bourbons and the creatures of Bonaparte; those who, pressed by the public indignation, have promised to repeal a fatal law, and have done nothing during three months, apparently to give the revolutionists time to sharpen their poniards.—These are the true murderers of the duke de Berri."

Minor politicians, in their speeches and writings, exceeded even the tirade of Chateaubriand in virulence; and the count Decazes was openly charged with being an accomplice of Louvel. On the night of the assassination, he had gone into the room where the assassin was placed after his seizure, and asked him if the dagger were poisoned? thinking, if it were, that an antidote might be administered, and the duke saved. The reply was in the negative. What passed was not heard; but Decazes was seen to speak to the murderer, and that was enough to establish a connection between them in the minds of the numerous enemies of the minister. In the chamber of deputies, M. Clausel de Coussergues proposed, "to institute a prosecution against M. Decazes, minister of the interior, as accomplice in the assassination." On that occasion, general Foy expressed the detestation in which those of his side of the chamber held the crime. "If such an event is deplorable for all," said he, "it is in an especial manner so for the friends of freedom, since there can be no doubt that their adversaries will take advantage of this execrable crime, to wrest from the nation the liberties which the king has bestowed upon it, and which he is so anxious to maintain." There were some other speakers, but only twenty-five deputies voted for the proposition of M. Clausel de Coussergues. M. de la Bourdonnaye then proposed that an address should be presented to his majesty, praying him to put down revolutionary doctrines. General Foy supported the motion for an address, but moved that it should only express the grief of the chamber at the deplorable crime. This proposition obtained the unanimous assent of the members.

Though the provisions of the new electoral law had been made known before the assassination of the duke de Berri, it was not formally introduced to the chambers by the count Decazes till the 16th of February, three days after that event. At the same time, two other projets-de-loi were introduced, one to establish the censorship of the daily press; the other to suspend the law relative to personal liberty in the cases of persons charged with plots against the person of the king, or the safety of the state, and the royal family. It might be supposed, that public feeling was in favour of the latter projects, for addresses were sent from all parts of France, calling for measures suited to the times, and adapted to check the spread of revolutionary doctrines; to protect the persons of the royal family; and to secure the safety and peace of the country. The minister, soon found, however, that he could not carry his propositions through the chambers, such was the prejudice entertained against him. The king would fain have kept him in the ministry, but M. Chateaubriand attacked him again in the Conservateur, and said "his feet had slipped in blood;" whilst all the members of the royal family, except the duke d'Orleans, demanded his dismissal. "How is it possible for me," said the count d'Artois to the king, a day or two after the above bills had been laid on the table, "to remain at the Tuileries with M. Decazes, accused of being an accomplice in the crime of assassination, sitting in the cabinet? I beseech your majesty to permit me to retire to Compiègne." This came to the ear of the count, and he immediately tendered his resignation, which the king felt obliged to accept, but he did so with assurances of his continued esteem. "It is not against you," said his majesty, "but against me that the stroke is directed. The pavilion Marsan are trying to overbear me. I will not have M. de Talleyrand; the duke de Richelieu shall replace you. I will show the world that you have not lost my confidence."

The king commissioned the count to wait on the duke de Richelieu, and induce him to accept the commission of reconstructing the cabinet. It was with great difficulty, and only by the express solicitation of the king, that he could be persuaded to do so; and he would not finally consent, till the duke d'Artois had promised him his support, and also to procure the absolute and unconditional adherence of his friends. The duke again took the office of president of the council, and M. Simeon was made minister of the interior. He had been under-secretary to the minister of justice, in which post M. Portalis succeeded him. Since Decazes had been minister of the interior the police had been united to that department. They were now again divided; and M. Mounier, son of Mounier, a member of the national assembly in 1789, was placed at the head of the police as director-general. M. Capelle, private secretary of the count d'Artois, was appointed principal secretary to the minister of the interior. These were the only changes; and Decazes, though fallen, was not disgraced. The appointment of resident minister at the court of London was conferred upon him, with a salary of 300,000*fr.* (£12,000) per annum. The king also made him several presents; gave him the patent for a dukedom, made out with his own hand; and wrote him two autograph notes, in the most affectionate terms, expressing his indignation at the charges made in the ultra-royalist journals against him.

The ministry, as now constituted and supported, was compelled to be essentially ultra-royalist; and the appointments of M. Portalis and M. Capelle, both members of that party, enabled the count d'Artois again to exercise an influence in the departments, of which he had been for some time deprived. The aim of that party was, to extinguish every vestige of the revolution; to prevent any person tainted with its principles from holding office; and to restore the ancient régime in church and state. The liberals, or Jacobins, on the contrary, still held the principles of the revolution, and all their measures were directed to increase the power and influence of the democracy. The liberal-royalists—in which category the doctrinaires are included—entertained, as we have shown,* principles, both liberal and constitutional. If they had been supported by the people, and enabled to carry those principles out, it would have been better for France. But, like most middle parties, violently attacked by both their opponents, they found themselves compelled to abandon office, or make advances either to “the right” or “the left.” The duke de Richelieu and his friends, of the two evils, chose what they deemed the least. They allied themselves with the ultra-royalists, and agreed to make such changes in the electoral law as would break down that predominance, which the extreme liberals were rapidly gaining under the existing system. An historian† says, that in doing this they acted “criminally as constitutionalists—suicidally as politicians.” But it should be recollected, they were unable to act by themselves, and carry their own measures. They expected to maintain their position by the promised aid of the count d'Artois and his friends, and to be able to restrain the progress of that despotism to which the ultra-royalists were inclined on the one hand, and the licentiousness of the extreme liberals on the other. We see nothing criminal in the course they took; and it is quite evident, from subsequent events, and the tendency of opinion in France, that they would have been, ultimately, equally extinguished as politicians, whether they had, for a time, endeavoured to maintain their independent ground, or had joined “the left,” under the leadership of Lafitte, Lafayette, and others of that school.

After the funeral of the duke de Berri, which did not take place till March 13th, the new ministers proceeded to bring in their measures for regulating the law of arrest, for restraining the licentiousness of the press, and for altering the law of elections. The first measure was a revival of that introduced by Decazes before his resignation. It was opposed by the left—the principal speakers being general Foy and Benj. Constant, who contended, that the abyss of the counter-revolution was about to open; that all the guarantees which the nation strove to obtain in 1789, and hailed with so much joy in 1814, were to be abolished; and the régime of 1784 to be revived. The circumstances of the country did not call for any such measures as were brought forward, which would undoubtedly be applied in the interest of the counter-revolution. The dukes de Richelieu and Fitz-James, who were the principal supporters of the project, enlarged on the dangers to which the state and royal family were exposed, as no one could suppose that the assassination of the 13th of February was an isolated act. The ferocious songs sung in the streets, and even under the window of the duchess de Berri—the menaces of violence, and the threats which were directed against the bereaved father, whose grief ought to have excited sympathy—the circulation of medals, struck with the name of Maria-Louisa and her son—with other acts of the extreme liberal party (who had formed an alliance with the numerous friends of Bonaparte still in France), were cited as proofs of the licentiousness of the agitators. In February a conspiracy had been discovered in England, having for its object the assassination of the ministers; and, before the projects passed, on the 23rd of March, the fanatic student Sand had assassinated Kotzebue, at Mannheim,—the German liberals charging the dramatist with designs against the freedom of the country, in the interest of Russia, in whose service he was. These events were dwelt upon by the supporters of the measure as justifying its introduction; and their arguments were so far successful, that the projet-de-loi was adopted in the deputies by 134 votes to 113; and in the peers by 121 to 86. The bill for re-establishing the censorship of the press was as vehemently opposed. That also passed both chambers; in the deputies by 136 to 110; in the peers by 106 to 104.

The law of elections was not introduced till the 17th of April. That proposed by count Decazes being withdrawn, it was not without much consultation that the form of the new measure was arranged, chiefly by the exertions of MM. Simeon, Pasquier, and Mounier. The leading features of the project were, that the colleges of electors should be divided into two classes—those of departments and those of arrondissements. The departmental colleges were to consist of a fifth part of the whole electors, paying the highest taxes; those of the arrondissements of the remainder of the electors, residing within their limits. The latter colleges were to choose such candidates as they pleased, to return to the departmental colleges, who were to elect the deputies from the persons thus selected in the arrondissements. In the debate on this law, the orators of the left maintained, that "France and her liberties, the revolution, and its conquests, the honour of the present, and the security of the future, were all lost, if the ministerial measure should pass. The right, on the other hand, looked upon it as scarcely strong enough to save the monarchy for the moment, and declared their resolution to reject every amendment which might endanger its progress."* M. Royer-Collard, M. Lafayette, and general Foy, were the principal speakers in opposition; M. de Serre, M. Simeon, and M. Villèle, in defence. After several days' debate, M. Camille Jourdain proposed, as an amendment, what he termed a compromise between the ministerial views and those of their opponents. It was to the effect, that "each department should be divided into as many electoral arrondissements as the department returned deputies to the chamber; that each arrondissement should have its electoral college, composed of residents paying direct taxes annually to the amount of 300*fr.*; and that each college should directly nominate its own deputy." This amendment received the support of the entire party of extreme liberals, and of some of the doctrinaires, both in the chamber and the peers; and, to the surprise and annoyance of ministers, it was carried by 128 votes against 127. Of the members who were present at the sitting, the numbers were equally divided; but, when the division was taking place, M. de Chauvelin, absent from illness, and unable to walk, was carried into the chamber, and voted for Camille Jourdain's amendment.

This decision of the chamber materially affected the views of the ministers, as it would, in reality, have made no alteration in the tendency of the elections, the power being still left in the hands of the most democratic part of the community. To enable them to defeat the amendment, negotiations were opened with the chiefs of the doctrinaires, and many of that party were induced to support another amendment, which it was arranged should be proposed by M. Boin and M. Courvoisier, both members of that section of politicians. This amendment incorporated the provisions of M. Decazes' project, as to the increase of the number of members, and their division between departments and arrondissements; and proposed, that the 172 deputies to be returned by the former, should be chosen, not by the whole body of electors, but by one-fourth of them—those who paid the highest amount of taxes. This amendment was carried, in its first stage, by 130 to 125 votes; and the measure was ultimately passed by 135 to 66.

* M. Guizot.

In the chamber of peers it met with opposition; but it passed that ordeal also, and became law.

The debate on this measure extended over twenty-six days. It was carried on in the midst of riots and outrages out of doors, which the police and military had great difficulty in repressing. The conduct pursued to the duchess de Berri can only be termed brutal in the extreme. It soon became generally known that she was pregnant; and whilst the royalists hoped that she would prolong the royal line of the Bourbons, all who were opposed to that house—whether republicans or Bonapartists—saw, in her position, the very probable disappointment of their hope, that the assassination of the duke de Berri would be the means of extinguishing the elder branch. Excited by some parties, ruffians were found, who sang the most abominable songs under her windows, and repeatedly discharged lighted petards and caronades at night, in those arches of the Tuileries, over which, it was understood, the chambers of the duchess were situated. In the daytime, crowds assembled round the chamber of deputies and the Place Bourbon, shouting "Vive la charte!" and denouncing vengeance upon its enemies. The popular excitement was increased by the publication of a petition, presented to the deputies by M. Madier de Montjau, a judge of the royal court of Nismes. The purport of it was, that two circulars had been sent to various parties in that city, from a committee of ultra-royalists sitting in Paris. The first, dispatched immediately after the assassination of the duke de Berri, stated, that that event must produce the fall of Decazes; and the members of the party at Nismes were called upon to act as if that minister was no longer in office. The second, which arrived a few days subsequently, announced his fall: "We have gained a decisive victory," continued the writer, "and the ministry now forming may render us important service. Let hostility, therefore, disappear, and calm be restored." It was recommended that addresses should be got up; that they should be sent from every village; and that, in those addresses, the demand for vengeance should be mingled with the sentiment of grief for the murdered prince.

These circulars, really emanating from the central committee in Paris, which directed the elections, were supposed, by the judge, to indicate the existence of a secret government opposed to that of the king. They were drawn up, he said, by the same hand as penned the secret notes to the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; and had he not retained, in Nismes, the military garrison, there would have been a renewal there of the scenes of 1815. He refused to give up the names of the parties from whom he received the circulars and his information; and he was reprimanded, instead of being complimented, by the chamber. Out of doors, however, his statements had a great effect. They increased the unpopularity of the count d'Artois; and added to the violent zeal of the populace.

There really was no solid ground for these demonstrations. The ministers scarcely called the law of arrest into operation at all; and, as far as they were concerned, they, at first, evinced no great desire to interfere with the liberty of the press. They merely named the parties who were to act as censors, and established a superior commission of censorship, composed of magistrates belonging to the court of cassation, and the royal court, to which there was an appeal. But the "left" made both laws a basis for their opposition. Whilst the invasion of the freedom of the press was denounced, an association was formed to "protect prisoners of state," who might be "plunged into dungeons, under the law of arrest." The originators of this society issued a prospectus, in which it was maintained, that "arbitrary power, clothed with the forms of law, could not prescribe against those eternal laws which God had engraven on every heart." And "that humanity and justice were manifestly outraged by a measure, which delivered the liberty and the honour of citizens to the mercy of policy, hatred, corruption, meanness, and all the passions of certain individuals." The committee of management of this association included on its list, MM. Lafitte, Casimir-Perrier, Lafayette, Kératry, and Odilon-Barrot; and, though some of these men would have shrunk from such a consummation, there is no doubt that the direct conspiracy against the house of Bourbon, which soon afterwards broke out, originated with this association.

With respect to the head of that house, the ultra-royalists were, according to M. Lamartine, during this period engaged in a curious intrigue, with a view to overcome his attachment to his ex-minister, the duke Decazes, and to supplant the influence that statesman continued to exercise after he left office, by that of a young and attractive female, wedded to their interests. M. Guizot is silent on the subject; but all the other historians have adopted Lamartine's statement, who had ample opportunities of knowing the truth of what he asserted. The king was not licentious; he had no females at his court of that class and character, which had such a baneful influence in the reigns of Louis XIV. and XV. Yet he was fond of female society; and he really possessed the power of rendering himself agreeable to the ladies in conversation, and of maintaining a lively correspondence, in which, with many elegant compliments, pointed and brilliant sayings, and lively badinage, there was nothing of love. Aware of his inclination for this "innocent trifling," the ultra-royalists resolved to try whether it could not be turned to their account. A young and beautiful female was then residing in Paris, in the family of the prince de Condé. The prince had an illegitimate daughter, the countess de Rully, with whom this young lady was intimate, and "no scandal," we are told, attached to her name. She was the daughter of M. Talon, who was a member of the old magistracy, before the revolution, and took an active part in the intrigues which preceded that event, especially those with which Mirabeau was connected. He subsequently became mixed up with the Bonapartists; and his daughter was a friend of Josephine and of her daughter Hortense. Early in life she married the count du Cayla, an old man of good fortune but bad temper, with whom she found it impossible to live. They were separated, à la Française, no blame whatever attaching to the lady, who retained her fortune and her children. As she frequently moved in royalist circles, the friends of the count d'Artois fixed upon her to be their agent for operating upon the king's mind, and weaning him from his affection for Decazes. The viscount de la Rochefoucauld was employed to explain their views to her, and to impress upon her the immense benefits she might be the means of conferring on the country, if she would, on being introduced to the king, exert the influence which, from her pleasing manners, she would be certain to attain over him, for the accomplishment of certain objects. It is said that madame du Cayla being sincerely, not ostentatiously, pious, some Jesuits were employed, with M. de Rochefoucauld, to expatiate on the services she would render to religion, if she could detach the monarch from men who had no attachment to the church—no regard for the clergy, but rather the reverse. These were the general views developed to her. The particular results she was urged to attain were the reconciliation of the king with his brother and with the princes; and the inducing his majesty to seek in M. de Villèle and his friends a ministry, at the same time loyal and constitutional, which would fix the throne on a firm foundation, and avert the catastrophe which threatened the monarchy.*

The published letters of this lady evince a mind at once highly cultivated, and deeply impressed with a sense of duty. From the communications made to her, she imbibed the belief that it was her duty to act according to the advice given her by men high in the church, and by one of the most amiable noblemen of the day. Just about the time when it was most desired, an opportunity was afforded for her introduction to Louis, under circumstances which were certain to excite his interest. Count du Cayla and the lady, between whom the intercourse of civility appears to have been kept up after their separation, came, in 1819, to an open rupture—he demanding her fortune, and that the children should be delivered up to him. The necessity of seeking the protection of the king was an excellent plea for her introduction to Louis. By the advice of the viscount de la Rochefoucauld, she availed herself of it; and his majesty was so influenced by her story, and by her charming manners, that he himself solicited a second interview. It took place; others followed; till, at length, her society became an essential necessity to Louis, and she spent several hours with him every day. The result was all the ultra-royalists could wish. The king does not appear to have faltered in his personal attachment to Decazes; but he ceased to be influenced by his advice, or to express a wish to have him again as minister. He also altered his policy in some essential particulars; and there is no doubt, as a former historian has observed, that the influence exerted by this lady—and there is not the most remote cause to suspect that it was of any other description than that which a sister of her talents and temperament might have exerted—had a great effect on the future destinies of France; though the ultimate result differed widely from that which her instigators desired.

ON the 17th of June, when the law of elections was in its last stage in the peers, MM. Barante, Royer-Collard, Guizot, and Camille Jourdain, for their opposition to the government, were struck off the list of councillors of state. Four prefects, belonging to the doctrinaire party, were also dismissed from office. This irritated the doctrinaires, and served to increase the popular discontent, and the tendency to violence and outrage. The riots in Paris were not suppressed without several conflicts between the troops and the people, in one of which a young student of the law, named Lallemand, was shot. They were followed by a military conspiracy. General Gouvion de St. Cyr, while minister of war, had done his utmost to conciliate the officers of the army of the empire; and he had been heartily seconded by Decazes. His successor, Latour-Maubourg, proceeded upon a different principle. He refused to employ any officers in the least tainted with Bonapartist predilections, or who were suspected of being so; and the discontent thus excited, was made use of, by M. de Lafayette, to further his designs against the government, which, he maintained, "must be overturned by open force, as it declared war against the equality of classes."* He became the head of a committee, which held its meetings at his house, and which was, in effect, a committee of insurrection. It was subsequently merged in the Carbonari. The members, besides M. de Lafayette, were—MM. Saint Aignan, Voyer d'Argenson, Beausejour, Corcelles, Dupont de l'Eure, Koechlin, Manuel, Merilhou, Rey, and Tarayr. Through the agency of these men, assisted by three military officers—colonel Maziare, of the disbanded imperial guard, colonel Sauzet, on half-pay, and captain Nantil, of the legion de la Meurthe, then in garrison at Paris—a widely-extended conspiracy was planned and organised, which was to have broken out on the 19th of August. Before July closed, several legions of the army, including those stationed in the capital, were thoroughly affiliated; and early in August, M. Lafayette left the capital for La Grange; d'Argenson started for the Upper Rhine; Saint Aignan for Nantes; Corcelles for Lyons; and colonel Maziare for Amiens, to superintend the operations in those districts. All their movements were intended to be combined for one end—the overthrow of the government.† What was to succeed could not be so readily settled. Civilians joined the military; and whilst the latter were for placing the son of Napoleon on the throne, the former inclined to the duke of Orleans, thinking that it would be no relief to pass from the count d'Artois to Napoleon II. However, this difference as to the disposition for the future, was not suffered to interrupt the action of the present. There is no doubt that the conspiracy was skilfully organised. The regiments in Paris were corrupted and demoralised; and they were to be ready to join others from the provinces, who having seized the castle of Vincennes, were to march on the Tuileries, make prisoners of its occupants, and place a provisional government in the palace.

was to have been seized on the 19th of August; but Lafayette, from a devotion to the memory of his wife, wished to observe the anniversary of her death, and a delay of a day or two being ordered, the disaffected troops were not assembled in the neighbourhood of Vincennes, when, on the 18th, an explosion of gunpowder took place in the castle. This caused fresh troops to be sent there; and the conspirators supposed that their designs were discovered. That was not exactly the case; and had they been prepared to act at the time appointed, they would have given the ministers some trouble, if they had not been entirely successful. Their delay caused all their well-laid plans to fail. The ministers had heard some rumours of a plot: they assembled on the 19th at the duke de Richelieu's; and, at that meeting, Marmont laid before them some information he had received from officers, who had been tampered with, but had refused to desert their allegiance. The names of the parties who had acted as suborners of treason were given; and also those of the men they mentioned as being concerned in the movement. Lafayette, Manuel, and several other liberal leaders, were included in the latter; but the government were afraid to risk their position in the chamber by arresting deputies so popular with the opposition. Some of the ministers, as the information they had received would enable them to prepare for the actual breaking-out of the plot, recommended, that those preparations should be made in secret; that the conspirators should be suffered to take their own course, and arrested when in the act of rebellion. Marmont advised the adoption of preventive measures; and his advice was taken. The legion de la Meurthe was sent from Paris to the frontiers; the officers being arrested, as were several of the parties who had acted merely as the agents of the real conspirators. All who were taken into custody were tried by the chamber of peers; some were acquitted; those who were found guilty were sentenced to secondary punishments.—For a time, these events injured the government; as attempts were made to persuade the public that no conspiracy existed. A few years after, the chiefs did not hesitate to boast of the share they had in it, and to exult in their escape.*

Though this plot was frustrated, peace and quiet were not restored to the land. The Bonapartists and the liberals were discomfited, but not disheartened; and they continued their machinations, which led to collisions with the police and the troops at Brest, Saumur, and some other places. Their prospects of success received a decided check from the safe delivery, on the 20th of September, of the duchess de Berri of a son. The infant was christened Henri, after the once popular head of the Bourbons, Henry IV., and was created duke de Bordeaux, in honour of the city, which was the first to declare for the restoration of that family. Louis XVIII. was overjoyed at the event. When he first saw the infant, he said—"Here is a fine duke de Bordeaux; he is born for us all." The whole country seemed animated by the same sentiment; rejoicings took place in every town and village. Every municipality transmitted its address of congratulation; and the great cities of the kingdom, as they had done on the occasion of the birth of the king of Rome, presented a magnificent cradle to the happy mother. The only dissatisfied persons appeared to be the Orleans family—Louis Philippe being the next in succession, should the count d'Artois die without leaving a direct heir. Some of the friends of the duke d'Orleans spread the report, that the child was not in reality the offspring of the duchess de Berri, and the duke himself said to Suchet, who was present at the birth—"Monsieur le maréchal, you are a man of honour; you were a witness of the accouchement of the duchess de Berri. Is she really the mother of the boy?" The answer was—"As certainly as your highness is the father of the duke de Chartres!" The duke replied cordially—"That is enough, M. le maréchal;" and he and his duchess immediately went to the Tuileries to congratulate the newly-become mother, who, on her part, commemorated the birth of her infant by suing for and obtaining the pardon of two men, named Gouvin and Bouton, who had been arrested, tried, and found guilty of being connected with those attempts, to which we have alluded in a former page,† which were intended to produce such fright and alarm as might either produce miscarriage or shorten life.

The family of the prince and the French people were not alone in hailing the birth of the young prince as a happy event. The members of the corps diplomatique then at Paris met, and, regarding the continuance of the direct succession as likely to prevent future dissensions, and as a favourable omen for the maintenance of peace, they agreed to an address to the king, in which they said—"Providence has awarded the greatest personal blessing to the paternal tenderness of your majesty. The child of griefs, of regrets, and of tears, is also the CHILD OF EUROPE; he is at once the guarantee and the pledge of the repose and peace which should follow so many generations." The foreign sovereigns sent their congratulations to the king and the duchess; the emperor Alexander being perhaps the most warm and demonstrative. He wrote an autograph letter to the king, in which he said—"The birth of the duke de Bordeaux is an event which I consider to be most fortunate for the peace of Europe, and as affording just consolation to your majesty. I pray your majesty to believe that I adopt the title of the 'Child of Europe,' which the diplomatic body has already conferred upon him."

* Lamartine; Lacretelle.

The government deemed the birth of the duke de Bordeaux to be a fitting opportunity for carrying out further measures of conciliation, which they hoped would enable them to rally, at all events, the élite of the different parties round the throne. The first measure was the appearance of an ordonnance, by which the royal household was re-organised, and divided into six departments, at the head of which were the grand almoner, the grand master of the wardrobe, the grand chamberlain, the grand equerry, the grand master of the hunt, and the grand master of ceremonies: of these six functionaries, the first four were officers of the crown; the other two officers of the household. The king would not surrender the regulation of these departments to the ministers. He took them into his own hands, but he displayed no exclusive spirit in his appointments. Whilst he put the royalist de Lauriston at the head of the household, he made one of Napoleon's veterans, general Rapp, master of the wardrobe, and the other nominations evinced a similar spirit.—Then the army, by an ordonnance of the 27th of October, was re-established, as nearly as possible, on the old system. No change was made in the guards or cavalry; but the infantry was divided into sixty regiments of the line, and twenty of light infantry. There were three battalions in each regiment, and eight companies in each battalion. The number of field-officers, sub-officers, and privates in each regiment, was 2,100; the total number of infantry in the army, 160,800. Between 2,000 and 3,000 officers, who could not be relied upon, were put on half-pay.—A third measure was the re-organisation, by a decree of November 1st, of the system of public instruction. The secretaries-general of schools, abolished by an ordonnance of 1816, were re-established, and formed into a royal commission, for the purpose of exercising surveillance and control over the university and schools, as the manner of teaching and the books read, with a view of bringing both in harmony with the existing government. They adopted the costume of the educational officers of the empire, and followed precisely the rules and regulations Napoleon had laid down, only making them apply to the cause of the Bourbons, instead of that of the imperial ruler. An academy of medicine was created by Louis; and the commission was also authorised to take stringent measures for the repression of that spirit of turbulence which the students in the schools of law and medicine had especially manifested during the popular commotions consequent upon the introduction of the election law.

In the middle of October, the proclamation was issued, calling together the electoral colleges. The new members for the departments had to be chosen, and also the fifth of those returned by the arrondissements—in all 224. As this was the first time the new electoral law came into operation, the ministers felt great anxiety as to the result. In order to influence the elections in the interest of the government, M. Pasquier proposed, that the king should address a circular to the electors. The other ministers assented, and, at the suggestion of Louis, M. Pasquier drew up the document, which the king corrected, re-wrote it in his own hand, and 100,000 copies were lithographed and circulated through the departments. It was brief and to the point. The electors were called upon to "set aside from the office of deputy the fomenters of troubles, the artificers of discord, and the propagators of unjust distrust of the government;" and told that, "on them it depended to secure the repose, the glory, and the happiness of their common country; they had the will to do this," and they were called upon "to manifest that will by their choice." That choice was made essentially from ultra-royalist candidates. Most of the new members for the departments were of that party, as were twenty-seven out of forty-six—the number of the old members to be replaced. The party of the count d'Artois had now, to the great alarm of the king, the command of the legislature. "I fear we shall be overwhelmed," said the monarch to de Richelieu; "can you restrain that majority?" "We have the word of Monsieur," replied the minister. He soon found that to depend on that word was to trust to a broken reed.

The new complexion of the chamber rendered it necessary that overtures should be made to the ultras; and, accordingly, the embassy at Berlin was conferred upon Chateaubriand, and a place in the cabinet was offered to M. de Villèle. This statesman had long distinguished himself as a skilful and apt, if not a very brilliant, speaker on the right side. He was born at Toulouse, went to the Isle of Bourbon to seek his fortune, and, having succeeded, partly by industry and partly by matrimony, he returned to his native place, where he became first a member, and then head, of the municipality, and purchased a large estate in the neighbourhood. When elected a deputy he took his seat on the "right," and soon became one of the leaders of the party of Monsieur. On being offered a seat in the cabinet, he was not willing to accept it, unless one was also found for his friend M. Corbière, a Breton lawyer, who had all the characteristics of that unpolished and simple race. There was some difficulty in doing this at the moment; but it was removed by Villèle saying, that "if something was done for Corbière, a seat in the council would be sufficient for him." M. Lâiné, therefore, ceded the porte-feuille of public instruction to the Breton, and M. Villèle entered the cabinet, for the time, without office. On joining the ministry, he stipulated that a new municipal law should be introduced.

The session of 1820-'21 was opened on the 20th of December, as usual, with a speech from Louis, who, being too ill to go to the palace of the legislative body, the deputies assembled in the hall of Henry IV., in the Louvre. His majesty was unable to make a long speech. He alluded feelingly to the short time which would probably be now allowed him in this world; said that every thing announced that the modifications introduced into the electoral system would produce the desired results, and expressed "his ardent wish that the union between the crown and the chambers might be strengthened, in order to allow the establishment, on a firm basis, of a system of government adapted to so large and important a country as France." The address of the deputies, after re-echoing the sentiments of the royal speech, concluded as follows:—"To fortify the authority of religion and purify morals, by a system of education at once christian and monarchical; to give to the armed force that organisation which may secure tranquillity within and peace without; to improve all our institutions which rest on the charter, and are intended to protect our liberties;—such are the well-known intentions of your majesty, and such are, also, our duties. We will pursue these ameliorations with the moderation which is the accompaniment of strength; we will attain them by patience, which is the act of waiting quietly for the fruits of the beneficial changes already introduced. May heaven, measuring the years of your majesty by the wishes and prayers of your people, cause to dawn on France those happy and serene days which are presaged by the birth of a new heir to the throne." To this address, giving a faint shadow of the main policy of the ultra-royalists, which they afterwards endeavoured to carry out, the king replied—"I have expressed to you my intentions, and your answer is a pledge that you will second them. I repeat it—if I wish to prolong my days, it is that I may prolong the institutions I have given to my people. But, whatever may be the decrees of Providence, let us never forget our constitutional maxim—'The king never dies in France.'"

The session continued till the 31st of July, 1821; but, in the seven months, very few measures of importance were passed. The municipal law, stipulated for by M. de Villèle, was introduced. It was drawn up by that statesman and M. Mounier, and was a compromise between the opposing views of the "right" and the "centre." Like most compromises, it pleased neither side, was violently opposed, and ultimately withdrawn. A project for completing the electoral law, by fixing the boundaries of arrondissements, drawn up in accordance with the views of the "right," was more successful; it was adopted by both chambers.—The next measure was a proposition to enable the king to create and endow, immediately, twelve new bishoprics, and eighteen others at a future period; to increase the salaries of the poorer vicaires and curés, and also the funds for the repair of episcopal residences, seminaries, and other residences of the diocesan clergy. This measure was opposed by all the liberals, but was carried in the chamber of deputies by 219 to 105; and in the peers by a majority proportionately as great.—To please the propriétaires and the farmers, the corn-laws were altered, so as to restrict importation—limiting the number of places where cargoes might be received from foreign powers.—Another law, which was very offensive to the ultra-royalists, when fully developed, was one for securing to the marshals, generals, and others whom Napoleon had rewarded by grants in the various countries over which his power once extended, and who had lost their shortly-enjoyed possessions by his downfall, an indemnity for those losses out of the public revenues of the country, by inscriptions on the Grand Livre. The ministers intended this project to be the forerunner of another, for indemnifying the royalist emigrants and others, who had lost their estates in the revolution; but the ultra-royalists either were not aware of this intention, or they doubted the power or the good faith of the government, and gave the proposal, when it was brought before the chambers, and the names of the parties whom it was proposed to indemnify were read, their most determined opposition. The list embraced some zealous imperialists, and several distinguished actors in the scenes of 1815. It included MM. Jean-Bon St. André, Jean de Bry, Quinette, general Hullin, Labédoyère,* marshal Ney,* count d'Estar, general Lefebvre-Desnouettes, general Gilly, general Mouton-Duvernay, general Clausel, count de Laborde, general Excelmans, the duke de Bassano, general Lamarque, and baron Méchin. When these names were read, M. Duplessis exclaimed, that "it was a reward for conspirators." Similar exclamations were heard from the "right," and the measure was opposed in several able speeches. After long and angry debates, it was adopted by 203 votes to 125.†

The state of the press, which was more violent than at any period since the restoration, excited the attention of ministers during the session; and, before its close, count Simeon proposed that the censorship—which, he said, had been so moderately exercised, that no temperate discussion had ever been interfered with—should be continued. In the debate that took place on this proposition, M. Castelbajac made a speech so offensive to the more moderate section of the ministry, that it called up M. Pasquier, the minister for foreign affairs, who, whilst defending the projet, made some remarks which caused a great sensation, as they established a fact which had been long suspected, viz., that there were dissensions and disagreements amongst the ministers themselves. M. Pasquier directed his observations against the ultra-royalists, declaring that, "as he distrusted every usurpation, he had a repugnance to a small body of men claiming exclusively the title of royalists, who would wish to monopolise to themselves the sentiments which belonged to the French nation, and who would every day contract a circle, which it was for the interest of all should be expanded. Still more had he a repugnance to the same men, when they evinced too clearly the design of making a thing so sacred as royalty, and the power which emanated from it, the instrument of their passions, their interests, or their ambition. He had a repugnance to these men, chiefly because he felt assured that if they obtained all they desired, they would make use of the power they had acquired for no other end but to gratify private interests; and that they would be seen to reproduce, by the excessive triumphs of their petty ambition, that system of government which, in the years preceding the revolution, had done such mischief to France." This speech convinced all men that a dissolution of the government would soon take place. Its weakness was made manifest in the proceedings on the projet-de-loi that M. Pasquier defended. The commission to whom it was referred reported against it; and the chamber of deputies resolved, on the motion of M. Courtavel, a liberal, to modify it, by limiting its duration to three months after the re-opening of the session, 1821-'22. In that shape the projet was adopted by 214 votes to 112 in the deputies; and by 83 to 45 in the peers.

The only other proceedings in this session, requiring notice, were those on the budget. In introducing his financial statement, the minister estimated the revenue at 888,021,745 f., and the expenditure at 882,327,374 f., leaving a surplus of 5,694,371 f. It was further estimated, that, in the next year, the surplus income would amount to 24,000,000 f.; and a reduction of taxation was announced. It was proposed to reduce the land-tax by 20,000,000 f.; and as that tax was very unequal in its operation, owing to the various circumstances under which different provinces had been added to the empire, it was proposed, that the reduction should apply to the fifty-two departments that were most heavily taxed. The measure was opposed, because, in diminishing the amount of the land-tax, the number of electors would also be diminished; but it ultimately passed, and the session closed on the 31st of July, 1821. Before it broke up, M. de Villèle and M. Corbière resigned, as they found it impossible to carry out their ultra-royalist principles in the cabinet. At the same time Chateaubriand resigned the ministry at Berlin.

was received of the death of Napoleon, at St. Helena. That event took place on the 5th of May; and it was at first supposed, that the demise of the man, of whom Chateaubriand said, that "his cocked-hat and greatcoat, placed on a stick, on the coast of Britany, would cause Europe to run to arms from one end to another," would restore peace to the continent, by quelling that revolutionary spirit, which was everywhere manifesting itself. It was rather excited anew, however, by the report, that he had been ill-treated by England, and that the restraints and privations he endured hastened his death. There were men in the British parliament who made these charges against their government and its officers; they obtained general credit, and were subsequently strengthened by the publication of the "Memoires de St. Helène," which Napoleon left behind him. Time, however, has caused justice to be done in this, as it does in many other cases. M. Capefigue, a French historian, records the indulgence with which Napoleon was treated; and M. de Lamartine thus describes his position during the restraints to which he was subjected, because of his breach of faith at Elba. "The sum of 300,000 f., often added to by additional grants, was appropriated, by the government of England, to the cost of the table provided for the exiled emperor's little court. Bertrand, the marshal of the palace, his wife and son; M. and madame de Montholon; general Gourgaud, and Dr. O'Meara; the valet-de-chambre; Marchand; Cypriani, maitre-d'hôtel; Prérion, chief of office; Rousseau, keeper of the plate; St. Denys, Noverras, his usher, Santini, and a train of valets, cooks, and footmen, formed the establishment. A library, ten or twelve saddle-horses, gardens, woods, rural labours, constant and free communication at all times between the exiles, correspondence (under certain regulations) with Europe, receptions and audiences given to travellers, who arrived in the island, and were desirous of obtaining an interview with the emperor;—such were the daily amusements of Longwood. Piquets of soldiers, under the command of an officer, watched the circuit of the building, and its environs; a camp was established at a certain distance, but out of sight of the house, so as not to offend the inmates. Napoleon and his officers were at liberty to go out on foot, or on horseback, from daybreak to nightfall, and to go over the whole extent of the island, accompanied only by an officer at a distance, so as to prevent all attempt at escape. Such was the respectful captivity which the complaints of Napoleon, and of his companions in exile, styled the dungeon and martyrdom of St. Helena."—No doubt the restraint was not pleasant, but it was requisite to preserve peace; and it is now the general opinion, that no harshness or unnecessary restrictions were enforced.

Whilst the French legislature was in session, the allied sovereigns had been assembled in congress at Troppau and Laybach. The emperors of Austria and Russia, and the king of Prussia, attended by their ministers, met at Troppau, on the 10th of October, 1820, for the purpose of concerting measures to repress the spirit of revolution which was so prevalent in Europe; and, just at that period, more especially at Naples. Metternich was the principal agent in causing the congress to assemble; his object being to induce the sovereigns to adopt the principle of intervention, for the purpose of maintaining, in their integrity, the states of Europe, as they were regulated and apportioned by the treaties of 1815. It was not without difficulty that the emperor of Russia was induced to coincide with the views of Metternich; but, before the congress separated, a protocol was drawn up, and signed by the three sovereigns, which bound them to interfere, by force, if necessary, for the maintenance of the then existing states, and the repression of revolution. An invitation was sent to England and France to join the alliance; the congress was adjourned to Laybach; and the king of Naples was invited to attend. The two emperors arrived at Laybach, early in January, 1821; the king of Prussia was represented by Hardenberg, Bernstorff, and Krusemark; lord Stewart was present for England; and France had three representatives; the small Italian states were also represented. There were five questions discussed. 1. The general principle of intervention. 2. Its application to the revolution of Naples. 3. The propriety of forming an Italian confederation. 4. The best means to put down revolution in Piedmont. 5. The means to be taken with respect to the insurrection in Greece, which broke out whilst the congress was sitting. At this congress, Austria, Prussia, and Russia adhered to the protocol of Troppau; England, not disputing the right of the other powers to act upon the principle laid down in that document, and, with respect to Naples, disapproving the manner in which the revolution was accomplished, yet declined to interfere; and Louis XVIII. gave a conditional assent, intimating, that the union of power and liberty was necessary to secure prosperity. Allied armies were immediately sent to repress the revolutions in Naples and Piedmont.

Before the session closed, general Foy, and other liberals, endeavoured to ascertain what part France really had taken at Laybach. They could get no satisfactory answer. M. Pasquier declared, that France had assumed a dignified position, but what that position was, he said, the chamber had no right to ask, and he had no intention to tell. This was considered an assumption of privilege on the part of the government, which the charter did not justify, and did not contribute to its popularity with the liberals. After the session closed, and the trials of the conspirators came on, in August, the evidence given of the complicity of some of the liberal leaders—more especially of Lafayette and Manuel—was so strong, that the ultra-royalists expressed the greatest surprise that they escaped without prosecution. On all sides the ministry thus appeared to make enemies; and, to strengthen the government, negotiations were again opened with the count d'Artois and the other leaders of the ultra-royalist party. The count and his friends were willing to retain the duke de Richelieu as premier; but they demanded that the ministry of the interior should be given to M. de Villèle; that a new office—of minister of public instruction—should be created for M. Corbière; that M. Chateaubriand should have the London embassy; and that a diplomatic employment of the first class should be found for M. de Vitrolles. All these demands were conceded, except that connected with M. de Villèle. He was offered the ministry of marine; but it was insisted that M. Mounier should be minister of the interior. On this point the negotiations broke off.

The elections for 1821 were again in favour of the ultra-royalists; then every one saw that the days of the ministry were numbered, and the eyes of the public were directed to those who were likely to be their successors. The duke de Richelieu still thought that he might maintain himself by appealing to the good sense of the chambers, and by the introduction of constitutional measures; thus detaching those who really wished for nothing but the prosperity and happiness of the country, from the two extremes. The session was opened on the 5th of November. The king was again unable to go to the legislative palace; the peers and deputies assembled at the Louvre; and Louis was rolled into the hall, where they met, in his easy chair. He made a brief speech, which did not commit the ministry to any professed line of action. The most definite passage in the address was that in which his majesty spoke of his friendly relations with foreign powers; expressed a hope that they might continue; and, in allusion to the complications which might arise from the insurrection in Greece, anticipated "that accord between the powers would accomplish in the East what religion, policy, and humanity required." The address of the chamber of deputies, in reply, contained the following sentence:—"We congratulate ourselves, sire, on the continuance of your friendly relations with foreign powers, in the just confidence that so precious a peace has not been bought by sacrifices incompatible with the honour of the nation and the dignity of the crown." The ministers objected to these words, and demanded that they should be struck out. The majority, formed by a union of the opposite sides, the right and left, resolved that they should stand; and, on a division, the address was adopted by 176 votes to 98. The king, who, infirm as he was, had too high a spirit to bear anything like indignity, refused to hear the address read when it was presented to him, and said to the president and secretaries of the chamber—"I know the nature of the address you bring me. In exile and persecution I upheld my rights, as well as the honour of my family and of the French name. On the throne, surrounded by my people, I am indignant even at the bare idea of my being deemed capable of sacrificing the honour of the nation and the dignity of the crown for any consideration."

The opposition did not acknowledge the justice of this rebuke; and the acerbity of party spirit became greatly increased. All business was arrested in its progress; and, to get rid of the difficulty, the king proposed that the chambers should be dissolved; whilst M. de Serre suggested that the ministry should bring forward extreme measures, with a view to dissolve the alliance between the two ultra parties, on the supposition that the friends of Monsieur must support them. It was decided that the course proposed by M. de Serre should be followed; and that minister brought in a projet-de-loi to continue the censorship of the press for five years longer, and increase the severity of the pains and penalties of offenders. The government also commenced a prosecution against Beranger, the celebrated song-writer, for libels against the king and the state, contained in some of his admirable lyrics. The prosecution was successful; the poet was found guilty, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. But, to the great surprise of the ministers, M. Delalot, one of the most violent adherents of the count d'Artois, energetically denounced the law of the press. "They want," he said, "to divide the majority, having failed to render it servile. They wish to reverse the law of elections, to commence a government by ordinances, and, by obtaining for five years longer the power of gagging the press, they hope to extinguish truth. They require darkness, in order that their designs may be accomplished. But they shall not escape justice; their heads shall pay for their misdeeds!" The liberals were equally indignant; and the ministers, finding that it was impossible they could carry on the government, on the 13th of December resigned. The duke de Richelieu advised the king to send for M. de Villèle; and the conduct of that statesman—who has been described as "a partisan on the benches of opposition, and a courtier at the palace"—had been so circumspect since he left the cabinet, that the king did not object. Nothing final was decided upon, however, till the count d'Artois was consulted; then the following arrangements for the new cabinet were arranged:—M. de Villèle, president of the council and minister of finance; M. de Peyronnet, secretary of state and minister of justice; viscount Montmorency, minister of foreign affairs; M. Corbière, minister of the interior; marshal Victor, minister of war; the marquis Clermont-Tonnerre, minister of marine. A military command was given to general Donnadieu, who had been a violent opponent of the late ministry; and M. de Chateaubriand was sent ambassador to London. Several members of the late ministry—MM. de Serre and Roy, Latour-Maubourg, count Simeon, and baron Portal—were appointed members of the council of state; and Latour-Maubourg was also made governor of the Invalides.

From this ministry—though considered ultra-royalist, and as representing the ultra-royalist majority in the chambers—the principal ultra-royalist leaders were excluded; a religious, rather than a political, bias being given to the new government. For about ten years, there had been forming in France a party which has been since known as that of "the Parti-prêtre," or "the Congregation." Amongst its earliest promoters were the viscount de Montmorency, and the abbé Legris-Duval. The members were sincerely pious men, and their objects, at first, were no other "than the performance of good works, and other duties prescribed by a fervent devotion." But the society soon got into the hands of the Jesuits, who, not permitted to reside in France in their true characters, had assumed the name of Pères de la foi—"Fathers of the Faith." The "Congregation" then became the centre of all the intrigues that distracted France, with a view to restore the predominance of the church, and of the regal power, as subservient to the spiritual. Affiliated societies branched off from it in every direction. The Jesuits established themselves at Montrouge, where they directed all the movements of the main body. They had powerful allies, even in the bosom of the royal family; and Louis XVIII., though he could never be brought to recognise their legal existence, was induced to tolerate their presence. Then it was found, that "religion, so holy and beneficent an agent, when it acts wholly in a moral and spiritual direction, was mixed up with all the interests and intrigues of politics and ambition. The Jesuits founded colleges, under the name of petits séminaires, at which were placed the children of the most distinguished families of the kingdom." Fraysinous, bishop of Hermopolis, was, soon after the accession of Villèle to the ministry, appointed president of the council of education. He signalled his accession to office by displacing laymen wherever he could, and by substituting ecclesiastics in their place. The Jesuits soon became installed in the universities. "They governed the court, the church, and the majority of the chamber. Missionaries, for the most part, fanatical and ignorant, who were affiliated with the 'Congregation,' traversed the kingdom to propagate its doctrines, and were nearly everywhere the intentional or involuntary cause of strange disorders."* They rendered themselves obnoxious to the people, who ascribed to religion itself the indefensible doctrines, and equally indefensible practices, of the missionaries, who, at last, could only preach under the protection of the soldiers or of the police.

With the exception of M. de Villèle, the leading men of the cabinet were members of the "Congregation;" and when it was constituted, the king said to a friend, "Now that M. de Villèle triumphs, I regard myself as annihilated. Hitherto, I have preserved the crown, and defeated the charter; if my brother imperils both, it is his affair."† To M. Decazes, the king wrote—"At last M. de Villèle is triumphant. I know very little of the men who enter the cabinet with him; but I believe them to be sufficiently reasonable, and have enough of good sense, not to give in blindly to all the follies of the 'right.' As for myself, I annul myself henceforth, and accept the consequences of constitutional government: not so completely, however, as to prevent me from defending my crown, should my brother expose it to risks."‡

After Villèle, the principal men in the new ministry were, the viscount de Montmorency, marshal Victor, and M. de Peyronnet. The first, sprung from one of the noblest families in France, had been carried away by the impulse of feeling at the outbreak of the revolution, and, in the constituent assembly, was the first nobleman who disclaimed the distinctions and privileges of his order, in accordance with what were then called the "Rights of Man." He soon cooled in his ardour for Jacobin principles; became an object of Jacobin vengeance; and was obliged to leave France. He returned after the empire was established, but refused to accept office under Napoleon; retiring, soon after, to Lake Lemán, where he was one of the brightest ornaments of the salons of madame de Staël and madame Recamier. He was soon somewhat detached from that brilliant circle by his piety; he became a member of the "Congregation," and of the court of the duke d'Angoulême; and, finally, obtained the confidence of the count d'Artois, and to that circumstance he owed his appointment of minister of foreign affairs.—Marshal Victor, duke de Belluno, had been a soldier of fortune, and a faithful follower of Napoleon; but after his abdication, he became a decided and honest royalist, notwithstanding, from his antecedents, he was not unpopular with the liberals.—M. de Peyronnet was a member of the bar of Bordeaux, who was distinguished for the courage and fidelity with which he adhered to the duchess d'Angoulême, in 1815. He had also displayed great talent in defending the countess du Cayla, from the demands of her husband, that she should surrender her fortune, and give up her children; and he had been very zealous in the prosecution of the military conspirators. He had undoubted ability, was true to the principles he had embraced, and as firm in determination as he was honest in intention.

Besides the immediate partisans and dependents of the ultra-royalists and the "Congregation," M. de Villèle was scarcely installed in office, before all the functionaries of the centre—the employés of the duke de Decazes and the duke de Richelieu—transferred their allegiance to him; and, in the first struggle in the chamber, the value of their support was apparent. M. de Serre's projet-de-loi on the press had been the precursor of the resignation of the Richelieu ministry. That law was opposed by the ultra-royalists; yet the first measure introduced by the new cabinet was a measure affecting the press, of a still more stringent nature. M. de Villèle precluded the ministerial propositions by declaring, that the censorship of the press should be discontinued, and formally abrogated, except under extraordinary circumstances; and, on the 2nd of January, 1822, M. de Peyronnet introduced two projets-de-loi—by one of which it was proposed to enact, that, with the exception of the journals then in existence, none should appear without the authority of the king. The royal court might suspend, or, in extreme cases, suppress, any newspaper or public journal; and during the legislative recess, if any serious offences were committed by the press, the king should have the power to issue an ordonnance, countersigned by three ministers, re-establishing the censorship—to continue for one month after the next meeting of the chambers. The second project was a great departure from that of the duke Decazes. Under the latter, small fines and imprisonments were awarded, in the case of writers convicted of offences against religion and morals; by the ministerial proposition, the term of imprisonment, and the amount of the fines, were greatly increased; the offences were confined to the "religion of the state," viz., Roman catholicism; and they were to be awarded in cases where that religion was "derided," as well as when it was "outraged." By the old law, writers were to be punished for insulting or impugning the constitutional authority of the king; in the new law, the word "constitutional" was struck out. To protect the aristocracy and the priesthood, penalties were also inflicted upon those who excited hatred or contempt of a class. By Decazes' law, offences were left to the decision of juries; by the new one, the judges only were to hear the cases, to decide upon them, and to pass sentence. The pleadings and proceedings might also be in private, if the judges thought that their publicity would endanger morals or religion.

These propositions excited a perfect storm of indignant oratory, addressed more to the people than the chamber, for the opposition had little hope of making any impression upon the ministerial majority in the latter. One of the warmest and most able opponents of that part of the ministerial measures which proposed to withdraw the offences of the press from the jurisdiction of juries, was M. de Serre, who said—"the mask had fallen off; they were presented with a law destructive of the liberty of the press, and which, under the pretence of saving the institutions of the country, really subverted them. The proposed law," he maintained, "struck at the root of representative institutions;" and he contended, that "legitimate monarchy had nothing to fear from the press," which "was a social necessity it was impossible to uproot. The proposed law tended to destroy its utility, by subjecting it to arbitrary restrictions. Its power, however, would resist all attacks, and it would only become the more dangerous from being directed against the throne, not the ministers who abused its power." M. Castelbajac replied to M. de Serre. "They wished for the charter," said this orator, "but still more they wished for the king. They wished for liberty, but it was liberty without license. Unrestrained freedom of discussion were other words for anarchy. The law presented was peculiarly valuable, for it brought back this difficult subject to the principles of the charter. Respect religion, the laws, the monarch—such were the principles which order demanded. The liberty of the press could only be maintained by the laws which prevented its abuse; such repression was the soul of real freedom." Similar opinions to those of M. de Serre were expressed by M. Royer-Collard, M. Etienne, general Foy, Lafayette, and other members of the "left;" and the projet had to be strenuously defended, clause by clause. It was adopted in the deputies by 219 to 137.—In the peers, the opposition was equally determined, and one amendment, the re-insertion of the word "constitutional" was carried. With that amendment the law was passed, by 124 votes to 83: prince Talleyrand, the duke de la Rochefoucauld, and count Molé, protesting against it.

The debates on this law convinced the ministers that they had three parties to contend with in the chamber of deputies—the doctrinaires, led by Royer-Collard, Camille Jourdain, and their friends; the centre left, the principal leaders being general Foy, Benjamin Constant, and Casimir Perrier; and the extreme left, at whose heads were Lafayette, Manuel, and d'Argenson. Out of doors they had a chain of conspiracies formed against them, originating with secret societies, which, existing in France from the time of the second restoration, and countenanced by the adherence of several of the most eminent of the opposition leaders, now became more extended and more dangerous, as the discontented were obliged to desist from making their complaints public through the press, or were severely punished if they did so. These societies were called the Carbonari, the Bons-cousins, and the Chevaliers de la Liberté. Of these, the most important and the most dangerous was the Carbonari, which was introduced into France from Italy in 1820. In the autumn of 1821 it was spread nearly all over the kingdom; and, in 1822, became the secret inspirer of most of the disturbances that took place, and which required the shedding of blood to repress. There was in Paris a committee, chiefly composed of members of the chamber of deputies, which corresponded with those of the departments, as the latter did with the committees of the arrondissements: the former were composed of nine, the latter of five members, with a president. All orders, resolutions, and plans were conveyed from one to the other verbally, nothing connected with the business of the society being committed to paper. All the members of the society were bound by a solemn oath not to betray its secrets, and to obey implicitly the central committee, from whom all orders emanated. Death was the reward of treachery or disobedience; and the chiefs, who formed the Paris committee, had always assassins at their beck, ready to carry out their sentence whenever they pronounced the fate of a member. The plans of the society first resolved upon by the committees, were made known to the members in secret midnight meetings; and at those meetings oaths were administered, with a dagger directed against the breast, and other melodramatic solemnities, to produce effect, and make a lasting impression on the members, all of whom were armed, as every Carbonari was obliged to provide himself with a musket, bayonet, and twenty rounds of ball-cartridge. If any disobedience of orders was manifest—if there was reason to suspect any member of treachery—secret courts were held, whose sentence was final, and it was executed by unknown hands, to the terror of the members.

Persons well acquainted with France, at this period, tell us, that, by the efforts of the "Congregation" on the one hand, and of the secret societies on the other, the people were induced to become either revolutionists, or to affect piety; and to "qualify themselves as loyalists and favourites of the existing government by hypocrisy." At the head of the Carbonari were general Lafayette and his son, M. Manuel, Dupont de l'Eure, M. d'Argenson, Jacques Kochler, count Thiard, general Taragré, general Corbineau, M. de Lascelles, and M. Merithou.*

* Lamartine; Vaulabelle.—The particulars respecting the Carbonari, were elicited on the trial of some captured conspirators.

All these were able and determined men, and Lafayette is described as "the head and soul of the whole." It is possible that Villèle might have disarmed their hostility, or counteracted their plots without bloodshed, if he could have pursued his own line of policy. Though acting with the ultra-royalists before he obtained power, he showed no inclination to go to extremes when he became the head of the ministry. He was particularly averse to the ultra-religious party, which was grouped round the count d'Artois; but he found himself obliged to yield to it; and no doubt that its ultra-zeal greatly increased the strength of those who wished to subvert the monarchy. Early in 1822, the leaders of the latter party thought they were strong enough to resort to overt acts; and their chief, general Lafayette, left Paris for Bèfort, to place himself at the head of the insurrection in Alsace. It broke out prematurely. The conspirators in Bèfort were so confident of success, that they mounted the tricoloured cockade, armed themselves with pistols and sabres, and showed themselves openly in the town. The governor, however, had not been secured, nor was the garrison corrupted. The former, M. Foulain, led the troops against the conspirators, and was, unfortunately, shot; but the disturbers of the public peace were defeated, and driven from the town. They happened to take the road by which Lafayette was advancing, and he returned to his château. Several of the conspirators were apprehended,—amongst them colonel Pailhis Tellier; but so difficult was it to obtain evidence, that none were capitally convicted.

But the Carbonari were not disheartened. The following month, February, they sent general Berton to Thouars. He left Parthenay on the 23rd of February, at the head of a considerable force; entered Thouars, and made a brigade of gendarmérie prisoners; hoisted the tricoloured flag; and proclaimed a provisional government, sitting at Paris, and composed of generals Foy, Demarcay, and Lafayette, MM. Benjamin Constant, Manuel, and d'Argenson. Berton then marched to Saumur; but the mayor met him at the head of a body of young royalists, and compelled him to retreat. His followers dispersed, he fled to the marshes near Rochefort, with several of the leaders who had been acting with him, where, a few days after, they were captured. They were brought to trial, and six were found guilty of the capital crime of treason, and sentenced to death. The duchess d'Angoulême interceded for the condemned, and obtained the pardon of all except Berton, and Caffé, a physician. The latter opened an artery, in prison, and bled to death; the former was executed on the scaffold, dying with the words, "Vive la République!" on his lips.

At the same time conspiracies were formed at Colmar, Marseilles, Nantes, Toulon, and Rochelle. The movements at the latter place were directed by Lafayette, from Paris. M. Boriès, a sub-officer of the 45th regiment, was ordered to proceed to Pau, with some of his privates, whom he had induced to enrol in the ranks of the Carbonari. There were a number of affiliated brethren in that city, and the movement was to have taken place in connection with that of general Berton on Saumur. Notwithstanding the precautions against treachery, however, a traitor was found in the camp, who conveyed to the government such information as led to the arrest of Boriès, and others, as they were leaving Pau. These men were tried at Paris, M. Marchangy, the king's advocate, appearing as prosecutor. On the trial, evidence was given of the existence and organisation of the Carbonari conspiracy, and of its object, to overturn all existing governments, and establish republics in their place. Boriès and three of his companions were condemned to death, and executed; an attempt to bribe the jailer, and procure their escape, having failed. On the day of the execution, 12,000 of the Carbonari of the capital were dispersed over Paris, and in the neighbourhood of the place of execution, bound, by an oath, to rescue them. The government, however, appears to have been aware of all their arrangements; and the troops were so numerous, and so judiciously posted, that no attempt was made to interrupt the proceedings at the scaffold, where the victims met their fate with great firmness.—The insurrections at the other places mentioned, also failed; the government appearing to have been forewarned of what was to take place.

These outrages, and the suspense in which the information in their possession, kept the government, were the causes of very few measures being brought forward in the legislative session of 1822. M. de Villèle, himself, after his accession to power, directed his attention chiefly to finance; and he introduced great order and economy into that department. The revenue of 1821 had been very productive, leaving a balance, over expenditure, of 8,000,000*fr.* The income of 1822 was estimated at 915,591,000*fr.*; the expenditure at 882,321,000*fr.*, of which 250,000,000*fr.* were devoted to the army; and the large surplus was left at the disposal of the finance minister. The budget gave rise to an animated discussion, in the midst of which the duke de Richelieu died, having been attacked with fever. He was in his fifty-sixth year; and, when he was lost to France, all parties and all classes appeared to vie with each other in doing honour to his memory, and in bearing testimony to his disinterestedness. The king regretted him greatly; next to Decazes, he was the minister whom he most highly esteemed; and he continued, by a royal ordonnance, all the deceased duke's honours to his nephew, count

Odit de Jumilhac.—Louis, at this period, was leading a life, apparently, of quiet contentment. Since the accession of the Villèle cabinet, which, recommended by the count d'Artois, was considered as "Monsieur's ministry," the members of his family (except the duke of Orleans) had been upon more familiar terms with him. The duchess d'Angoulême shed her influence over the palace, and contributed greatly to his comfort; and his majesty himself remarked to one of his former cabinet, "that he had quiet in his household, which was a great thing for an old man upon the verge of the grave." That he was, on the whole, satisfied himself with the government was evinced, by his elevating, shortly after the death of Richelieu, MM. Villèle, Corbière, and Peyronnet, to the rank of counts; an honour which he communicated to each in one of his well-written, appropriately-worded notes.

Before the session was brought to a close, discussions arose upon the abortive conspiracies, and the share which some of the deputies were alleged to have had in producing them. In the act of accusation against general Berton, the names of Lafayette, Manuel, and others, were mentioned as implicated, and yet they were not prosecuted. On the 1st of August, Benjamin Constant complained of this proceeding; and M. Lafitte called upon the chamber to direct, that an inquiry should be made into the transactions, the assertions respecting which, as far as they affected himself, he declared to be "infamous falsehoods." General Foy and M. Casimir Perrier also protested against the accusations brought against their party, "endeavouring to cast," says M. Guizot, "the mantle of their innocence over the actual conspirators, who sat by their sides." M. Lafayette said a few words, neither confessing nor denying his complicity with the conspiracies, but demanding "the utmost publicity, both within the walls of the chamber, and in the face of the entire nation. Thus, he and his accusers, in whatever rank they might be placed, could say to each other, without restraint, all that they had had mutually to reproach each other with, for the last thirty years." M. Villèle replied. He was opposed to the inquiry demanded, and observed, that "the proper mode of proceeding appeared to him to be, to leave justice to its ordinary course, which no one had a right to arrest. If members of the chamber had been compromised in the act of accusation, did they not find their acquittal, in the very fact, that the chamber had not been called upon to give them up, to be added to the list of the accused? It was a contradiction," he continued, "for members to say, on the one hand, 'You have placed our names in the requisition for indictment;' and on the other, 'The minister in office has not dared to prosecute us, since the chamber has not been required to surrender us.' The demand had not been made, because the nature of the process neither imposed it as a duty, nor a necessity on the part of the minister to adopt that course." He "declared, openly, before France, that the minister did not accuse the complaining delegates, because there was nothing in the process that rendered it either incumbent or essential that they should do so. Had either been the case, they would the more readily have fulfilled their duty, since the chamber could not suppose them to be so little acquainted with the human heart, as not to know, that there would be less danger in subjecting the deputies alluded to to direct prosecution, than in following simply and openly the line marked out by the ordinary course of justice."

No more was said, and the chamber, soon after, adjourned. M. Guizot says, that "the conspiring deputies lost more reputation than they gained security, by being defended, while they were disavowed, in their own ranks;" and, he thinks, that "M. Villèle assuredly had good reason to be satisfied with his position and himself." We doubt whether that is the general opinion. His conduct bore the aspect of a desire to prosecute the more humble and active instruments, and to let the heads and organisers of the conspiracy escape. There appears to have been ample evidence to bring home guilt to the deputies named; and they should not have been suffered to plot with impunity, when those they had seduced from duty were brought to punishment. At that period, however, according to his contemporary and friend, "M. de Villèle stood in the first and best phase of his power; he defended the monarchy and order, against conspiracy and insurrection; in the chamber of deputies he had to repel the furious attacks of the left-hand party; and, in the chamber of peers, the more temperate, but vigilant ill-will of the friends of the duke de Richelieu. The danger and acrimony of the contest united his whole party around him. Before such a situation, the rivalries, and the intrigues of the chamber, and the court, hesitated to show themselves; unreasonable expectations were held in check; fidelity and discipline were evidently necessary; the associates of the chief would not desert him, and dared not assail him with their importunities."

After the adjournment, the elections of one-fifth of the chamber took place. They resulted in the return of twenty-eight royalists, and seventeen liberals for the arrondissements; and of twenty-four of the former, and five of the latter, for the departments: giving the royalists a majority of thirty. This result proved, that conspiracy and insurrection at home, and revolution abroad, had not been without their effect in rallying the holders of property round the government. The whole number of electors in the departments and arrondissements, in which the elections took place, was 21,416; viz., 4,426 in the former, and 16,990 in the latter: of these, 3,158 voted in the departments; 2,418 for the royalist, and 720 for the liberal candidates. In the arrondissements, the number of royalist voters was 9,053—of liberal, 5,751. The change in the electoral law might have something to do with this result; but there can be no doubt—both classes of colleges returning a majority of supporters of the government—that other causes were at work. There was a desire to preserve peace and tranquillity, and a dislike of revolutions, if there was no very decided admiration of the ministry; and, however numbers might be disposed to join the secret societies, and take part in conspiracies, those who had anything to lose, with a few exceptions (that proved the rule), were determined to uphold authority, and maintain the law.

CHAPTER VIII.

M. VILLELE AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS; EVENTS IN GREECE AND SPAIN: CONGRESS OF VERONA; ITS RESULTS; SUCCESSES OF THE COMMUNEROS IN SPAIN; LOUIS XVIII. AND VILLELE REFUSE TO CARRY OUT THE DECISION OF THE CONGRESS; RESIGNATION OF M. DE MONTMORENCY; CHATEAUBRIAND FOREIGN MINISTER; DEPARTURE OF THE FRENCH MINISTER FROM MADRID; OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS; THE KING'S SPEECH; HYDE DE NEUVILLE'S ADDRESS; M. DE CHATEAUBRIAND'S SPEECH; MANUEL'S EXPULSION; EXPEDITION TO SPAIN; RETURN OF THE DUKE D'ANGOULEME TO PARIS.

M. GUIZOT informs us, that "M. Villèle, on succeeding to office, had no very defined idea as to foreign affairs, or any decidedly arranged plans, beyond an unbiassed mind, and sensible predilections. During his short association with the cabinet of the duke de Richelieu, he had closely observed the policy adopted towards Spain and Italy—a peace policy of non-intervention, and of sound advice to kings and liberals—to liberals as to kings, but of little efficacy in act, and tending, above all other considerations, to keep France beyond the vortex of revolution and counter-revolution, and to prevent an European conflagration. In the main, M. de Villèle approved of this policy, and would have desired nothing better than to continue it. He was more occupied with internal government than external relations, and more anxious for public prosperity than diplomatic influence; but, in the accomplishment of his views, he had to contend against the prepossessions of his party; and, in this struggle, his two principal associates—M. de Montmorency, as minister for foreign affairs, and M. Chateaubriand, as ambassador at London,—contributed more embarrassment than assistance." The latter was very much dissatisfied with his position in the British metropolis. He was not there deemed the "bright particular star" he was accustomed to consider himself; and which was no unjustifiable assumption, from the respect, the deference ("the enthusiastic idolatry," Guizot calls it) that he met with in the circles he mixed with on the continent. This caused him to say, that "every kind of reputation travelled rapidly to the banks of the Thames, and left them again with the same speed;" and that he "should prefer the galleys a hundred times" to a London season. The state of affairs on the continent led to events, which gave him an opportunity for appearing on another scene, of which he eagerly availed himself.

We have briefly alluded to the prevalence of the revolutionary spirit in Europe, to the events in Germany, Italy, and elsewhere, and to the congresses at Troppau and Laybach, held to devise means for repressing that spirit, and preserving the "balance of power," as established by the treaties of Vienna. But there were still disturbances prevailing in Greece, owing to the oppression of the Turkish government; and in Spain, springing out of the arbitrary conduct of Ferdinand VII. In the first-named country, an assembly had been called at Argos, in December, 1821, composed of ecclesiastics, landowners, merchants, and civilians, by whom, on the 27th of January, 1822, the independence of Greece had been declared. Since that period the patriots had maintained a generally successful war with the Ottoman forces; a war which the latter stained, on the 23rd of April, and following days, by one of the most merciless acts on record. An overwhelming Turkish force landed on the island of Scio, and massacred nearly all the inhabitants, except such women and boys as could be sold for slaves. Upwards of 40,000 were barbarously murdered, and 25,000 consigned to slavery!

In Spain, Ferdinand was scarcely re-established on his throne, before he evinced his desire to restore the old state of things. The Cortes were not popular, they had taxed the people too highly to occasion any regret when that body was dissolved. But the king had promised a new constitution, liberty of the press, and other liberal measures; instead of which he re-established the inquisition, recalled the Jesuits, and revelled, for a time, in the full enjoyment of absolute power; this produced re-action. From 1814 to 1819, there was a succession of contests between him and his ministers, which, in the five years, occasioned no fewer than twenty-five changes in the personnel of his advisers, and led to several conspiracies at home; whilst the loss of some of the American colonies added to the national feeling against the government. On the 1st of January, 1820, this feeling took a decided form. Rafael del Riego—an officer who had distinguished himself in the war of independence—at the head of four battalions of the army, proclaimed the constitution of 1812, in the Isla de Leon, of which he took possession. So successful was the movement, that, on the 8th of March, Ferdinand agreed to accept that constitution, and summon the Cortes. The same day he caused a general amnesty to be proclaimed; and, on the 4th, a provisional junta of eleven members was nominated, to carry on the affairs of the government till the Cortes met. In the presence of this body, and of the municipal authorities of Madrid, the king took the oath to the constitution; the inquisition was again abolished; and other liberal measures, including the appointment of constitutional ministers, adopted. For some months tranquillity prevailed. Then the contest between the friends of absolute government and the constitutionalists commenced afresh, which was heightened by the assertion of their independence by the other American colonies.

The constitutionalists had an able general in Morillo; and Martinez de la Rosa and Toreno were as able ministers; but their cause was injured by a decree of the Cortes, reducing the number of convents and the clergy, by which more than 73,000 ecclesiastics were deprived of their livelihood. One of these, Maragnon, afterwards known as the Trappist, became a famous insurgent leader; and many of his brethren joined the absolutists, forming an "army of the Faith." As the royalists increased in numbers, the constitutionalists became more violent. In 1822, all power had fallen into the hands of the most extreme democrats; and the state of affairs was further complicated by quarrels between the royal guards and the troops of the line. Had Ferdinand been really honest and sincere, in all probability the discontent might have been allayed without assuming the aspect of revolution; but, whilst professing to govern by the constitution, he intrigued with, and supported, those who were seeking to destroy it. At length, on the 7th of July, things were brought to a crisis, by an attempt made by the guards to get possession of the capital and the person of the king. They were defeated; and the government became still more revolutionary, most of the moderate employés resigning office. These events led to the establishment, by the French government, of an army of observation, at the foot of the Pyrenees, near the frontier.

There were now two parties struggling for the sovereignty—the comuneros, as the popular party was styled, who held the king and the government in their hands; and the apostolicals, composed of the royalists and clergy. This latter party, in August, 1822, established a regency, composed of the marquis Mataflorida, then archbishop of Tarragona, and the baron D'Eroles. They established themselves at Seo d'Urgel, on the French frontier, which had been taken by the Trappist from the government troops; issued orders in the name of Ferdinand, whom they called "the imprisoned king;" and decreed the restoration of the state of things which had existed prior to the 8th of March, 1820.

These movements in Spain had attracted the attention of all the other governments of Europe, and more especially of those of France and England. Nor were the people of either country inattentive to the course of events. In both, there were those who sympathised with the men who were fighting, as was supposed, for liberty, and the constitution; but there were also those who thought, that the comuneros, or constitutionalists, had put themselves in the wrong by many of their acts, and who were desirous of seeing the monarchy restored to a more independent position; though in England, there were none who had any faith in Ferdinand. It was in France, however, that the greatest interest was taken in the progress of the liberals, for there it threatened to produce the greatest danger; and the government was soon made aware of the extent of the evils against which it had to guard. As the intelligence of the movements in Spain was received, the popular mind throughout France became greatly agitated. "Every audacious step of the revolution at Madrid was applauded, and proposed to the imitation of the French army. The most vehement speeches of the orators in the Cortes, the most violent articles in the revolutionary journals, were the subjects of enthusiasm in Paris; every triumph of the anarchists at Madrid over the throne or the clergy was publicly celebrated as triumph by the French revolutionists. Spain," it was thought, by the count d'Artois, and his friends, "was on the verge of a republic; and a republic proclaimed on the other side of the Pyrenees could not fail to overturn the Bourbons in France. Europe was slipping from beneath the monarchies; all felt it, and most of all the revolutionists of Paris."* These were the feelings which actuated the ultra-royalists of the pavilion Marsan, and made them anxious to send an army to support Ferdinand VII. against the comuneros.

In England, there was a strong feeling against French intervention in the affairs of Spain; the other powers were decidedly against the spread of revolutionary principles, and the overthrow of legitimate governments; and to produce something like a universal acquiescence in the course to be pursued, if possible, it was determined, just before the establishment of the regency at Urgel, that another congress of the representatives of the five great powers should be held, and Verona was fixed upon as the place of assembly. Verona is a fortified city of Lombardy, situated at the foot of the Alps, where the Adige, having made its way through the defile of Chiusa, emerges on the fine Lombardian plain. It has been the scene of many memorable events; and its aspect presents an assemblage of the relics of ancient, mixed with the mementos of more modern, days. To this congress, the various powers sent the following representatives:—France—the viscount de Montmorency, the minister for foreign affairs, M. de Chateaubriand, the ambassador at London, and M. de la Ferronnay, ambassador at St. Petersburg. England—the duke of Wellington, lord Strangford, the English ambassador at Constantinople, the marquis of Londonderry (the late Sir Charles Stewart, who had just succeeded his brother, the celebrated lord Castlereagh, who was the first marquis), and lord Burghersh. Austria—prince Metternich, and count Lebzeltern, the ambassador to the court of Russia. Prussia—prince Hardenberg and count Bernstorff. Russia—count Nesselrode, M. de Takicheff, the ambassador at Vienna, M. de Strogonoff, the ambassador at Constantinople, and count Pozzo di Borgo. The emperors of Austria and Russia were also present, and took part in the deliberations; as did the kings of Prussia, Naples and Sardinia.

There had been some difficulty, at Paris, in the choice of plenipotentiaries. MM. de Montmorency and de Chateaubriand were both eager to go; whilst the king, who had no confidence in either, wished Villèle to attend himself. As the latter declined to take an office which, more especially, pertained to those ministers connected with foreign affairs, it was resolved to join M. de la Ferronnay with de Montmorency and Chateaubriand; but the king caused it to be known, that their instructions were to be drawn up by M. de Villèle. These instructions were strict and definite. The French plenipotentiaries were to abstain from the appearance of being anything like reporters upon Spanish affairs to the congress; they were not to take the initiative in recommending any measures; were to enter into no engagements as regarded intervention; were to insist that France should be left perfectly free to act towards Spain as she thought fit; that if intervention became necessary, France should be the only power to act with its troops; that she must be the sole judge when it was necessary so to act; and if she thought it necessary to withdraw her ambassador from Madrid, the other powers should withdraw theirs. These instructions met the ideas neither of the count d'Artois nor M. de Montmorency; and whilst the inclinations of those personages were for a decided declaration in favour of intervention, it was believed that all the powers, England excepted, were also anxious that France should send an army into Spain to put down the revolutionary movement, and support Ferdinand on the throne. The views of the prince Metternich and M. de Montmorency completely coincided; and the influence of the Austrian statesman was, unfortunately, in other ways, very influential both with the French minister, and his royal patron, the count d'Artois.

The congress was opened on the 25th of August. At that time Verona could boast of a most unusual assemblage of beauty, rank, and genius within its walls. Amongst the ladies who collected around them all the members of the beau-monde, and the many celebrities—civil, military, ecclesiastical, and literary—then in Verona, were the empress of Austria; her daughter, Maria Louisa, who, though no longer empress of France, as duchess of Lucca and Parma, held rank with royalty; the queen of Sardinia, and the princesses, her daughters; the princesses of Modena, Tuscany, and several of the German powers. The theatre and opera-house were also open; and the principal actors and actresses, and vocalists of Europe, were collected together in the Italian city. There pleasure seemed to vie with business. Plays, operas, balls, concerts, salons, and réunions, were constantly taking place; but, although those who might be supposed to be most interested in the councils, were amongst the most sedulous worshippers, apparently, at pleasure's shrine, the important objects of the congress were not neglected; and, amongst the acknowledged diplomatists, the emissaries of the Jesuits intruded, carrying on, says an historian, "a series of intrigues destined to produce the most important results."

The first topic of discussion was the insurrection of Greece, and the relations between Russia and the Porte. We shall not enter into that subject, as it is foreign to our history; except to say, that the foundation was laid for the future independence of Greece.—Then came the question of Piedmont. The king of Sardinia declared, that he could maintain his position without the presence of the Austrian forces, which he wished to be withdrawn; and it was resolved, that, on the 31st of December, the Austrians should begin to leave the Piedmontese territory.

The English plenipotentiaries also endeavoured to procure from the congress solemn declarations against the slave-trade, and in favour of the independence of the states of Spanish South America. With respect to the former, a declaration was signed by the representatives of the five powers, to the effect,—“That they have never ceased, and will never cease, to regard the slave-trade as a traffic which has too long desolated Africa, disgraced Europe, and afflicted humanity; and that they are ready, by every means in their power, to concur in all measures which may ensure and accelerate the entire and final abolition of that commerce.” Upon the question of the independence of the Spanish colonies, there was more difference of opinion. Austria, Prussia, and Russia declared, that they “would never recognise that independence, so long as his christian majesty had not formally renounced those rights of sovereignty he had heretofore exercised over those provinces.” The reply of the French plenipotentiaries was more precise. One reason urged, by England, for recognising the de facto governments of the former colonies was, that, without such recognition, and the aid of those governments, the host of pirates and adventurers which had sprung up in consequence of the relaxation of the Spanish authority, and frequented the western ocean, to the great injury of commerce, could not be extirpated. France replied—“In so grave a question, France feels that Spain should, in the first instance, be consulted, as sovereign de jure of those colonies. She concurred with England in holding, that, where intestine troubles had long prevailed, and the law of nations had thereby been practically abrogated on account of the weakness of one of the belligerent powers, national right resumed its empire. She admitted that there were inevitable prescriptions of some rights; and that, after a government had long resisted, it was sometimes obliged to yield to overbearing necessity, in order to terminate many evils, and prevent one state from alone reaping advantages in which other states were entitled to participate. But to prevent the jealousies and rivalries of commerce, which might involve governments against their will in hostilities, some general measure should be adopted; and, perhaps, it would be possible to reconcile the interests of Spain, of its colonies, and of the European states, by a measure which, founded on the broad basis of equality and reciprocity, might bring into harmony also the rights of legitimacy, and the necessity of policy.” The result was—the refusal of the congress to consider the question any further; and the independence of the ci-devant Spanish colonies, though then an accomplished fact, remained an unacknowledged one.

discussed, the difference in opinion between the English plenipotentiaries and those of the continental powers was very decided. It soon appeared that the latter, including those of France, were in favour of direct intervention. Apprised of what was going on in the congress, Mr. Canning, who had succeeded lord Londonderry as foreign secretary, wrote to the duke of Wellington on the 27th of September, instructing him to declare, “frankly and decidedly,” if it were proposed to “interfere, by force or menace, in the present struggle with Spain,” that, “to any such interference, his Britannic majesty would not be a party.” The discussion extended over October; and the plenipotentiaries of the other powers having resolved that intervention in the affairs of Spain would be necessary under certain circumstances, the duke of Wellington refused to sign the procès-verbal containing the resolution. The French plenipotentiaries then proposed three questions to the congress. “1. Should France withdraw her ambassador from Madrid, and interrupt all her diplomatic relations with Spain, are the other powers prepared to follow her example? 2. If war should break out between France and Spain, how would the great powers support the former, so as to strike a salutary terror into the revolutionists of all countries? 3. In such a case, what is the extent of the material succour the other powers are prepared to give France?” In proposing these questions, the plenipotentiaries of France exceeded the letter, and entirely violated the spirit, of their instructions; but they produced replies from the plenipotentiaries of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, to the effect, “that they would follow the example of France, if she suspended diplomatic relations with Spain; that they would imitate the attitude which France assumed; and that they would afford all the succour which might be necessary—the period and mode of co-operation to be arranged by treaty.” The duke of Wellington’s reply was to the effect, that having no information as to the causes of that misunderstanding which, it was said, would be likely to render intervention necessary, and not being able to offer an opinion upon a hypothetical case, he could not reply to any of the questions.

These points decided, it was at first proposed that a note should be addressed to the Spanish government, in the shape of an official remonstrance against the republican and democratic invasions of the royal authority, and the prevalence of the revolutionary spirit; which note should be signed by the representatives of the four continental powers. It was, however, ultimately resolved, that each power should address a separate note to the Madrid cabinet; and those notes being drawn up, the congress separated. Before the last sitting, the duke of Wellington addressed a note to the other plenipotentiaries, detailing the views of the British government.

Writing in the name of that government, his grace wished those ministers to consider, "whether the measures proposed were calculated to allay any irritation which might exist in Spain against France, and to prevent a possible rupture; and whether they might not, with advantage, be delayed till a later period. It was the opinion of his Britannic majesty, that to animadvert upon the internal transactions of an independent state (unless such transactions affected the essential interests of his subjects), was inconsistent with those principles on which his majesty had invariably acted. Such animadversions must involve his majesty in serious responsibility, if they should produce any effect, and must irritate if they should not. If addressed, as proposed, to the Spanish government, they were likely to be injurious to the best interests of Spain, or to produce the worst consequences upon the probable discussion between that country and France. The king's government, therefore, declined to advise his majesty to hold a common language with his allies on that occasion."*

Though the French plenipotentiaries had exceeded their instructions, they had certainly placed their country in a proud position; for "the business of the congress had turned out entirely to the advantage of France. Not only had she gained the consent of all the continental states to whatever policy she might deem it expedient to adopt, but, which was of equal importance, she had been allowed to remain the judge of that policy, the other powers agreeing to follow in her wake, not to take the lead."† Chateaubriand took this view of the result; and, in a letter to M. de Villèle from Verona, he said—"The wish of the [continental] powers is decidedly pronounced for a war with Spain. It is for you, my dear friend, to consider whether you ought not to seize the occasion, perhaps unique, to replace France in the rank of military powers; to restore the white cockade in a war, in short, almost without danger, to which the opinions of the royalists and of the army strongly incline. There is no question of an occupation of the peninsula, but of a rapid movement which would restore power to the true Spaniards, and take away from you all disquietude for the future. The last despatches of M. Lagarde prove how easy that success would be. All continental Europe would be for us; and, if England took umbrage, she would not even have time to throw herself on a colony. As to the chambers, success covers everything. Doubtless commerce and the finances would suffer for a moment, but nothing great can be done without some inconveniences. To destroy a focus of Jacobinism, to re-establish a Bourbon on the throne by the arms of a Bourbon—these are results which outweigh all considerations of a secondary nature."

† Alison.

When M. de Montmorency arrived in Paris from Verona, he was almost immediately created a duke. He brought with him a draft of the despatches, which it was proposed should be sent to Madrid; but they did not meet the views of the king or M. de Villèle. Both deprecated a war, the mere rumour of which had produced a complete stagnation on the Bourse, and interrupted commercial speculations. They had doubts—not as to the resistance that, in fair warfare, Spain could offer—but as to the result of the meeting of the French troops under the lilies, with the victorious Spaniards rallied round the tricolour. At that moment the cause of the comuneros was in the ascendancy. For a short time after the establishment of the regency at Urgel, success had attended the movements of the apostolicals and royalists—no less than 450 towns and villages in the northern provinces declaring for them, and overturning the pillar of the constitution of 1812, where it had been erected. The Madrid government began to be seriously alarmed. They appointed don Francisco Espoz y Mina, who had acquired great fame in the guerilla war from 1811 to 1814, captain-general of the three armies of Navarre, Catalonia, and Arragon, and he took the field in the middle of October. His first success was the capture, by storm, of the fortified town of Castelfolli, on the river Bregas, when all the garrison, who did not succeed in making their escape, were massacred. He also issued a most severe proclamation against the inhabitants of all places which should yield to the rebels (as the royalists were termed), or furnish them with any succour. The baron d'Erolles, on hearing of Mina's success, marched against him, and was totally defeated. Other disasters followed. The regency and their troops were driven first from Urgel, and then from Puycerda; and, with the Trappist, Quesada (another royalist chief), and the remains of their forces, were obliged to take refuge in France, about the time M. de Montmorency arrived in the French capital.
